Total passengers, 70,796.

Average distance transported, 25.6 miles.

From the above it will be noted that the commerce transported through the locks reached 25.9 miles average distance, and that the total commerce reached 4,814,517 tons. It is interesting to note that the following items of "commerce" are included in the above statement:

	Tons.
Gravel	1,181,590
Sand	1,184,359
Waste	28,840

Practically 50 per cent of the Ohio River commerce was sand, gravel, and waste, hauled 26 miles on a river of 1,000 miles in length. Of the remaining 2,419,728 tons, coal reached 2,353,365 tons, leaving a balance of about 55,000 tons of miscellaneous products, all of which was hauled less than 26 miles. However, it must be borne in mind that coal was floated down the river in greater quantities long before the construction of this system of locks was undertaken by Army engineers. In order that accurate information may be had in regard to the character of lock tonnage on this river, I quote briefly from the character of tonnage floated through several locks. In 1914 an analysis was made of this general commerce passing through the locks, and that analysis is resubmitted in order that a better understanding may be had of the kind of traffic carried by the Ohio River.

Approaching 2,000,000 tons at one or two different points, over 95 per cent of which is soft coal, sand, and gravel, a traffic rapidly diminishing in quantity and value, leaves the mouth of the Ohio River at less than a million tons of soft coal, so far as can be ascertained, and then drifts slowly down the Mississippi to be recounted at Cairo, Memphis, Vicksburg, and New Orleans. In other words, a few tons of soft coal that reach New Orleans are first counted at a dozen locks on the Monongahela, then at the locks on the Ohio, and then the same coal, used to swell senseless quadrupled statistics, is sent down and recounted at Cairo, Memphis, Vicksburg, and New Orleans, on the Father of Waters.

It is an interesting system; one that only an able engineer could gravely put across with a wealth of misleading statistics and one that is frequently used for duplicating and quadruplicating commerce on other rivers and canals.

In order that a better understanding of Chief Kingman's letter may be had, let us take the tables from which he draws deductions.

OHIO RIVER TRAFFIC AT LOCK 1.

Lock 1 is given 1,982,257 tons. But page 2711 says that is commerce which passed through the lock—"and open river"—at that point. The table further shows that of the impressive tonnage reported, including duplications, 1,946,119 tons consisted of soft coal, sand, and gravel that was always floated down the "open river," leaving a commerce of 36,135 tons, including 11,240 tons of floatable logs and ties, or less than 25,000 tons, that may or may not have required the services of this $100,000,000 lock system.

OHIO RIVER TRAFFIC AT LOCK 8.

Lock 8 and "open river" is given 224,080 tons by Chief Kingman, page 2712. Of that traffic, so reported, soft coal and railroad ties, that for a half century were floated down the open river, reached 207,429 tons, leaving 16,651 tons of cement and other reported freight at that point for which a $100,000,000 lock system is being built under the recommendation of Army engineers.

OHIO RIVER TRAFFIC AT LOCK 18.

Other lock statistics are of the same character. For fear this statement may not be accepted, as based on investigation, I will take the next lock. Chief Kingman's next lock, 18, and "open river" statistics are found on page 2713. He reports a total "commerce" of 374,945 tons, whereas out of an even 50 items reported, 2 items of soft coal and logs reached 342,836 tons. Just what method was taken for shipping some 7,000 tons of oil and 2,500 tons of lumber, found in the remaining 48 items, the report fails to disclose. One thing is certain amid all this attempt to impress Congress with inflated statistics of open-river and lock traffic, the Government is annually paying bills reaching, with the regular and sundry civil bills, from $5,000,000 to $8,000,000 for the Ohio River alone, for a comparatively insignificant commerce average along the river, apart from soft coal, sand, and gravel, of less than 50,000 tons at given points, as shown by the official reports.

Similar conclusions were reached in the record of April 10, 1914, when other lock statements were analyzed.

WHAT WILL BE THE EVENTUAL COST?—CANALIZED SCIENCE V. COMMON SENSE.

In the debate preceding the defeat of the 1915 bill a prominent Senator called the Ohio River project the "worst of all." It received $1,769,000 from the first allotment, $3,200,000 in the 1915 sundry civil bill, and $3,915,000 allotment from the Chief of Army Engineers April 1, 1915, or $7,115,000 for 1915, in addition to cash on hand—twenty times the amount that was allotted to New York's inner harbor, which handles fifty times the Ohio's actual commerce.

When a $100,000,000 Ohio canalization system has been fastened upon us with its annual interest burden of $3,000,000, and a reasonable maintenance and deterioration charge of $4,000,000 more annually for sixty-odd locks and dams, if the diminishing coal commerce is retained—a violent assumption—the Government will have little tangible traffic to show for its $100,000,000 investment and the annual $7,000,000 charge properly lodged against it.

It is again well to ponder over this extravagance into which we have been led by Army engineers, who seek to defend enormous waste by fictitious commerce statistics. The 45,000,000 tons commerce of the Rhine is probably twenty times the actual commerce of the Ohio, and it appears 95 per cent of the latter is cheap coal, sand, and gravel that requires no special depth of channel, yet seven or eight times the amount spent on the Rhine is spent for a project of no more value to this country than Egypt's pyramids. Does it reduce the price of a ton of coal to a single consumer? Where does it accommodate any actual navigation need apart from floating a few political prospects and fantastic engineering schemes at Government expense? If any commercial house indulged in such investments its officials would be promptly lodged in an asylum to sober off. Is it not about time Congress sobered off and drove out of its counting house those who have persuaded us to adopt such propositions as the lock-and-dam project on the Ohio River?

While it is difficult to separate the duplications in freight and the commerce carried on the open river and through locks, a brief examination of the reports disclose the fact that the continuous haul for the 1,000 mile length of the river averages extremely small compared with the impressive statistics tabulated by Army engineers, while the tonnage floated upon the open river is practically of the same character, although far less in amount compared with that which was carried on the same stream 40 years ago. The question of making enormous annual expenditures on this river to carry out a fantastic dream of Army engineers is one that is brought forcibly to the public mind in a year of stress when Government expenditures and taxation have reached the highest limit in the history of the country.

THE MISSOURI RIVER, ANOTHER VICIOUS WATERWAY PROJECT.

The Missouri River is another harebrained product of engineering wisdom carrying $1,000,000 in the pending bill, notwithstanding over $1,500,000 balance remained to the credit of this river on March 1, 1917.

In like manner, let us briefly analyze what we are receiving after an expenditure of over $20,000,000 on the Missouri River.

A NAVIGATION COMEDY IN THE LOWER MISSOURI.

A remarkable illustration of advanced mathematics is found on the Missouri River, which Col. Deakyne condemns and which Col. Townsend, of the Army engineers, asks to have left in statu quo. While passing this deserted waterway, we are permitted to revel in "commerce" delusions. Attention is given this project, because after spending $20,000,000 of Government money during 50 years, on the recommendation of Army engineers, on the different sections of the Missouri River down to the mouth, they have launched us into an additional twenty-million-dollar expenditure, or thirty millions, in a game that has no limit, but now reaches $35,800,000 on the Missouri. Let us see what we are to get for $75,000 per mile for 400 miles. I quote from the Chief of Engineer's 1914 report, page 2513:

Total ton-miles, 5,173,170.

Of this imposing commerce over 312,000 tons of "sand" was hauled about 1 mile in 1913. Nine-tenths of the "traffic" was barged 1 mile. Study the table in order to get a fair understanding of humbug statistics handed Congress by Army engineers and of a vanished river traffic.

In January, 1915, Senate Document No. 953, the engineers had on hand for this project $1,290,048. On April 1, 1915, the river and harbor lobby sent to the press the Chief Engineer's allotment, wherein $1,000,000 more was given for this 400-mile stretch on the Missouri. Instead of a 6-foot channel being required, a 2-foot channel will float the insignificant commerce, according to experienced river men, and for that river's commerce $2,050,000 was allotted by Chief Kingman out of the $50,000,000 turned over to him by Congress.

Deducting from the above table sand and 11,159 tons of ties and wood barged about 10 miles, leaves 24,000 tons of questionable commerce for which the Chief of Engineers gives $1,000,000 in 1915, or over $40 per ton 1913 expense for the waterway, including maintenance and interest on prior expenditures. Speaking of this Missouri River project on March 2, 1915, one month before the allotment was made, Senator Burton said:

You may spend $20,000,000—yes, $30,000,000—on this project, and in spite of that enormous amount the traffic will diminish, because you are facing a condition that no policy of river improvement can reverse—the loss of that class of river traffic and the utilization of other agencies for the carrying of freight. I wish it were not so, * * * but I am tired of "rainbow chasing," and that is what this is. It is much worse than "rainbow chasing"; it is pure, bald, unmitigated waste.

After this remarkable denunciation of a bald, wasteful project shouldered onto taxpayers by "rainbow chasing" engineers, and after positive legislative notice directing a resurvey of this "pure, bald, unmitigated waste," and with a million dollars balance on hand to throw into the mud, our Chief of Engineers dumped in another million on April 1, 1915. Two jitney busses would have carried all the actual commerce and saved $998,000 of war-tax revenues during 1914.

Was TILLMAN to blame when he said the bill is a "humbug and a steal"? We know it is farcical and we do more than wink at it. With positive knowledge that the waste is twice as large as in the days when TILLMAN exposed the humbug, we approve it, Mississippi, Missouri, and all, with every other worthless project that the bill contains.

Concerning this waterway mockery I quote from a Minneapolis paper's editorial of August 21, 1915, this significant statement:

A BREEZE IN RIVER IMPROVEMENT CIRCLES.

The Missouri River cities and especially Kansas City, are very much agitated over the adverse report of Col. Herbert Deakyne, of the Engineer Corps of the Army, on the expenditure of more money to improve navigation on that river. Col. Deakyne is the Government engineer in charge. He has made his surveys and reports that it is entirely feasible to provide a 6-foot channel from the mouth of the Missouri to Kansas City and that the expense will not overrun the estimate of $20,000,000. But attached to his report as an engineer is his recommendation to the Government that further work on the Missouri be discontinued, because in his opinion the railroads are now so well regulated through the Interstate Commerce Commission that river navigation is not necessary.

What has happened as to the Missouri might happen as to any other navigable stream. Col. Deakyne might be transferred to the upper Mississippi some day and decide that there was not business enough existing or prospective to justify river improvement.

KINGMAN WASTE VERSUS COMMON SENSE.

For fear the engineers may awaken to a like farce perpetrated on the upper river near Minneapolis, we are advised Col. Deakyne will not be welcomed on the Minneapolis lock-and-dam project. This possibility need not cause idle fears. Whatever belated intelligence was exercised by Col. Deakyne in reporting what everyone on the Missouri has known for years Chief Kingman will set aside his report. That is the power and custom of Chiefs of Enginers, including especially Gen. Bixby, as disclosed by their own reports. The Missouri was pronounced of doubtful value by the 1915 bill, passed March 3, 1915.

Gen. Kingman on April 1 gave $1,000,000 for the questionable project which Col. Deakyne condemned 22 days thereafter. Is not that food for thought on the part of every disinterested man who must verify Deakyne's conclusions after glancing over the engineer's reports for recent years?

WHERE THE MONEY GOES.

To show specifically why $1,552,650 was recommended by Col. Deakyne for land-reclamation purposes in 1915, and $1,000,000 paid by Chief Kingman, I quote from page 2510, report 1914, on this 400 miles of the Missouri, along which Army engineers estimate 500,000 acres will be saved, valued at $100 to $125 per acre—land belonging to private interests deeply interested in this $20,000,000 project:

During the coming fiscal year it is proposed to carry on work with the funds for which allotments have been approved in the completion of contracts now in force and in work by day labor and Government plant, as follows:

97,500 linear feet standard revetment, at $10	$975,000
11,000 linear feet concrete revetment, at $10	110,000
21,950 linear feet 3-row standard dike, at $15	329,250
Maintenance of improvement	25,000
New plant	13,400
Snagging and repairs to plant	50,000
Surveys and superintendence	50,000

Other work will be done if appropriations are made.

This work is expected to result in greater permanence and depth of channel in the improved sections and greater ease of navigation.

APPROPRIATIONS AND ALLOTMENTS (ON THIS PRESENT PROJECT).

June 25, 1910	$1,000,000
July 25, 1912	800,000
Aug. 24, 1912	600,000
Mar. 4, 1913	2,000,000
Oct. 2, 1914	850,000
Total of appropriations	5,250,000

A $60,000,000 LAND-RECLAMATION PROJECT.

One million four hundred thousand dollars was demanded for 25 miles of revetment and diking in 1915, and $1,000,000 was given by Gen. Kingman to confine a mile-wide river in places to a 1,200-foot channel, and incidentally to reclaim private land valued at sixty-odd million dollars.

Maj. Schulz disclosed an Army engineer's secret troubles along the Missouri when he said, according to the official record—

If I get a small amount of money, $50,000 to $60,000, for that stretch of river, every locality and almost every Congressman writes for the work right on their particular spot, and there I am.

The mental strain is easier when $1,414,250 is distributed "for that stretch" annually. Schulz is gone and Deakyne, who recommended nearly a million and a half for 1915, and then recanted—he, too, is gone, banished. A half million acres is to be saved at Government expense, according to the reports. What do you think of the system?

Apart from the fact that actual commerce on the Missouri River is reported to have decreased in sympathy with the Mississippi River over 90 per cent during the past half century, it is notable that the insignificant commerce in recent years and reported for 1913 (p. 2513, 1914 report) decreased 30 per cent during the last year reported (see p. 2811, 1915 report). My analysis and comparisons have been based on the 1914 report, but from the last one just handed me I note in defense of Col. Deakyne's prophecy the following significant loss in an insignificant commerce out of over 10,000,000 tons alleged to have been handled by Kansas City in 1914:

1913	347,235
1914	240,550
Loss (30 per cent)	104,685

Actual commerce.

1913	24,000
Loss (20 per cent)	5,000

A loss of 30 per cent in officially reported commerce and of 20 per cent in actual commerce, deducting sand and flotable timber, during the last year reported is more convincing than voluminous briefs. Col. Deakyne was a prophet, although 19,000 tons, or ten times that amount, is a pitiable showing on a $20,000,000 investment during the last 30 years. Deakyne urges us to drop the $20,000,000 new project. Why not do so?

COMMERCE.(?)

I have given a full table reported by the engineers for the 1913 commerce and will give the principal items of deduction for 1914, taken from page 2811, 1915 report:

			Tons.
Total tonnage reported			240,550
Sand and gravel barged one-half mile	tons	211,421
Sand and gravel, 9 miles	do	2,286
Railroad ties rafted 18 miles	do	6,041
Railroad ties, 9 miles	do	334
Wood, 12 miles		1,091
Excluding sand, gravel, ties, and wood			19,377

It takes a courageous man to count as commerce 213,707 tons of sand barged less than a mile, but an Army engineer can do it. A significant part of this statement is that the average grain haul for 1914 was 115 miles, showing conclusively that the much-boasted grain traffic between Kansas City and St. Louis after an expenditure of over $20,000,000 is pure gammon. The distance between these cities is 400 miles in round numbers, and apparently not one ton was shipped from Kansas City to St. Louis. An insignificant amount, 5,290 tons, is reported with an average haul of 115 miles; but what under heavens permitted engineers to recommend a $35,000,000 expenditure for this river to accommodate a little local freight, hauled a few miles, when Kansas City claims it has been shipping 10,000,000 tons of commerce annually by rail? Again, an S. O. S. call for a keeper from some feeble-minded establishment is momentarily expected.

HOW MUCH IS THE COST?

I understand there is a difference in understanding as to the amount that has been expended on the Missouri River by the Government. I am free to confess that the average engineer's report is as clear and intelligible as a Chinese puzzle, but after considerable digging into ponderous records there has been reported to the River and Harbor Committee by its assistants the following items:

For general improvements	$15,450,000
Appropriated under new project	6,250,000
Balance due on new project	14,100,000
Total when the present project is completed	35,800,000

The Missouri River has cost the Government over $21,000,000, and when the present project is completed the Government will have spent $35,800,000 for that deserted river.

THIRTY-SIX MILLIONS FOR WHAT?

In support of my statement of expenditures on the Missouri River by the Government I refer to pages 2822, 2823, 2824, 2825 of the 1915 report, which shows expenditures on the Missouri to June 30, 1915, reach $19,789,104. I believe this includes several duplications, but these are the figures to which my attention has been called as the correct statement of expenditures already made on the Missouri River. To this should be added $2,236,907, balance unexpended (p. 1065, 1915 report) and $14,100,000 balance of the $20,000,000 unappropriated. If these figures are correct, the project will reach over $36,000,000, as disclosed by the tables.

Whether or not the statement is just exact, what a miserable, paltry showing is made on the river where 19,377 tons is all that was carried less than a couple of hundred miles, on the average, out of 10,000,000 tons handled at Kansas City in 1914. And what a tragic tale of waste when $19,789,104 has been poured into the rat hole by these Army engineers who, with $2,236,907 on hand, overruling Deakyne, demand $14,100,000 more for finishing the project. Is it not awful?

The only man who smiles during this war-tax-paying season is the Missourian who owns a few of those 500,000 acres, worth $60,000,000, that the Government is reclaiming.

I have not verified appropriations down to date, but in order that no misunderstanding may exist regarding the ratio of commerce decrease compared to increase in appropriations, I call attention to the fact that by a comparison of page 2668 of the Engineers' Report for 1916, it will be found that the total "commerce" on the Missouri River for 1915, the latest date obtainable, reached 216,490 tons compared with 347,235 tons in 1913, or a loss of 33 per cent, in round numbers, after two years further improvement.

THE GREAT GRAIN WATERWAY.(?)

Every speech made on the Missouri project predicts that the river will some day relieve railway congestion. If this was possible, there might be some excuse for vast expenditures, but on page 2668 of the 1916 report it appears that after spending over $20,000,000 on the Missouri River for navigation all the grain hauled in 1915 by boats and barges reached just 2,339 tons hauled 43 miles. It is 400 miles from Kansas City to St. Louis, on which section of railway systems the congestion was to be relieved, and yet after spending over $20,000,000 on the river all the grain carried in 1915 would not have filled a dozen box cars, and that was only hauled about one-tenth of the distance. Again, it is proper to say, an ounce of official statistics discredits all the eloquent pleadings for "pork" which Congress has entertained on this project year after year.

These statistics are submitted because of a desire to call a halt on waterway waste on hundreds of projects throughout the country, of which three of the most promising—the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri—are found in this bill to carry $7,350,000, for which the people will pay taxes annually on increasing rates.

MANY OTHER WASTEFUL PROJECTS.

The large rivers have returned an insignificant commerce for enormous expenditures by the Government, but before concluding this brief record of a carnival of waste carried on under the pretense of waterway improvements I desire to add several other streams that indicate insignificant commerce returns after huge investments.

On the Cumberland River, which Col. Townsend includes in his recommendation for halting present waste, Congress appropriated prior to 1917, $6,466,767. The commerce showing on the lower river, after deducting sand and gravel hauled 8 miles and logs, ties, and so forth, reached 16,354 tons in 1915, according to the engineers' reports (p. 2691). The upper-river commerce was about the same, and the average haul along the entire river was comparatively insignificant. In order to show the wisdom of Townsend's advice to stop short in this carnival of engineering extravagance, I call attention to other projects showing investments by the Government prior to 1917 and actual commerce returns, all on a par with the Cumberland River, counting average traffic throughout:

Projects.	Appropriated.	1915 actual commerce.
		Tons.
Upper Missouri	$3,234,083	487
Big Sandy, W. Va.	1,655,295	1,039
Cumberland River, Tenn.	6,466,767	16,354
Red River, Ark., below Fulton	2,874,687	14,275
Trinity, Tex.	2,492,287	1,571
Brazos, Tex.	1,990,000	.....
Arkansas, Ark.	3,823,333	12,143
Ouachita, Ark.	4,212,863	14,890
Muscle Shoals Canal, Ala.	4,032,975	7,932
Hennepin Canal, Ill.	7,657,803	7,655
Muscle Shoals Canal	4,550,000	5,887

These few "projects" have absorbed nearly $45,000,000 under the advice of Army engineers, in order to produce an aggregate actual commerce of a little more than 80,000 tons, or practically 1 per cent of the 1915 waterway commerce handled at the harbor of Ashland, Wis., on less than one-half of 1 per cent of the commerce handled at any one of several lake ports that may be named.

It is impossible in a few words to fitly describe the waste involved in the 1917 bill before us, but practically the same bill was defeated by the Senate last session, and we ought to anticipate Senate action now by squarely meeting our responsibility.

Memorial Address on Roscoe Conkling.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP P. CAMPBELL,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 13, 1917.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the memorial address on Roscoe Conkling, by Robert G. Ingersoll, delivered before the New York State Legislature at Albany, N. Y.

The address is as follows:

MEMORIAL ADDRESS ON ROSCOE CONKLING.

[By Robert G. Ingersoll, delivered before the New York State Legislature, at Albany, N. Y.]

Roscoe Conkling—a great man, an orator, a statesman, a lawyer, a distinguished citizen of the Republic, in the zenith of his fame and power has reached his journey's end, and we are met, here in the city of his birth, to pay our tribute to his worth and work. He earned and held a proud position in the public thought. He stood for independence, for courage, and, above all, for absolute integrity, and his name was known and honored by many millions of his fellow men.

The literature of many lands is rich with the tributes that gratitude, admiration, and love have paid to the great and honored dead. These tributes disclose the character of nations, the ideals of the human race. In them we find the estimates of greatness—the deeds and lives that challenged praise and thrilled the hearts of men.

In the presence of death the good man judges as he would be judged. He knows that men are only fragments—that the greatest walk in shadow, and that faults and failures mingle with the lives of all.

In the grave should be buried the prejudices and passions born of conflict. Charity should hold the scales in which are weighed the deeds of men. Peculiarities, traits born of locality and surroundings—these are but the dust of the race—these are accidents, drapery, clothes, fashions, that have nothing to do with the man except to hide his character. They are the clouds that cling to mountains. Time gives us clearer vision. That which was merely local fades away. The words of envy are forgotten, and all there is of sterling worth remains. He who was called a partisan is a patriot. The revolutionist and the outlaw are the founders of nations, and he who was regarded as a scheming, selfish politician becomes a statesman, a philosopher, whose words and deeds shed light.

Fortunate is that nation great enough to know the great. When a great man dies—one who has nobly fought the battle of life, who has been faithful to every trust, and has uttered his highest, noblest thought—one who has stood proudly by the right in spite of jeer and taunt, neither stopped by foe nor swerved by friend—in honoring him, in speaking words of praise and love above his dust, we pay a tribute to ourselves.

How poor this world would be without its graves, without the memories of its mighty dead. Only the voiceless speak forever.

Intelligence, integrity, and courage are the great pillars that support the State.

Above all, the citizens of a free nation should honor the brave and independent man—the man of stainless integrity, of will and intellectual force. Such men are the Atlases on whose mighty shoulders rest the great fabric of the Republic. Flatterers, cringers, crawlers, time servers are the dangerous citizens of a democracy. They who gain applause and power by pandering to the mistakes, the prejudices and passions of the multitude are the enemies of liberty.

When the intelligent submit to the clamor of the many anarchy begins and the Republic reaches the edge of chaos. Mediocrity, touched with ambition, flatters the base and calumniates the great, while the true patriot, who will do neither, is often sacrificed.

In a government of the people a leader should be a teacher—he should carry the torch of truth.

Most people are the slaves of habit—followers of custom—believers in the wisdom of the past; and were it not for brave and splendid souls "the dust of antique time would lie unswept, and mountainous error be too highly heaped for truth to overpeer." Custom is a prison, locked and barred by those who long ago were dust, the keys of which are in the keeping of the dead.

Nothing is grander than when a strong, intrepid man breaks chains, levels walls, and breasts the many-headed mob like some great cliff that meets and mocks the innumerable billows of the sea.

The politician hastens to agree with the majority—insists that their prejudice is patriotism, that their ignorance is wisdom; not that he loves them, but because he loves himself. The statesman, the real reformer, points out the mistakes of the multitude, attacks the prejudices of his countrymen, laughs at their follies, denounces their cruelties, enlightens and enlarges their minds, and educates the conscience—not because he loves himself, but because he loves and serves the right and wishes to make his country great and free.

With him defeat is but a spur to further effort. He who refuses to stoop, who can not be bribed by the promise of success or the fear of failure, who walks the highway of the right, and in disaster stands erect, is the only victor. Nothing is more despicable than to reach fame by crawling—position by cringing.

When real history shall be written by the truthful and the wise, these men, these kneelers at the shrines of chance and fraud, these brazen idols worshiped once as gods, will be the very food of scorn, while those who bore the burden of defeat, who earned and kept their self-respect, who would not bow to man or men for place or power, will wear upon their brows the laurel mingled with the oak.

Roscoe Conkling was a man of superb courage.

He not only acted without fear but he had that fortitude of soul that bears the consequences of the course pursued without complaint. He was charged with being proud. The charge was true—he was proud. His knees were as inflexible as the "unwedgeable and gnarled oak," but he was not vain. Vanity rests on the opinion of others; pride, on our own. The source of vanity is from without; of pride, from within. Vanity is a vane that turns, a willow that bends with every breeze; pride is the oak that defies the storm. One is cloud, the other rock. One is weakness, the other strength.

This imperious man entered public life in the dawn of the reformation—at a time when the country needed men of pride, of principle and courage. The institution of slavery had poisoned all the springs of power. Before this crime ambition fell upon its knees—politicians, judges, clergymen, and merchant princes bowed low and humbly, with their hats in their hands. The real friend of man was denounced as the enemy of his country; the real enemy of the human race was called a statesman and a patriot. Slavery was the bond and pledge of peace, of union, and national greatness. The temple of American liberty was finished; the auction block was the corner stone.

It is hard to conceive of the utter demoralization, of the political blindness and immorality, of the patriotic dishonesty, of the cruelty and degradation of a people who supplemented the incomparable Declaration of Independence with the fugitive-slave law.

Think of the honored statesmen of that ignoble time who wallowed in this mire, and who, decorated with dripping filth, received the plaudits of their fellow men. The noble, the really patriotic, were the victims of mobs, and the shameless were clad in the robes of office.

But let us speak no word of blame; let us feel that each one acted according to his light—according to his darkness.

At last the conflict came. The hosts of light and darkness prepared to meet upon the fields of war. The question was presented, Shall the Republic be slave or free? The Republican Party had triumphed at the polls. The greatest man in our history was President elect. The victors were appalled; they shrank from the great responsibility of success. In the presence of rebellion they hesitated; they offered to return the fruits of victory. Hoping to avert war, they were willing that slavery should become immortal. An amendment to the Constitution was proposed, to the effect that no subsequent amendment should ever be made that in any way should interfere with the right of man to steal his fellow men.

This, the most marvelous proposition ever submitted to a congress of civilized men, received in the House an overwhelming majority, and the necessary two-thirds in the Senate. The Republican Party in the moment of its triumph deserted every principle for which it had so gallantly contended, and with the trembling hands of fear laid its convictions on the altar of compromise.

The old guard, numbering but 65 in the House, stood as firm as the 300 at Thermopylæ. Thaddeus Stevens—as maliciously right as any other man was ever wrong—refused to kneel. Owen Lovejoy, remembering his brother's noble blood, refused to surrender, and on the edge of disunion, in the shadow of civil war, with the air filled with sounds of dreadful preparation, while the Republican Party was retracing its steps, Roscoe Conkling voted "no." This puts a wreath of glory on his tomb. From that vote to the last moment of his life he was a champion of equal right, stanch and stalwart.

From that moment he stood in the front rank. He never wavered and he never swerved. By his devotion to principle, his courage, the splendor of his diction—by his varied and profound knowledge, his conscientious devotion to the great cause, and by his intellectual scope and grasp he won and held the admiration of his fellow men.

Disasters in the field, reverses at the polls, did not and could not shake his courage or his faith. He knew the ghastly meaning of defeat. He knew that the great ship that slavery sought to strand and wreck was freighted with the world's sublimest hope.

He gladly, proudly, grasped the hands of colored men who dignity of labor, and the liberty of all. He guarded with a father's care the rights of the hunted, the hated, and despised. He attacked the savage statutes of the reconstructed States with a torrent of invective, scorn, and execration. He was not satisfied until the freedman was an American citizen, clothed with every civil right—until the Constitution was his shield, until the ballot was his sword.

And long after we are dead the colored man in this and other lands will speak his name in reverence and love. Others wavered, but he stood firm; some were false, but he was proudly true—fearlessly faithful unto death.

He gladly, proudly grasped the hands of colored men who stood with him as makers of our laws, and treated them as equals and as friends. The cry of "social equality," coined and uttered by the cruel and the base, was to him the expression of a great and splendid truth. He knew that no man can be the equal of one he robs—that the intelligent and unjust are not the superiors of the ignorant and honest—and he also felt, and proudly felt, that if he were not too great to reach the hand of help and recognition to the slave, no other Senator could rightfully refuse.

We rise by raising others, and he who stoops above the fallen stands erect.

Nothing can be grander than to sow the seeds of noble thoughts and virtuous deeds, to liberate the bodies and the souls of men, to earn the grateful homage of a race, and then in life's last shadowy hour to know that the historian of liberty will be compelled to write your name.

There are no words intense enough—with heart enough—to express my admiration for the great and gallant souls who have in every age and every land upheld the right, and who have lived and died for freedom's sake.

In our lives have been the grandest years that man has lived, that time has measured by the flight of worlds.

The history of that great party that let the oppressed go free—that lifted our Nation from the depths of savagery to freedom's cloudless heights, and tore with holy hands from every law the words that sanctified the cruelty of man—is the most glorious in the annals of our race. Never before was there such a moral exaltation—never a party with a purpose so pure and high. It was the embodied conscience of a nation. the enthusiasm of a people guided by wisdom, the impersonation of justice, and the sublime victory achieved loaded even the conquered with all the rights that freedom can bestow.

Roscoe Conkling was an absolutely honest man.

Honesty is the oak around which all other virtues cling. Without that they fall, and groveling die in weeds and dust. He believed that a nation should discharge its obligations. He knew that a promise could not be made often enough, or emphatic enough, to take the place of payment. He felt that the promise of the Government was the promise of every citizen; that a national obligation was a personal debt, and that no possible combination of words and pictures could take the place of coin. He uttered the splendid truth that "the higher obligations among men are not set down in writing signed and sealed, but reside in honor." He knew that repudiation was the sacrifice of honor—the death of the national soul. He knew that without character, without integrity, there is no wealth, and that below poverty, below bankruptcy, is the rayless abyss of repudiation. He upheld the sacredness of contracts, of plighted national faith, and helped to save and keep the honor of his native land. This adds another laurel to his brow.

He was the ideal representative, faithful and incorruptible. He believed that his constituents and his country were entitled to the fruit of his experience, to his best and highest thought. No man ever held the standard of responsibility higher than he. He voted according to his judgment, his conscience. He made no bargains—he neither bought nor sold.

To correct evils, abolish abuses, and inaugurate reforms he believed was not only the duty but the privilege of a legislator. He neither sold nor mortgaged himself. He was in Congress during the years of vast expenditure, of war and waste—when the credit of the Nation was loaned to individuals, when claims were thick as leaves in June; when the amendment of a statute, the change of a single word, meant millions, and when empires were given to corporations. He stood at the summit of his power, peer of the greatest, a leader tried and trusted. He had the tastes of a prince, the fortune of a peasant, and yet he never swerved. No corporation was great enough or rich enough to purchase him. His vote could not be bought "for all the sun sees, or the close earth wombs, or the profound seas hide." His hand was never touched by any bribe, and on his soul there never was a sordid stain. Poverty was his priceless crown.

Above his marvelous intellectual gifts, above all place he ever reached, above the ermine he refused, rises his integrity like some great mountain peak, and there it stands, firm as the earth beneath, pure as the stars above.

He was a great lawyer. He understood the framework, the anatomy, the foundations of law; was familiar with the great streams and currents and tides of authority.

He knew the history of legislation—the principles that have been settled upon the fields of war. He knew the maxims, those crystallizations of common sense, those hand grenades of argument. He was not a case lawyer—a decision index, or an echo; he was original, thoughtful, and profound. He had breadth and scope, resource, learning, logic, and, above all, a sense of justice. He was painstaking and conscientious—anxious to know the facts; preparing for every attack, ready for every defense. He rested only when the end was reached. During the contest he neither sent nor received a flag of truce. He was true to his clients, making their case his. Feeling responsibility, he listened patiently to details, and to his industry there were only the limits of time and strength. He was a student of the Constitution. He knew the boundaries of State and Federal jurisdiction, and no man was more familiar with those great decisions that are the peaks and promontories, the headlands and the beacons, of the law.

He was an orator—earnest, logical, intense, and picturesque. He laid the foundation with care, with accuracy and skill, and rose by "cold gradation and well-balanced form" from the corner stone of statement to the domed conclusion. He filled the stage. He satisfied the eye; the audience was his. He had that indefinable thing called presence. Tall, commanding, erect; ample in speech, graceful in compliment, titanic in denunciation, rich in illustration, prodigal of comparison and metaphor—and his sentences, measured and rhythmical, fell like music on the enraptured throng.

He abhorred the Pharisee, and loathed all conscientious fraud. He had a profound aversion for those who insist on putting base motives back of the good deeds of others. He wore no mask. He knew his friends; his enemies knew him.

He had no patience with pretense—with patriotic reasons for unmanly acts. He did his work and bravely spoke his thought.

Sensitive to the last degree, he keenly felt the blows and stabs of the envious and obscure—of the smallest, of the weakest—but the greatest could not drive him from conviction's field. He would not stoop to ask or give an explanation. He left his words and deeds to justify themselves.

He held in light esteem a friend who heard with half-believing ears the slander of a foe. He walked a highway of his own, and kept the company of his self-respect. He would not turn aside to avoid a foe—to greet or gain a friend.

In his nature there was no compromise. To him there were but two paths—the right and wrong. He was maligned, misrepresented, and misunderstood; but he would not answer. He knew that character speaks louder far than any words. He was as silent then as he is now, and his silence, better than any form of speech, refuted every charge.

He was an American. proud of his country, that was and ever will be proud of him. He did not find perfection only in other lands. He did not grow small and shrunken, withered and apologetic, in the presence of those upon whom greatness had been thrust by chance. He could not be overawed by dukes or lords, nor flattered into vertebrateless subserviency by the patronizing smiles of kings. In the midst of conventionalities he had the feeling of suffocation. He believed in the royalty of man, in the sovereignty of the citizen, and in the matchless greatness of this Republic.

He was of the classic mold—a figure from the antique world. He had the pose of the great statues; the pride and bearing of the intellectual Greek, of the conquering Roman, and he stood in the wide free air as though within his veins there flowed the blood of a hundred kings.

And as he lived he died. Proudly he entered the darkness—or the dawn—that we call death. Unshrinkingly he passed beyond our horizon, beyond the twilight's purple hills, beyond the utmost reach of human harm or help, to that vast realm of silence or of joy, where the innumerable dwell, and he has left with us his wealth of thought and deed—the memory of a brave, imperious, honest man, who bowed alone to death.

Political Preaching.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JEFF. McLEMORE,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 13, 1917.

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter written by the late Jeremiah S. Black on the subject of "Political preaching." And I will add, Mr. Speaker, that Justice Black, himself a very religious man, was selected by the church people to reply to the late Robert G. Ingersoll, and which he did with very great effect. His letter follows:

"POLITICAL PREACHING"—REPLY TO DR. NEVIN.

To the Rev. ALFRED NEVIN, D. D.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter addressed to me through the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin disappoints me, because I did not expect it to come in that way, and because it does not cover the subject in issue between us; but if I am silent your friends will say, with some show of reason, that you have vindicated "political preaching" so triumphantly that all opposition is confounded. I must, therefore, speak freely in reply. In doing so I mean to say nothing inconsistent with my great respect for your high character in the church and in the world. The admirable style and temper of your own communication deserve to be imitated.

I fully concede the right you claim for clergymen to select their own themes and handle them as they please. You say truly that neither lawyers nor physicians, nor any order of men, have the least authority to control you in these particulars. But you will not deny that this is a privilege which may be abused. You expressly admit that some clergymen have abused it, "and by doing so did more than any other class of men to commence and continue the late rebellion." While, therefore, we can assert no power to dictate your conduct, much less to force you, we are surely not wrong when we entreat you to impose upon yourselves those restrictions which reason and revelation have shown to be necessary for the good of the church and the safety of civil society.

I acknowledge that your commission is a very hard and broad one. You must "declare the whole counsel of God," to the end that sinners may be convinced and converts built up in their most holy faith. Truth, justice, temperance, humility, mercy, peace, brotherly kindness, charity—the whole circle of the Christian virtues—must be assiduously taught to your hearers; and if any of them be inclined to the opposite vices, you are to denounce them without fear, by private admonition, by open rebuke, or by a general delivery of the law which condemns them. You are not bound to pause in the performance of this duty because it may offend a powerful ruler or a strong political party. Nor should you shrink from it when bad men, for their own purposes, approve what you do. Elevate the moral character, enlighten the darkness, and purify the hearts of those who are under your spiritual charge at all hazards, for this is the work which your great Taskmaster has given you to do, and he will admit no excuse for neglecting it.

But this is precisely what the political preacher is not in the habit of doing. He directs the attention of his hearers away from their own sins to the sins—real or imputed—of other people. By teaching his congregation that they are better than other men he fills their hearts with self-conceit, bigotry, spiritual pride, envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness. Instead of the exhortation, which they need, to take the beam out of their own eye, he incites them to pluck the mote from their brother's. He does not tell them what they shall do to be saved, but he instructs them very carefully how they shall act for the destruction of others. He rouses and encourages to the utmost of his ability those brutal passions which result in riot, bloodshed, spoliation, civil war, and general corruption of morals.

You commit a grievous error in supposing that politics and religion are so mingled together that you can not preach one without introducing the other. Christ and his Apostles kept them perfectly separate. They announced the great facts of the Gospel to each individual whom they addressed. When these were accepted the believer was told to repent and be baptized for the remission of his sins, and afterwards to regulate his own life by the rules of a pure and perfect morality. They expressed no preference for one form of government over another. They provoked no political revolution, and they proposed no legal reforms. If they had done so, they would have flatly contradicted the declaration that Christ's kingdom was not of this world, and Christianity itself would have died out in half a century. But they accepted the relations which were created by human law, and exhorted their disciples to discharge faithfully the duties which arose out of them. Though the laws which defined the authority of husbands, parents, masters, and magistrates were as bad as human perversity could make them, yet the early Christians contented themselves with teaching moderation in the exercise of legal power, and uniformly inculcated the virtues of obedience and fidelity upon wives, children, slaves, and subjects. They joined in no clamors for or against any administration, but simply testified against sin before the only tribunal which Christ ever erected on earth—that is to say, the conscience of the sinner himself. The vice of political preaching was wholly unknown to the primitive church.

It is true Paul counseled obedience to the government of Nero, and I am aware that modern clergymen interpret his words as a justification of the doctrine that support of an existing administration is "part of their allegiance to God." Several synods and other ecclesiastical bodies have solemnly resolved something to that effect. But they forget that what Paul advised was simple submission, not active assistance, to Nero. The Christians of that day did not indorse his atrocities merely because he was "the administration duly placed in power." They did not go with him to the theater, applaud his acting, or praise him in the churches when he kidnapped their brethren, set fire to a city, or desolated a Province. Nor did they assist at his apotheosis after his death, or pronounce funeral sermons to show that he was greater than Scipio, more virtuous than Cato, and more eloquent than Cicero. Political preachers would have done this, but Paul and Peter did no such thing.

There is nothing in the Scriptures to justify the church in applying its discipline to any member for offenses purely political, much less for his mere opinion or feelings on public affairs. The clergy are without authority, as they are often without fitness, to decide for their congregation what is right or what is wrong in the legislation of the country. They are not called or sent to propagate any kind of political doctrine. The church and the state are entirely separate and distinct in their origin, their object, and the sphere of their action, insomuch that the organism of one can never be used for any purpose of the other without injury to both.

Do I, therefore, say that the Christian religion is to have no influence on the political destiny of man? Far from it. Notwithstanding the unfaithfulness of many professors, it has already changed the face of human society, and it will yet accomplish its mission by spreading peace, independence, truth, justice, and liberty, regulated by law "from the sea to the uttermost ends of the earth." But this will be accomplished only by reforming and elevating the individuals of whom society is composed, not by exasperating communities against each other; not by any alliance with the governments of the world; not by any vulgar partnership with politicians to kill and plunder their enemies.

Every time you reform a bad man and bring his character up to the standard of Christian morality you make an addition, greater or less, to that righteousness which exalteth a nation and subtract an equal sum from the sin which is a reproach to any people. Sometimes a single conversion is extremely important in its immediate effect upon the public interests of a whole nation. No doubt the acceptance of the truth by Dionysius, the Areopagite, had much to do in molding the subsequent laws and customs of Athens. The conversion of Constantine was followed by the instant abrogation of all laws which fettered the conscience. In the reign of Theodosius the people of Thessalonica rose against the Roman garrison and killed its commander. For this act of rebellion the Emperor decreed against them the curse of an indiscriminate war, in which the guilty and the innocent were confounded together in one general slaughter. His spiritual "guide, philosopher, and friend" at the time was Ambrose, archbishop of Milan, who boldly denounced his cruelty, refused to give him the sacrament, or even to administer it in his presence, compelled him to take his seat among the penitents on the portico of the church, and induced him to humble his diadem in the dust for eight months in succession. The conscience of the Emperor was thoroughly awakened; his subsequent reign was distinguished by justice and mercy, the integrity of the Empire was preserved in peace, and the great "Theodosian Code," the product of that bitter repentance, is still read and quoted for its admirable union of humanity and policy. Ambrose produced these consequences by acting in the true capacity of a Christian minister, for he reformed the criminal by a direct appeal to his own heart. A political preacher, in the same circumstances, would have inflamed the sanguinary passions of the monarch by exaggerating the treason of the Thessalonians and counseling the military execution of all who presumed to sympathize in their sufferings.

You will see, I think, the distinction I would make. A good preacher addresses the conscience of his hearers for the honest purpose of converting them from the error of their ways; a political preacher speaks to one community one party, or one sect, and his theme is the wickedness of another. The latter effects no religious purposes whatever, but the chances are ninety-nine in a hundred that he excites the bad passions of those who are present, while he slanders the absent and undefended. Both classes of preachers frequently speak upon the same or similar subjects, but they do so with different objects and aims.

I will make my meaning more clear by taking your own illustrations. You believe in the first day of the week as a Sabbath, and, so believing, your duty undoubtedly is to exhort all persons under your charge to observe it strictly; but you have no right to preach a crusade against the Jews and Seventh-day Baptists, to get intolerant laws enacted against them for keeping Saturday as a day of rest. If drunkenness be a sin which easily besets your congregation, you may warn them against it; and inasmuch as abstinence is always easier than moderation, you should advise them to taste not, touch not, and handle not; but your position gives you no authority to provoke violent hostilities against tavern keepers, liquor dealers, or distillers. If any of your hearers be ignorant or coarse enough to desire more wives than one apiece, you should certainly teach them that polygamy is the worst feature of Asiatic manners, inconsistent with Christianity, and dangerous to domestic happiness; but you can not lawfully urge them to carry fire and sword into the territory of the Mormons merely because some of the Mormons are in this respect less holy than you. If the holding of slaves or bond servants be a practical question among the members of your church, I know of nothing which forbids you to teach whatever you conscientiously believe to be true on that subject. But in a community where slavery is not only unknown but impossible, why should any preacher make it the subject of his weekly vituperation? You do not improve the religion of the slaveholder by traducing his character, nor mend the spiritual condition of your own people by making them thirst for the blood of their fellow men.

If any person, to whom the service of another is due by the laws of the State in which he lives shall need your instructions to regulate his personal conduct toward the slave, you are bound in the first place to tell him that as long as that relation exists he should behave with the utmost humanity and kindness; for this you have the clear warrant of the apostolic example and precept. In dealing with such a person you may go as much further as your own conscientious interpretation of the Bible will carry you. If you are sure that the divine law does under all circumstances make the mere existence of such a relation sinful on the part of the master, you should induce him to dissolve it by the immediate emancipation of his slaves, for that is truth to you which you believe to be true. But where is the authority for preaching hatred of those who understand the Scripture differently? What privilege can you show for exciting servile insurrection? Who gave you the right to say that John Brown was better than any other thief or murderer merely because his crimes were committed against proslavery men?

I think the minister in his pulpit discourses is forbidden to touch at all upon that class of subjects which are purely political; such, for instance, as the banking law, tariff, railroad charters, State rights, the naturalization laws, and negro suffrage. These are questions of mere political expediency; religion takes no cognizance of them, and the church has no more right to take sides upon them than the civil government has to use its legislative, judicial, or executive power for the purpose of enforcing principles wholly religious.

In short, if I am not entirely mistaken, a Christian minister has no authority to preach upon any subjects except those in which divine revelation has given him an infallible rule of faith and practice, and even upon them he must speak always for the edification of his own hearers, "rightly dividing the word of truth" so as to lead them in the way of all righteousness. When he does more than this he goes beyond his commission, he becomes a scurvy politician, and his influence is altogether pernicious.

The use of the clerical office for the purpose of propagating political doctrines under any circumstances, or with any excuse, is, in my judgment, not only without authority, but it is the highest crime that can be committed against the government of God or man. Perhaps I ought not to make this broad assertion without giving some additional reasons for it.

In the first place, it is grossly dishonest. I employ you as a minister, pay your salary, and build you a church because I have confidence in your theological doctrines, but you may be at the same time wholly unfit for my political leader. Now, you are guilty of a base fraud upon me if, instead of preaching religion, you take advantage of the position I have given you to ventilate your crude and ignorant notions on State affairs. I have asked for bread and you give me a stone; instead of the fish I bargained for, you put into my hands a serpent that stings and poisons me.

It destroys the unity of the church. There is no room for rational dispute about the great truths of Christianity, but men will never agree upon political subjects, for human government is at best but a compromise of selfish interests and conflicting passions. When you mix the two together you break the church into fragments, and, instead of "one God, one faith, and one baptism," you create a thousand warring sects and substitute the proverbial bitterness of the odium theologicum for the "charity which thinketh no evil."

No one will deny that the union of church and state is always the cause of bad government, perverted religion, and corrupt morals. I do not mean merely that legal union which exists in European countries. That is bad enough, but you have less common sense than I give you credit for if you do not see that this adulterous connection assumes the most polluting form when the church is voluntarily prostituted by her own ministers to a political party in a popular government.

The evil influence of such connections upon church and state is easily accounted for. Both of them in combination will do what either would recoil from if standing alone. A politician backed by the promise of the clergy to sustain him can safely defy honesty and trample upon the law, for, do what he may, he is assured of a clerical support here and of heaven hereafter. The clergy, on the other hand, and those who are under their influence, easily acquire the habit of praising indiscriminately whatever is done by their public men. Acting and reacting on one another, they go down together in the directions of the pit that is bottomless, and both are found to have "a strange alacrity at sinking."

No man can serve two masters faithfully, for he must hate one if he loves the other. A minister who admires and follows such men as those who have lately ruled and ruined this country must necessarily despise the character of Christ. If he glorifies the cruelty, rapacity, and falsehood of his party leaders, he is compelled, by an inflexible law of human nature, to "deny the Lord who brought him."

The experience of 15 centuries proves that political preachers are the great curse of the world. More than half the bloody wars which, at different periods, have desolated Christendom were produced by their direct instigation; and wherever they have thrust themselves into a contest commenced by others they always envenomed the strife and made it more cruel, savage, and uncompromising. The religious wars, so called, had nothing religious about them except that they were hissed up by the clergy. Look back and see if this be not true.

The Arian controversy (the first great schism) was followed by wars in which millions of lives were lost. Do you suppose the real quarrel was for the insertion or omission of filioque in that part of the creed which describes the procession of the Holy Ghost? Did a homoousian slaughter his brother because he was a homoiousian? No; it was not the difference of a diphthong, but the plunder of an empire that they fought for. It was the politics of the church, not her religion, that furnished the parties and converted men into demons.

The Thirty Years' War in Germany is often supposed to have been a fair, stand-up fight between the two leading forms of Christianity. It was not so. The religious difference was the false pretense of the political preachers for the promotion of their own schemes. There was not a man in all the Continent who would have felt himself impelled by motives merely religious to murder his brother for believing or disbelieving in transsubstantiation. If proof of this were wanting, it might be found in the fact that long before the war ended the sectarian cries were abandoned, and Catholics as well at Protestants were fighting on both sides.

It is utterly impossible to believe that the clergy of England and Scotland, if they had not been politicians, would have thought of waging bloody wars to settle questions of election and reprobation, fate, foreknowledge, free will, and other points of metaphysical theology; nor would they, apart from their politics, have encouraged and committed the other horrid crimes of which they were guilty in the name of religion.

Can you think the Irish were invaded and conquered and oppressed and murdered and robbed for centuries, merely because the English loved and believed in the Protestant religions? I suppose you know that those brutal atrocities were carried on for the purpose of giving to political preachers in England possession of the churches, cathedrals, glebelands, and titles which belonged to the Irish Catholics. The soldier was also rewarded by confiscation and plunder. The church and the state hunted in couples, and Ireland was the prey which they ran down together.

Coming to our own country, you find Massachusetts and Connecticut, in colonial times, under the sole domination of political preachers. Their treacherous wars upon the Indians for purposes wholly mercenary; their enslaving of white persons, as well as red ones, and selling them abroad, or "swapping them for blackamoors"; their whipping, imprisoning, and killing Quakers and Baptists for their conscientious opinions; and their base treatment of such men as Roger Williams and his friends will mark their government through all time as one of the cruelest and meanest that ever existed.

Political preachers have not behaved any better since the Revolution than before. About the commencement of the present century they were busy in their vile vocation all over New England, and continued it for many years. The willful and deliberate slanders habitually uttered from the pulpit against Jefferson, Madison, and the friends who supported them were a disgrace to human nature. The immediate effect of this was the Yankee plot to secede from the Union, followed by corrupt combination with a foreign enemy to betray the liberties of the country. Its remoter consequences are seen in the shameless rapacity and bitter malignity which, even at this moment, are howling for the property and blood of an unarmed and defenseless people.

You and I both remember the political preaching which ushered in and supported the reign of the Know-Nothings, Blood-Tubs, and Plug-Uglies; when Maria Monk was a saint and Joe Barker was mayor of Pittsburgh; when pulpits resounded every Sunday with the most injurious falsehoods against Catholics; when the public mind was debauched by the inculcation of hypocrisy and deception; when ministers met their political allies in sworn secrecy to plot against the rights of their fellow citizens. You can not forget what came of this—riot, murder, church-burning, lawless violence all over the land, and the subjugation of several great States to the political rule of a party destitute alike of principle and capacity.

I could easily prove that these clerical politicians, who have tied their churches to the tail of the Abolition Party, are criminals on a grander scale than any of their predecessors. But I forbear, partly because I have no time, and partly because it may, for aught I know, be a sore subject with you. I would not excite your wrath, but rather "provoke you to good works."

Apart from the general subject, there are two or three special ideas expressed in your letter from which I venture to dissent.

You think that, though a minister may speak from the pulpit on politics, he ought not to indicate what party he belongs to. It strikes me that, if he has a party, and wants to give it ecclesiastical aid or comfort, he should boldly avow himself to be what he is, so that all men may know him. Sincerity is the first of virtues. It is bad to be a wolf, but a wolf in sheep's clothing is infinitely worse.

You represent the church as an unfinished structure, and the state as its scaffolding. I think the church came perfect from the hand of its Divine Architect—built upon a rock, established, finished, complete—and everyone who comes into it by the right door will find a mansion prepared for him. It needs no scaffold. Its founder refused all connection with human governments for scaffolding or any other purpose.

You say (in substance) that, without sometimes taking political subjects, a minister is in danger of falling into a "vague, indefinite, and noncommittal style," which will do no good and bring him no respect. The gospel is not vague, indefinite, or noncommittal upon the subjects of which it takes jurisdiction, and upon them you may preach as loudly as you please. But I admit that in times of great public excitement—an important election or a civil war—men listen impatiently to the teachings of faith and repentance. A sermon which tells them to do justice, love, mercy, and walk humbly before God is not an entertainment to which they willingly invite themselves. At such a time a clergyman can vastly increase his personal consequence and win golden opinions from his audience by pampering their passions with a highly seasoned discourse on politics. The temptation to gratify them often becomes too strong for the virtue of the preacher. I fear that you yourself are yielding to it. As a mere layman I have no right to advise a doctor of divinity, but I hope I am not overpresumptuous when I warn you against this specious allurement of satan. All thoughts of putting the gospel aside because it does not suit the depraved tastes of the day and making political harangues to win popularity in a bad world should be sternly trampled down as the suggestions of that evil one "who was a liar and a murderer from the beginning."

Faithfully, yours, etc.,

The Food Situation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. H. LaGUARDIA,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 13, 1917.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I desire to include a résumé of the food situation containing statistics and data pertaining to this very important question. This information has been gathered and collated by the committee on the high cost of living, of which Mr. Charles H. Ingersoll is chairman, and Benjamin C. Marsh, executive secretary. The committee numbers among its members men who are authorities on the subject and who have actual knowledge of the situation and are directly concerned with the raising and growing of food, as well as men and women who are directly connected with its distribution and consumption.

Inasmuch as this House is about to take up the food-control bill, I believe that the information contained in this paper will be of interest and useful to the Members in the consideration of that bill.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE FOOD SITUATION.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE HIGH COST OF LIVING.

An inquiry into the prices and supply of food and foodstuffs will necessarily include ascertaining whether hoarders and distributors thereof are making too large profits, and, if so, what measures are necessary to prevent such unpatriotic, because antisocial, action.

Such inquiry must also ascertain:

1. What the prospective food needs of this country and of our allies and others dependent upon us will be during the present year and in the ensuing two or three years.

2. Whether if the method of distribution were perfected, our method of production is such as to ensure an adequate food supply at prices within the resources of the working people of this and other countries to which we should export food.

We urge that it be considered whether it would not be more economical from the broadest point of view of the nations battling to secure democracy, to have this country chiefly contribute money and food at reasonable prices, which exclude profits to any monopoly, so as to release more of the trained men of our allies for fighting. In much of England, France, and Italy the law of diminishing returns in agriculture is apparent because of the necessity of intensive farming. It involves a larger outlay of man power per unit of food production in those countries than in the United States, with our vast areas of practically unscratched, but fertile land.

The Secretary of Agriculture in a bulletin issued in April stated: "The American farmer has long shown his ability to produce more food per man and at lower cost per unit than any other farmer in the world, but he has never had to do his best. He needs to do his best now."

The conservation of men in producing food is as essential as the conservation of men in fighting.

We wish to demonstrate to the commission that our present methods of production are utterly inefficient and wasteful, and that whatever methods of distribution may be adopted, and however effectively the middleman's profits may be reduced, the consumer of farm products will be paying too high a price—even though the farmer makes practically no profit—if that price includes, as to-day, enormous unearned profits to speculators in farm lands. The cause of too high prices for farm products is also the cause of small crops.

From present indications and estimates as to the food supply of the world the nations of Europe would be glad to buy from us 600,000,000 to 700,000,000 bushels of grain, even if the war should be ended this year, and nearly that amount annually if it should continue for two or three years. We may say that there is no danger of our producing too much foodstuffs in this country for at least two or three years.

SOME FACTS REGARDING FARMS AND FARMERS IN THE UNITED STATES.

1. LESS THAN THREE-FIFTHS OF THE LAND IN FARMS IS IMPROVED.

In 1910 only a little over half of the land in farms in the United States was improved—478,451,750 acres out of a total of 878,798,325 acres. In 1910 the proportion of land in farms improved was 10.8 per cent less in the New England States and 4.8 per cent less in the Middle Atlantic States than in 1900.

The increase in the acreage of improved land in farms during the decade was only 63,953,263, or 15.4 per cent.

There are about 350,000,000 acres of idle land in the farms of the United States to-day.

2. THE SELLING PRICE OF FARM LAND IS INCREASING VERY RAPIDLY.

In the decade 1900 to 1910 the selling price of farm land in the United States increased from $13,475,674,169 to $28,475,674,169, or 118.1 per cent.

The Secretary of Agriculture reported April, 1916: "The value of farm lands in the United States is estimated at $45.55 per acre, compared with $36.23 four years ago. The census reported the value of lands in 1910 as $32.40, and in 1900 as $15.57 per acre."

This increase is not due to the activity of the owners alone, but to the higher prices secured and the work done by the tillers. Tenant farmers, nearly half of the total, not only do not secure any of the increase in the value of land they use, but have to pay higher rent as a result of their industry.

3. MONOPOLY OF FARM LANDS IS VERY MARKED.

Nineteen per cent of the farm land in the United States, or about 170,000,000 acres was in 1910 in tracts of 1,000 acres or over, and 9½ per cent was in tracts of 500 to 999 acres, about 85,000,000 acres, a total of approximately 255,000,000 acres.

There were such holdings in every State in the Union. There are many tracts of 200,000 acres to over 1,000,000 acres.

4. TENANT FARMERS ARE IN A DEPLORABLE CONDITION.

The United States Commission on Industrial Relations reports: "More than four-fifths of the area of the large holdings is being kept out of active use by their 50,000 owners, while 2,250,000 farmers are struggling for a bare existence on farms of less than 50 acres.

5. FARMERS NOW PAY VERY HIGH PRICES OR RENT FOR FARM LANDS.

The Department of Agriculture in its April, 1916, bulletin gives the following average value per acre of farm lands in 1916, exclusive of improvements, for various sections of the country: North Atlantic, $36.71; South Atlantic, $23.79; North Central, east of the Mississippi River, $74.95; North Central, west of the Mississippi River, $59.68; South Central, $24.09; and far Western, $58.40; for the United States, $45.55.

The average cost of a 100-acre farm, exclusive of any improvements, is, therefore, from $2,379 to $7,495. Relatively few farms that are fertile, equipped with buildings, and accessible to markets, can be purchased for less than $2,500, while if the value of farm land and farm improvements increased as rapidly from 1910 to 1917 as from 1900 to 1910 the average value of a farm, land and buildings alone, is now about $7,121.

It is true that there are nearly 280,000,000 acres of free public land, but most of it is arid or rocky and not available for farming without large outlay of capital. To use even the farms on which irrigation works must be provided requires a large outlay. Prof. Elwood Mead, a recognized authority on farm management, rural credits, etc., and a member of the State Commission on Colonization and Rural Credits of California, stated last December before the Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives:

"Experience has shown that to reclaim desert public lands, including payment for the water right, will cost from $100 to $150 an acre. The following estimate is regarded as a low average for 50 acres:

Leveling land, building checks and small ditches	$2,000
House and barn	1,000
Live stock and implements	1,000
Living expenses, one year	500
Taxes, operation, and maintenance—charges and incidentals	200
Initial payment on water right	100
Dairy herd of 15 cows or other live stock to eat fodder crops	1,500
Total	6,300

"To this must be added the remaining payments of the water right, which will be between $40 and $50 an acre.

"While all this money will be needed, settlers who are willing to face hardships and self-denial can start with less. Half the land could be left unleveled. The dairy herd could be cut down to 10 cows. At a sacrifice of comfort the cost of the house could be reduced, but all these reductions mean loss of income and entail added risk, hardship, and privation. They do not make for efficiency, economy, or any early development of the project or the prosperity of the settler. It is possible that a majority of settlers having industry and thrift who could bring $5,000 cash would succeed, but what is the prospect of the settler who brings $2,000, the average capital of the past? He will need money, but in many cases he will not be able to borrow it locally. When it comes to borrowing money from a distance, the security which a settler can offer can not be considered satisfactory. The government of the canal company or the irrigation district holds a first mortgage on the land to secure payment for a water right. In its wild state this land has no productive value, and if the settler has not money enough of his own to put it in condition for cultivation, he has no commercial security to offer. Settlers depend largely on friends in the East for money borrowed. Where loans are made locally the interest rates are high and the time short."

6. A LARGE PROPORTION OF FARM LAND IN THE BEST FARMING STATES IS UNIMPROVED.

In 1910 the proportion of land in farms not improved was: In New York, 32.6 per cent; New Jersey, 29.9 per cent; Pennsylvania, 31.8 per cent; Ohio, 20.2 per cent; Indiana, 20.5 per cent; Illinois, 13.8 per cent; Michigan, 32.2 per cent; Wisconsin, 43.5 per cent; Minnesota, 29 per cent; Iowa, 12.1 per cent; Missouri, 28.9 per cent; North Dakota, 28 per cent; South Dakota, 39.2 per cent; Nebraska, 36.9 per cent; Kansas, 31.1 per cent; Virginia, 49.4 per cent; West Virginia, 44.9 per cent.

The number of acres of unimproved land in farms in these 17 States was, in 1910: New York, 7,186,321 acres; New Jersey, 770,521 acres; Pennsylvania, 5,913,313 acres; Ohio, 4,877,738 acres; Indiana, 4,368,571 acres; Illinois, 4,474,614 acres; Michigan, 6,108,536 acres; Wisconsin, 9,092,454 acres; Minnesota, 8,032,290 acres; Iowa, 4,439,481 acres; Missouri, 10,010,062 acres; North Dakota, 7,971,558 acres; South Dakota, 10,189,684 acres; Nebraska, 14,239,444 acres; Kansas, 13,480,732 acres; Virginia, 9,625,578 acres; West Virginia, 4,504,685 acres; a total of 125,285,590 acres, or about 14.2 per cent of the total of 878,798,325 acres in farms in the United States that year

In 1916 the estimated value of farm land per acre in those States, exclusive of any improvements, was: New York, $42; New Jersey, $55; Pennsylvania, $41; Ohio, $67; Indiana, $78; Illinois, $106; Michigan, $42; Wisconsin, $62; Minnesota, $54; Iowa, $125; Missouri, $50; North Dakota, $29; South Dakota, $47; Nebraska, $62; Kansas, $45; Virginia, $28; West Virginia, $27.

THE FUNDAMENTAL CAUSE OF HIGH PRICES FOR FARM PRODUCE WITHOUT FAIR PROFITS TO FARMERS.

Hoarding of food supplies, manipulation of food prices by speculators, and extortionate charges of poor service can be stopped in a short time. The continuing cause of high prices for food without fair profit to farmers is our system of taxation, which encourages holding farm land and all other land idle for speculation, and to enable the owner to secure the increase in the value of land due to industry and the growth of population. The semi or near urban farm land within a radius of 25 miles of great cities like New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Cleveland, though only a small proportion of the acreage of the States, represents a large proportion of the value of all the farm lands of the State, while the value of improvements on such land is usually only a small part of the value of the land itself. Most of this land is held idle, though it could raise an appreciable supply of garden truck for the cities near by.

The total net ground rent or potential ground rent of the farm land of the United States, calculated at only 5 per cent on the value, is approximately $2,105,000,000.

While it is true that a large part—perhaps one-third, or at least one-fourth—of the value of farm land is not being used, and is therefore not producing any revenue currently, yet the increase in the selling price of the land accrues to the owner ultimately. All this land could be producing some revenue currently were it used, and the responsibility for holding it idle rests upon the owner. His conduct is antisocial, and in the present food emergency must be stigmatized as unpatriotic.

If the relative value of farm land in each State is this year even approximately what it was in 1910 the owners of farm land in 13 States—one-fourth of the total number—New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Texas, and California—receive over two-thirds of this total net ground rent from farm lands in the United States, or approximately $1,400,000,000.

There were in 1910 in these 13 States 2,673,681 farms, of which 646,936 comprised over 174 acres; 27,116, 1,000 acres or over. A large proportion of the acreage of farm land in each of these States was held in large tracts, few of which were then, and in all probability are now, thoroughly, hence economically, used.

The value of these large holdings, running up to several million acres, owned by Lux & Miller in California, and many of them ranging from 100,000 to 500,000 acres, and the value of the suburban land classified as farm land, in these States aggregate a large proportion of the value of farm lands, most of it concentrated in a few owners, who secure most of the ground rent.

On a small farm used as such the bare land value represents only a small part of the total value of farm property. The census for 1910, which does not give the complete facts, because in many States there are many country estates of 5 to 50 acres with very valuable improvements and equipment classified as farms, shows that the proportion of land improved steadily decreases as the size of the farm increases, and that land values represent an increasing proportion of the value of all farm property on farms of large acreage, being over three-quarters of the total value of farms of over 500 acres, and nearly three-quarters of the total of farms containing from 175 to 499 acres. The following table shows these facts:

TABLE A.

	Number of farms.	Per cent.	Acreage.	Per cent of farm land.	Acreage improved.	Per cent.	Value of farm land.	Per cent of land value.	Value of all farm property.	Per cent land value constitutes of total value of farm property.

The relatively large proportion which land constitutes of the total value of farm-land property of farms up to 99 acres—approximately one-half—has already been explained to be due to the value of small farms and country estates.

The present tax rate on land values does not average over 1.25 per cent—it is probably nearer 1 per cent—but if estimated at 1.25 per cent, the total agricultural or farm ground rent secured for the maintenance of government by a direct tax, State and local, does not exceed $525,000,000—it is probably nearer $425,000,000—while the net ground rent is, as shown above, about $2,105,000,000.

The total current cost of government—National, State, and local—is this year approximately $4,800,000,000, if the press reports be correct, owing to the extraordinary expenditures for war, and the ordinary current cost is only about $3,000,000,000.

The present selling price of urban land is approximately $30,000,000,000; the total net ground rent thereof, calculated at 5 per cent, is $1,500,000,000. The tax rate on full land values exceeds 2 per cent in only a few cities, like New York; in most cities it is 1.5 per cent or less. The total ground rent secured from urban land by a direct tax on land values for State and local government does not exceed $400,000,000, and is probably much less.

The current cost of government in the United States for the year 1917—approximately $4,800,000,000—is to be raised substantially as follows:

Taxes on land values	$825,000,000
Personal taxes on incomes, National and State	750,000,000
Excess-profits taxes	500,000,000
Corporation income taxes, National and State	250,000,000
Inheritance taxes, State	45,000,000
Taxes on labor and the products of labor, such as taxes on buildings, improvements, live stock, machinery, bank stock, mortgages, food, clothing, stamp, and excise taxes	2,430,000,000
Total	4,800,000,000

Economists agree that all taxes, except taxes on land values, incomes, and inheritances can be shifted to the user of the article or the service taxed. Taxes on excess profits are a form of income tax.

To meet the cost of government this year, a cost which will be greatly increased next year, it is proposed to raise approximately $2,500,000,000 through taxes which must be paid by every family in the country, and which averages nearly $25 per capita, or $150 for a family of six, while reducing the exemption for the income tax to $800, as is done in Wisconsin for the State tax, and to $1,500 or $2,000 as is suggested for the Federal income tax, will compel many families to contribute even more.

Under our existing system of indirect taxes farmers, both owners of small farms and tenant farmers, will be hit very hard by the war. A few illustrations will suffice to demonstrate this.

A farmer who owns a small farm of 50 acres, worth with equipment, live stock, etc., $5,000, pays on the average about $75 to $100 a year taxes for local and State purposes.

Of the $3,000,000,000, which is the least the Federal Government must now secure annually by current taxation, about $1,500,000,000 will be secured by taxes on incomes, personal and corporate, and on excess profits, and the same sum by indirect taxes. This means an average per family contribution of about $75.

Indirect taxes are more costly to the ultimate consumer than direct taxes because the person who advances them always adds a profit thereon, which is always paid by the ultimate consumer. The tax burden of the average small farm owner, under war conditions, will be therefore from $175 to $200.

The condition of the tenant farmer is even worse. If the value of the farm and buildings he rents is only $3,000, he pays at 6 per cent $180 a year rent, or the equivalent in crops on the share system. The Federal taxes will also cost him $75 to $100 a year—a total of $250 to $280.

ADVANTAGES OF TAXING LAND VALUES INSTEAD OF LABOR VALUES.

If instead of taxing labor and the products of labor, Government should levy a tax of 5 per cent upon the full value of urban and agricultural land, $3,600,000,000 revenue would be secured with the utmost advantage to everyone except the few landowners, urban and agricultural, who now secure, or prevent others from securing, ground rent from the land they own.

Ricardo, in "Principles of Political Economy and Taxation," says: "A tax on rent would affect rent only; it would fall wholly on landlords, and could not be shifted." Prof. E. R. A. Seligman, in "Incidence of Taxation," states: "The incidence of the ground tax, in other words, is on the landlord * * *. The tax simply diminishes his profits."

The following would be among the chief advantages:

First. All taxes on labor and the products of labor, aggregating about $2,430,000,000, would be removed.

Second. The tenant farmers would be relieved of the more than $1,000,000,000 ground rent which they pay annually now to the owners of farms which tenants operate directly.

Third. The cost of food would be reduced by the saving in ground rent for farm land paid the owners of farm land, or the income secured by such owners before they regard the business as profitable. The prices for food products would be reduced without diminishing the net earned profits of farmers, by about $2,000,000,000—nearly four-fifths of the value of the corn and wheat crops of the country last year.

The ground rent of an acre of land selling for $50 calculated at 6 per cent is only $3. The ground rent of an acre selling for $300 on the same basis is $18. The same crop may be produced on each acre. If that crop is 40 bushels of wheat, for which the farmer gets $1.25 per bushel or $50, the ground rent in the first case amounts to only 6 per cent of the value of the product, in the second place it amounts to 36 per cent of the value of the product—nearly two-fifths. The difference makes farming unprofitable and always makes the price of food on a commercial basis higher to the consumer without any benefit to anyone except the owner of the land who reaps what he has not sown.

4. The farmer who owns his small farm, instead of paying direct and indirect taxes of about $175 to $200 a year, would pay on a farm valued at $5,000 only about $75, as the land represents only approximately one-quarter of the total value of the farm property as a whole.

5. The tenant farmer on the average small farm would similarly find that the cost of government to him would be reduced by $125 to $150 a year.

6. More intensive and economic use of land would be insured by taxing it more heavily, as suggested. The Secretary of Agriculture recently stated that only about 12 per cent of the farm land under cultivation in the United States was producing all which it is capable of producing.

7. The acquisition of farms with corresponding improvement of the status of the workers would be facilitated. The report of the Department of Agriculture on the census of 1910 states:

"It will be seen (from tables presented) that, at least since 1880, and probably even earlier, farms operated by tenants have increased in number faster than those operated by their owners. Tenant farms constituted 25.6 per cent of all farms in 1880, 28.4 per cent in 1890, 35.3 per cent in 1900, and 37 per cent in 1910. During the 30 years from 1880 to 1910 the number of tenant farms increased 1,330,075, or 129.8 per cent, while farms operated by their owners and by managers increased 1,022,520, or 34.3 per cent.

"The change indicated by these figures is what might be expected. In a new country, where land can be obtained cheaply, or even obtained from the Government without cost, it is but natural that most persons who wish to conduct agricultural operations should become owners of land. As the country becomes more settled, and as free land disappears and the values of land rise, it becomes increasingly difficult to acquire land, while, conversely, those who have already acquired it often find it possible to cease active labor and obtain an income by leasing their land to others, or prefer to enter some other occupation, but to retain their land as an investment."

8. The increase in selling price of farm land, largely speculative, would be stopped. This increase amounts to $1,500,000,000 or more annually and is a waste and impediment to the country's development, constituting a direct liability on industry instead of increasing the wealth of the country.

9. The money that is now loaned to enable producers to acquire farms would be released from such unproductive investment and made available for real, productive investment or for Government loans.

That this proposal is not theoretical or academic is shown by the fact that many farmers' organizations have recommended it. At their annual session, June, 1916, the Washington State Grange adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Washington State Grange, That this body go on record as favoring the adoption of a system of taxation whereby personal property and all improvements would be exempt from taxation and the burden of taxation be borne by land values only."

In order to really solve the food problem land must be free for use, and this can be done only by the Government taking most of the ground rent, thereby enabling it to remit taxes now hampering and limiting production.

Effective action to prevent speculation in farm lands and to compel owners of large or small tracts now held idle to use their land by taxing land values heavily and untaxing improvements and other products of labor must be taken by the States because of the provision of the Federal Constitution prohibiting Congress from levying any capitation or other direct tax except according to population.

The following 28 States can, at the next session of their legislatures, amend their tax systems and bring about this change completely, or by transferring most of the taxes now levied on improvements and other labor products by land values can materially improve the situation and help solve the food problem: Alabama, Arizona, California, Connecticut, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, New Jersey, New Hampshire, New York, North Dakota, Oklahoma Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee, Vermont, Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

Most of these States have a regular session of the legislature next January. The governor of every one of them, recognizing the seriousness of our food problem, can summon the legislatures in special session to enact such legislation.

They could also levy a special tax upon land values to meet the need for additional revenue for the war, and such action would indicate highest patriotic motives, not only from a fiscal, but as well from an economic point of view.

The importance of forcing all farm land in these 28 States into full productive use at once is evident from the figures of the last census. The total acreage in farms in these States was 430,815,650 acres, while of this only 250,875,988 acres were improved, while 179,939,662 acres were unimproved.

These 28 States contained 49 per cent of the land in farms in the United States, and 44 per cent of the unimproved land in farms, including much of the most fertile land—particularly in some of the Western States.

Of the 3,260,376 farms in these States, 1,119,285 were operated, in 1910, by tenants, with a total acreage of 109,456,334 acres.

The value of farm property in these States was, in 1910, $22,234,233,947 distributed as follows: Land, $15,086,272,974; improvements, $3,754,414,797; live stock, $2,630,537,782; implements and machinery, $763,008,394. Value of farm property on farms operated by tenants in these States was $5,582,849,318; of the land of such farms, $4,197,018,502. Of course, these values have increased materially during the past seven years

It is evident that the unimproved land in these 28 States forms a considerable acreage, and that the complete utilization of this land and of all farm land in these States can be achieved through the proposed change in the tax system, which would materially improve the food situation in the United States within a year.

The Susan B. Anthony Amendment.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 16, 1917.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a resolution by the members of the Centennial Chapter, No. 58, Order of the Eastern Star, of Colorado Springs, in favor of the Susan B. Anthony amendment.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the United States having entered into an international war to fight for "democracy," and also for "the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments," it is imperative that we first establish democracy in our own country by giving political freedom to our women citizens; and

Whereas women are now being called to aid the Government in the prosecution of war in defense of the Nation's interests, and without their aid and patriotism this war could not be conducted: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of Centennial Chapter, No. 58, O. E. S., of Colorado Springs, Colo., urge a prompt and favorable report by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives of the Susan B. Anthony amendment and immediate passage of that amendment as a war measure during this session of Congress.

Resolved also, That a copy of this resolution be sent to EDWIN Y. WEBB, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and to the President, Speaker CLARK, the Vice President, Senator JACOB H. GALLINGER, Senator THOMAS S. MARTIN, Representative CLAUDE KITCHIN, Representative JAMES R. MANN, and to the Colorado delegation, with the request to Representative TIMBERLAKE, of the House, and to Senator SHAFROTH, of the Senate, that the resolution be read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Waterways and War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 13, 1917.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, an address by Brig. Gen. William M. Black, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, at St. Louis, Tuesday, May 8, last, is so pertinent to the question of the utilization of water ways in times of war that I believe it will be helpful to Members in the consideration of the pending river and harbor bill. Gen. Black attended the St. Louis conference by direct request of the Secretary of War.

What he had to say about the value of our inland waterways at the present time, therefore, may be regarded as coming with authority from the head of the War Department:

ADDRESS OF BRIG. GEN. WILLIAM M. BLACK, CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY, AT ST. LOUIS, TUESDAY, MAY 8, 1917.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is to me a very great honor to appear before you this morning, appearing, as I do, with a message from the National Government in a time of great emergency. I have met many of you before. I have been at various points on our interior waterways. I have been at various of the conventions of those interested in waterways. You have never seen me in this costume before, and yet I am here to-day in this costume for a purpose, by the direct request of the Secretary of War. I am going to address you on exactly the subject for which you have come together. I am going to talk of the same thing of which we have talked before together, but I am doing it now to-day under an entirely different object. I am going to address you on this subject to-day that you have at heart and that you want to foster, not only because it is necessary commercially, but it is necessary to our Nation to-day as a war measure. [Prolonged applause.] And, being a war measure, it is fitting and proper that I should come in my uniform, as a representative of the military arm of the Government.

Our country is at war. It is participating in a war unexampled in the history of the ages for the magnitude of the armies, for the world-wide limits of the fighting nations, for unparalleled potencies of the destructive agencies employed, for the areas of conflict—on the earth's surface, in the air, on the water, and under the water—and for such a complete utilization of all of the resources of the belligerent peoples as has never been dreamed of in the past. No longer does the actual war affect only the armies engaged—noncombatants, men, women, and children, have been ruthlessly destroyed or compelled to turn all their bodily powers to combatant uses.

We have entered into the war for the defense of the laws painfully evolved through centuries for the purpose of mitigating the horrors of war, for the defense of the principles of equal opportunity for all men, for the defense of the rights of the weak to live and enjoy their own, even though that "own" may be coveted by the powerful—and, in truth, to the end that nations "of the people, for the people, and by the people shall not perish from the earth."

WE WERE UNPREPARED FOR WAR.

Our enemy has long prepared for this struggle by every means which could be devised and with wonderful ingenuity and wisdom. We are unprepared, not only in a strictly military sense, but also economically. No war has reached our shores, no fighting force of the United States is facing the enemy, yet food has become scarce and dear, and largely increased prices are asked for all articles which enter into our daily needs. If this be true to-day, how much worse may be our case when the effects of war are brought more nearly home to us—when we are doing our full part in the struggle for humanity, and our own men must be drawn from the pursuits of peace and be engaged actively in the war which has been forced upon us.

REMEDY: COOPERATE FOR THE COMMON GOOD.

The remedy is neither novel nor difficult. If we all but work together to a common end—the good of the Nation—difficulties will be smoothed away and the Nation's strength can be exerted for the right without undue stress. This means organization for cooperation in all lines of our activities.

One of the results of advancing civilization is the decrease of the independence of communities. More and more each becomes dependent on the other. Greater and greater becomes the necessity for full and free intercommunication, and thus the subject of transportation becomes of increased and increasing importance; the organization and cooperation of all of the means of transportation becomes essential.

Your movement to promote a revival of river traffic comes when it is publicly well known that the railroads of our country are exceedingly congested, with consequent delay in delivering much-needed freight, and with a resulting enormous increase in the cost of food and materials. This increase in cost bears with particular hardship upon the ultimate consumer, and involves loss to the producers who find themselves unable to get their goods to market at the time of most urgent demand. It is reported by the railroads that on the 1st of February there was a shortage of 110,000 freight cars, which by March 1 had grown to over 120,000, and on April 1 it had become over 145,000. Assuming an average load of about 20 tons, this represents nearly 3,000,000 tons of freight-car capacity needed by the business interests of this country in excess of that now available.

REVIVAL OF WATER TRAFFIC A PATRIOTIC DUTY.

In view of the present emergency in our national existence it is a patriotic duty to cooperate to our utmost in relieving this stringency. Any success which your conference may have in reviving river traffic will contribute toward assuring the efficiency of the purposes, both military and naval, to which our Government is now bending its every effort.

To illustrate: It is well known to you that the United States Shipping Board is about to embark upon a plan for constructing seagoing vessels, which, due to the condition of the steel business, the board believes can be built much more rapidly of timber than of steel. It therefore becomes urgently necessary to insure prompt deliveries of sawmill products, and yet on indisputable authority it is known that one of the largest sawmills in the South, situated but a short distance from New Orleans, now has stored in its yards nearly 100,000,000 feet board measure of lumber, which has accumulated in this enormous quantity simply because of a lack of cars to ship it, so that at a time when it is most desirable that this sawmill and others of corresponding importance shall remain in operation the owners of this property are seriously considering a suspension of operations with a resultant dislocation of its working forces. Such a situation could not have come into existence had it been economically possible to ship this material—most of which is destined for the North—by way of New Orleans up the Mississippi, with perhaps a transfer by rail to its ultimate destination from the river terminal point at the north end of the line. Similarly, a prominent miller from Detroit, Mich., recently testified before the Agricultural Committee of the United States Senate that the grain shortage, which has recently lead to such an enormous advance in the price of flour, was due largely to insufficient transportation facilities, and that he had knowledge that grain actually existed in the hands of farmers who were unable to get it to market. The result is, as you know, that the price of wheat and flour have reached points unknown in our history since the close of the Civil War. Corresponding conditions probably exist at many points where relief could be afforded by an effective use of our internal waterways, and it is therefore desirable to consider in what form preferably the movement for the revival of river traffic shall be organized, the agency through which the necessary steps shall be taken, and the best program under which the entire problem shall be treated.

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

The emergency which confronts our Government and which must be met affords an opportunity for patriotic service which is directly in line with your desires. The good which you can do in reorganizing and reviving the commerce of the Mississippi River and its tributaries can be made a national asset of increased value by coordinating your work with that of others. Fortunately an agency for this purpose actually exists, having been brought into being by the legislation incorporated in section 2 of the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes. This section of the above act establishes a Council of National Defense "for the coordination of industries and resources for the national security and welfare." The council consists of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, and it is authorized to nominate to the President an advisory commission, consisting of not more than seven persons, "each of whom shall have special knowledge of some industry, public utility, or the development of some natural resource, or be otherwise specially qualified" for making investigations and recommendations concerning:

* * * the location of railroads with reference to the frontier of the United States so as to render possible expeditious concentration of troops and supplies to points of defense; the coordination of military, industrial, and commercial purposes in the location of extensive highways and branch lines of railroads; the utilization of waterways; the mobilization of military and naval resources for defense; the increase of domestic production of articles and materials essential to the support of armies and of the people during the interruption of foreign commerce; the development of seagoing transportation; data as to amounts, location, method and means of production, and availability of military supplies; the giving of information to producers and manufacturers as to the class of supplies needed by the military and other services of the Government, the requirements relating thereto, and the creation of relations which will render possible in time of need the immediate concentration and utilization of the resources of the Nation.

The council is further authorized to "organize subordinate bodies for its assistance in special investigations, either by the employment of experts or by the creation of committees of specially qualified persons."

The advisory commission of the Council of National Defense has been duly organized and one of its seven members is charged with all matters pertaining to transportation and communications. This member is Mr. Daniel Willard, the president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and he has organized his branch of this work by the designation of a number of committees, each dealing with some separate phase of the problems involved in transportation and communication. There is one such committee on railroads and another on steamships, but up to the present time, unfortunately, no committee on internal waterways has been organized. It is my belief that such a committee, serving under the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, is the suitable and appropriate agency, by means of which the revival of traffic upon our rivers should be furthered and this traffic so coordinated with that of the railways as to produce the maximum benefits to the Nation.

On April 14 I submitted to the Secretary of War the following memorandum, which is sufficiently pertinent to justify quoting it in full:

UTILIZATION OF WATERWAYS.

Memorandum by the Chief of Engineers for the Secretary of War, on utilization of waterways as an element of national transportation service.

It is understood that much thought is being given by the Advisory Commission for National Defense to such coordination of railroad transportation systems as will afford the most efficient transportation service to meet the public and private needs which have been gravely threatened by congestion, car shortage, etc. It does not appear, in so far as these matters have come to my attention, that much, if any, consideration has been given to the possibility of coordinating waterway means of transportation with rail service. There is available, for instance, from St. Louis to New Orleans a channel that could be made very efficient in handling traffic that now requires the service of many cars on the north and south rail lines serving that general region. Similarly, on the Hudson River from Troy and Albany to New York there is an almost unlimited capacity for movement of freight by water which might be developed so as to relieve the great congestion of the railroad terminals at New York. These are instances of numerous places where advantage might be taken of water transportation to a greater or less extent in order to relieve the railroads of a part of their burden.

It is not known to what extent boats already in existence could be made to serve traffic diverted in this way from the rail lines. Any considerable movement of this character would doubtless require the construction of many additional barges suited for such traffic. Fortunately, these boats are of comparatively simple construction and can be rapidly built if the Government and private boat yards are fully utilized for this purpose. In fact, these barges could be built at innumerable points along the streams and launched without accumulation of expensive machinery or plant, as it is practically a question of supplying the relatively simple materials and the labor required in actual construction of the boats. Tonnage capacity can doubtless be created by such barge construction much more rapidly than by car construction.

It is suggested that consideration be given to this phase of the question by those who are engaged in the task of increasing the efficiency of our general transportation service.

W. M. BLACK,
Brigadier General, Chief of Engineers.

You will perceive, therefore, that the matter which your conference was called to consider has been in my mind for some time and that I personally was doing my utmost to procure action.

TOWBOATS AND BARGES TO BE LISTED.

In advance of the appointment of this committee, a first step which you can take is to list all the available towboats and barges of the Mississippi River and its tributaries with sufficient detail concerning each to show its condition, location, capacity, ownership, and peculiar availability. A corresponding enumeration should be made of all the boat-building facilities of their waterways and this should, with reference to each boat-building establishment, give all the details necessary to permit an estimate to be formed of the rate at which towboats and barges can be constructed. As my contribution to this general end, I am prepared to give corresponding information concerning all Government boats and boat-building establishments in the same territory. The next step should be a study of the territory which these waterways serve or can be made to serve and an estimate, as closely as can be made, as to the quantities of commodities now being carried by the various lines of railroads paralleling these waterways which can with equal advantage be carried upon the waterways themselves, and a final estimate of the approximate number of cars that will thereby be released for use elsewhere. Finally, definite plans should be worked out for utilizing the existing towboats and barges and for supplementing them by as many as may be necessary under a definite plan for relieving the railroads of the traffic just referred to.

REESTABLISHING THE WATERWAYS.

Undoubtedly the question of reestablishing the waterways is one that will involve considerable difficulty as to details, particularly in regard to the making of joint traffic arrangements with connecting railroads at the various terminal points. The situation in this regard has not in the past been satisfactory or equitable, since it is well known that hitherto the railroads have been permitted to make rates which in one way or another discriminated against the waterways, although not always against communities situated on those waterways. Thus the practice, so common, of charging less for a rail haul along a waterway than for one of corresponding length to interior points has had the natural effect of diverting traffic from the waterways because, in part at least, it neutralized the superior economy of the waterway, which therefore had correspondingly less to offer as compensation for the inconvenience and expense of the terminal truck hauls that have accompanied the shipment of freight on one of our rivers. Similarly railroads have refused to receive and distribute freight for water lines, and in accepting transfers of freight from them they have refused to make through bills of lading and to favor the water lines with the same charges that prevail when freight is transferred to them over other rail lines. A quotation from an address delivered by Mr. Edward F. Murray, president of the Merchants' Line, of Troy, before the New York State Waterways Association on October 5, 1916, is a definite illustration of the point that I am endeavoring to make. In his address he says:

RATE DISCRIMINATION.

One of our railroad connections charges us and other water lines connecting with them more for carrying the same classes of freight over identically the same rails with identically the same service that they charge our all-rail competitors. To show what I mean and what the water lines are up against in this case I will use only the first-class rates as a basis, the percentage being the same in the other classes, the tariff rates being the same by the all-rail lines and the steamboats.

To points where the first-class through rate from New York is 36.8 cents the connecting railroad exacts 20.2 cents per 100 pounds from the steamboats and only 16.3 cents from their railroad connection, and where the first-class rate from New York is 47.3 cents per 100 pounds the connecting line exacts 26 1 cents per 100 pounds from the steamboats and only 23.8 cents per 100 pounds from the railroad connection, and substantially the same discriminations apply to and from all points on their road, and one of the railroads withdrew the tariffs with the water line because the water line would not consent to a reduction of their divisions and revenue to below the railroad-connection revenue.

The boat lines have to pay for loading, unloading, and stowing of all freight in the cars out of their proportion of the through rates. Our barge line rates are 3 cents per 100 pounds less on first and second classes, 2 cents per 100 pounds less on third and fourth classes, and 1 cent per 100 pounds less on fifth and sixth classes than the all-rail and steamboat rates, and the differential comes entirely out of the barge line proportion.

If the railroads would carry the freight of the water lines on the same terms as they carry the freight of the railroads, the water lines could give the shippers the benefit of the excess freight charged them by the shippers the benefit of the excess freight charged them by the railroads and get as much revenue out of the business as they do now, and their all-rail connections would get the same proportion from the water lines business as they do now from their all-rail connection. The reduction in rates would bring additional business to the water lines.

DECISION OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Similar conditions have prevailed on other waterways and similar difficulties are encountered everywhere by water carriers who do a class of business which renders it desirable for them to establish mutually profitable relations with their connecting railroads. It is evident that if the waterways and the railroads could work together, each to receive and distribute freight for the other, the business of the entire country would be greatly benefited. Unless this state of affairs can be brought about, it may render our effort to reestablish water traffic comparatively unsuccessful. Some hope of an ultimately equitable adjustment of the situation is, however, found in a recent decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case—of the Inland Navigation Co. v. The Wabash Railway, in which the complainant, operating a barge line on the Mississippi River between St. Louis, Mo., and Memphis, Tenn., and New Orleans, La., sought the establishment of through routes and joint rates with the defendant on classes and commodities betwen certain points on their respective lines and Memphis and New Orleans. The commission held as follows: "1. By refusing to establish through routes in connection with the navigation company and joint rates applicable thereto not higher than the joint all-rail rates between the same points in which they participate, defendant unjustly discriminates against complainant and subjects traffic routed via the barge line to unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage. 2. If the carriers are permitted to apply higher rates for the same service on traffic routed over connecting water lines than on traffic routed all rail, they will be in a position to destroy water competition, and to deprive communities and shippers of the advantages of location upon navigable waters. 3. Defendants should establish through routes and joint rates with the navigation company via St. Louis, such rates to be no higher than those in which defendants participate, on traffic routed all rail via St. Louis or East St. Louis between the same points."

Apparently this decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission is general in character, and should therefore be applicable to the problem which we to-day have under discussion. On the other hand, in defense of the railroads it should be said that hitherto apparently the transportation business upon our internal waterways has not, as a rule, been upon so stable, businesslike, and permanent a basis as to justify the railroad companies in expending much effort or money in seeking to coordinate water transportation with railroad traffic. The obligation to organize the business of water transportation properly and promptly, to see that it is endowed with sufficient capital and with a businesslike management at least as competent as that which prevails among the railroads, is one which those who called this conference voluntarily imposed upon themselves, and unless they recognize this obligation and discharge it properly all other efforts will probably be in vain.

There has been much discussion as to the cause of the decline of traffic on our western rivers. While the rate and rebate practices of the railroads account in part for this decline, other powerful causes cooperated in its virtual extinguishment, and the railroads alone can not be held to be responsible. For example, railroads parallel the Rhine and the Great Lakes, where the water traffic is enormous, and the railroads are probably more efficient along the Lakes than along our western rivers; yet on the Lakes traffic has not only prospered but it has grown at an almost incredible rate. The depth of our rivers has not been a controlling factor, since the depth of 9 feet available on the lower Mississippi, 8 feet on the middle Mississippi, and 4½ feet, or slightly more, on the upper Mississippi all exceed the depths available upon corresponding portions of the Rhine and other rivers of Europe. Moreover, great depth of channel is not as essential on rivers as it is on the Great Lakes and on the high seas, and it has been held with authority that a depth of 8 feet on the rivers permits the attainment of economies as great as does a depth of 20 feet on the Lakes.

WATERWAYS AGAIN MUST BE UTILIZED FOR TRAFFIC.

Whatever may have been the causes for the partial abandonment of our waterways as traffic carriers, it is certain that the time has come when again they must be utilized. As in an unused machine, rust forms which must be removed before smooth and effective running can be had, so conditions have arisen which must be changed before traffic by our inland waters can play its normal part in our industrial life.

The water fronts of our river cities must be freed from their incumbrances and restored for use as water terminals and factory and elevator sites.

RELIEF FOR RAILWAYS IN WATER SHIPMENT.

Terminals and terminal approaches must be prepared so that the transfer of freight between warehouses and water carriers and between them and the railway can be effected economically. Water-carrying lines must be organized and operated with the same thoughtful care as is given to railways.

Some of these water lines must be devoted to through traffic with but few stops. Auxiliary lines with smaller boats must be organized for local service and for the collection and distribution of cargoes for the through boats.

Where a convenient distribution and collection service by rail does not exist, such a service must be established with automobile or horse-drawn trucks.

In this existing emergency every effort must be made, as a patriotic duty, to relieve the railways by making all the shipments possible by water, and, if necessary, to create and organize the facilities for so doing. Can not the existing river lines be better utilized? Can not they and any new lines which may be formed be coordinated so as to afford a more perfect service for the entire river?

My remarks have perhaps already extended to great length, yet the matter is, to my mind, so vital that I can not forbear further discussion, even though it may, perhaps, be at the expense of your patience and good nature. If in the midst of war at this time the commercial bodies of Germany are urging another enlargement of the canals extending eastward from Berlin to the Oder and westward to the Elbe River, the first enlargement of which was followed by such remarkable results, it must be because the canals are now used to their maximum capacity, and that the increase of canal capacity is more economical than the increase of railway capacity. With us the extension of waterway facilities and their logical and intensive utilization have become urgently important, because, in addition to the railroad congestion previously discussed, the cost of rail transportation has recently manifested a tendency to increase.

All other things being equal, as between railroads and waterways, the freight rate will be controlling in deciding which route is to be used, and while the present national emergency may contribute toward greater use of the waterways, eventually the only prospect of their continued use will reside in the introduction of improvements and economies which will render it advantageous for the merchant and farmer to use the waterways rather than the railroad. Lower rates alone, however, will not be conclusive, for shippers can not incur possible obligations unless contracts for deliveries for extended continuous periods can be guaranteed; in other words, our rivers must be made to respond to our modern business methods.

The old style of packet transportation on the rivers, a thing that is now practically a legend of the past, was extremely inefficient, thus the railroads show that—

0.066 pound fuel is expended per ton-mile of freight transported and 2.5 days' labor per 100,000 ton-miles. The Great Lakes carriers expend 0.029 pound of fuel per ton-mile, with 0.9 days' labor per 100,000 ton-miles. So it is perfectly evident why lake traffic is cheaper and more profitable than by rail for the same distance. Then again, for an Ohio River towboat pushing a large tow, which it can do in that very broad stream, and carrying an enormous amount of freight with a minimum crew, the figures were 0.021 pound of fuel per ton-mile and 1.31 days' labor per 100,000 ton-miles

At the same time that those figures were arrived at an investigation was made of the cost of running a Mississippi River boat of the old kind, stopping at any place that a man wanted a stop made. They used to run the railroads that way, but they do so no longer. It was found that for a Mississippi River packet there had to be expended 1.129 pounds of coal per ton-mile of freight transported, and 65.64 days' labor per 100,000 ton-miles Is it any great wonder that this type of navigation on the Mississippi has died out, has become obsolete? It is out of date, it was bound to go, and there is no hope of its ever being revived. But, as I told you, right on that same Mississippi, by another system by means of boats adapted to the river, with economical management, men are to-day carrying freight and making a profit at rates that are 80 per cent of the railroad rates for exactly the same service.

If this conference evolves an efficient plan and pursues it aggressively, it should be unnecessary for the United States to do more than to lend to the movement the sympathetic support and advice of those governmental agencies that can best cooperate in it and we need not contemplate the necessity of following the example of France and of Germany which compelled the State railroads to favor the waterways by applying arbitrarily higher rates for rail transportation of such traffic as might ordinarily use either the waterway or the railroad.

OLD COMPETITIVE SYSTEM BEING ABANDONED.

That you may approach your task with some reasonable hope of success is to be inferred from the fact that the railroads of the United States have in connection with the advisory commission of the National Defense Council determined upon very radical changes from the old competitive system of handling traffic, the object of these changes being to coordinate the railroad facilities of the country and to obtain the maximum efficiency of service, both for public needs and for private shippers. To this end the railroads have agreed to pool their cars and to distribute them impartially wherever they are most needed regardless of the effect of this course of action upon the interests and revenues of any individual railroad. This movement on the part of the railroads is so patriotic as to justify the hope that when there is presented to the advisory commission a thoroughly digested plan for coordinating rail and water transportation, the railroads will do their share in helping to put the plan into operation.

MORE EFFICIENT METHODS TO BE EMPLOYED.

To sum up, it is necessary to employ more efficient methods upon our rivers, to establish good terminals, the simpler and cheaper the better, and to assimilate river traffic to that of the railroads, making transfers and deliveries at both ends of the line, possibly by auto truck, in connection with the river service. Boat lines must be adequate and dependable. They must give a through service, with only a limited number of stops, and such local service as is required must be articulated with the through service. The local service would gather up traffic and take it to terminal points for shipment by the through carriers, and would conversely take freight at terminals of the through lines for distribution at the local points.

While ultimately assistance from the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense may be expected, in the first instance it devolves upon the interests represented at this conference to take the preliminary steps necessary for placing river traffic upon a substantial basis. Just what these steps are to be is more or less generally described in the remarks that I have made. Briefly, they will consist in the organization of an authoritative committee equipped with the funds and the technical and business talent necessary for a thorough investigation of the situation, and a precise statement of the plan that it is proposed to adopt. If these details are forthcoming, and if your final scheme has such technical, financial, and business support as to warrant being seriously entertained, you need not doubt that the United States will do its utmost in contributing toward eventual success, and it may even be expected that the United States Shipping Board, created by the act of September 7, 1916, "for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes," will do its share. Under this act it would seem that the board has authority to engage in the construction of vessels for use upon our internal rivers, and if in its judgment such action is necessary it may engage in their operation. In short, every condition necessary for the efficient and generous cooperation of the national authorities now exist, but it remains with your conference to develop a workable plan, and to show that it would be to our advantage to further it.

SHALL WE NOT EQUAL GERMANY?

The German nation is showing to-day what a people organized under an autocratic head can do. In this life and death struggle between autocracy and democracy, shall we not show that a self-governing and self-governed people is capable of equal effort and results, and that a democratic nation is as formidable in defending its rights in war as it is enviable in its enjoyment of its privileges in peace?

Men of the Middle West, now is your opportunity for service. Here is a chance for doing your bit. Will you not respond?

Flood Control.

OF

HON. RILEY J. WILSON,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 12, 1917.

Favoring amendment to sundry civil appropriation bill carrying $6,000,000 under the provisions of the flood-control act of March 1, 1917, for the Mississippi and Sacramento River.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, when this amendment was under discussion in the Senate the question was several times asked as to what provision had been made and as to what steps had been taken by the States and other local interests affected to meet the provisions of the flood-control law in the way of providing the funds required of such interests. It was shown that the State of California, through its legislature, had already authorized the expenditure of $500,000 for the present fiscal year, this being the amount required of that State in accordance with the estimate made by the War Department.

While I have not endeavored to obtain the exact data, except as to my own State, I understand that all the local interests have made like provisions to meet the terms of this law.

The flood-control bill was passed by the House of Representatives on the 17th day of May, 1916. The Legislature of the State of Louisiana was then in session, and following the passage of that act the following additional bond issues were promptly provided for in that State through its various levee boards, viz:

The Tensas Basin levee district, by act approved June 19, 1916	$350,000
New Orleans levee district, by act approved July 6, 1916	1,000,000
Red River, Atchafalava, and Bœuf River district, by act approved July 16, 1916	250,000
La Fourche Basin levee district, by act approved July 6, 1916	250,000
The fifth Louisiana levee district, by act approved July 5, 1916	1,000,000
Atchafalava Basin levee district, by act approved July 5, 1916	1,000,000
Making a total additional bond issue of these various levee districts of	3,850,000

This speaks well for the wisdom and foresight of the Louisiana General Assembly and for the present State administration. The promptness with which the terms of the flood-control act were amply met serves to illustrate how necessary was this legislation and indicates the intense interest of our people in this problem.

In addition to the funds provided for above under law already existing, the State of Louisiana pays directly for levee construction annually seventeen-twentieths of a mill on the assessed valuation of all the property of the State, which will provide an annual revenue of $600,000, or a total during the five-year period covered by the flood-control act of $3,000,000, making a grand total, already authorized and provided for in that State, of $6,850,000.

So, Mr. Speaker, the appropriation authorized under the provisions of the flood-control act should not be far one moment delayed on the assumption that the local authorities in the Mississippi Valley will in any respect fail to discharge the burdens placed upon them under the requirements of this law. While the weight of taxation will bear heavily throughout that section, this is the opportunity which our people have long sought, and I want to assure this House that while it will be a herculean task, they are now meeting, and will in the future continue to meet, promptly and gladly every provision and requirement in this law.

It must indeed be most gratifying to the country, and especially to the people of the Mississippi Valley States and the State of California, that the Congress is proceeding immediately to appropriate under the provisions of this law for the all-important work for which it provides.

Although this is an extra session of the Congress, the work of which is limited to war measures, and while this has not been discussed as a war appropriation, yet we all know that no wiser step has been taken toward fundamental preparedness, for there is no region in the world or like area capable of producing in such quantity the raw products for food and clothing as the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River; neither is any waterway on the globe capable of rendering greater service to commerce.

Prohibition.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. CARY,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 13, 1917.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House I believe the following list of labor organizations opposed to prohibition should be inserted in the RECORD:

TWO MILLION EIGHTY-TWO THOUSAND SIX HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SEVEN WORKINGMEN PETITION THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS AGAINST CUTTING OFF A HABITUAL TEMPERATE BEVERAGE.

A few days ago the workingmen of America, represented by their own unions and central labor unions, presented to President Wilson, to Congress, and to the Council of National Defense one of the largest petitions ever offered as representing the opinion of American citizens on any public question. These men have the fullest realization of the problems which the war has developed and the heartiest desire to assist in their solution. They have evidenced this by the fact that hundreds of thousands of them have registered for service. They do, however, ask that until necessity shall render it imperative they shall not be deprived of the use of beer, which is recognized by our allies as a temperate beverage, and up to this time not the subject of prohibitory restriction by any belligerent nation.

The nation-wide organizations and the number of individuals represented by this petition are as follows, to which list many other unions have since added their names:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GILBERT A. CURRIE,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 13, 1917.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following poem written by Hon. T. W. Crissey, of Midland, Mich.:

BUY A LIBERTY BOND.

A bond to bind you to your country's life—
To show that you were with her in the strife;
To link you to the men who stand between
Your land and dangers dire though yet unseen.

They brave the bullet, bomb, and bayonet;
Hell's poisonous gases round them fiercely fret;
So do your bit, and do your bit with speed,
That men may know you've felt your country's need.

Then shoulders all up to the heavy wheel!
We all must in this strife the burden feel;
We each must take our load with sturdy grace;
For Freedom must not lose on earth her place!

Certain Remarks of a Partisan Nature.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. CARTER,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 13, 1917.

Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I desire to insert a portion of a speech delivered by the Hon. FRANKLIN F. ELLSWORTH, Member of Congress from Minnesota, at Tilton, N. H., on the evening of Saturday, May 26, 1917, as well as an editorial. These articles deal with important questions of the day and effectually answer certain remarks of a partisan nature that were made in New Hampshire recently:

[Portion of the speech of Hon. FRANKLIN F. ELLSWORTH, Member of Congress from Minnesota, delivered at Tilton, N. H., on Saturday, May 26, 1917.]

The eloquent Illinois Senator, JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, comes to New Hampshire to appeal to the voters to throw away their partisanship, but to elect a Democrat for the lower House of Congress, because that Democrat is a partisan and of the same political faith as the executive head of this Nation, and that such choice is indispensable for the support of our Government in its struggle to maintain a war for democracy and for justice.

I want to repeat his eloquent appeal for patriotic, upstanding, unswerving loyalty to the civil head of this Nation in the present crisis, but in the cause of a painstaking and intelligent exercise of your inviolable right of suffrage I appeal to you to scrutinize the delicate tinge of an argument which ignores the signal service of Republican leaders in Congress who have upheld the President in every measure which makes for the vigorous prosecution of the war and to contrast red-blooded patriotism shown by these leaders with the bleached and anemic action of Democratic leaders in that same body.

I ask you to blend into the eloquent Senator's appeal to abandon your politics and support a Democrat for Congress the plain fact that Republicans have been unholding the administration measures with loyalty and patriotism; that many of them could not have been passed without Republican aid; that always that patriotic action was in evidence; and that finally conscription, the President's plan for making good America's challenge to the autocratic governments of the world, was provided by the ranking Republican member of the Military Affairs Committee of the House and passed by Republicans and championed by Republican leaders over the bitterest opposition of the Democratic chairman of the Military Committee, the Democratic committee members, and the Democratic leaders.

KAHN, ranking Republican member of the Military Committee, supported Woodrow Wilson; DENT, Democratic chairman of that committee, opposed Woodrow Wilson. MANN, Republican floor leader, supported Woodrow Wilson in this national crisis; KITCHIN, Democratic leader, opposed Woodrow Wilson. Nearly every Democratic leader in the House stood stolidly against it, although their President demanded it; every Republican leader supported the President loyally and patriotically. The Speaker of the House, a Democrat, in a ringing speech opposed the President. Upon the bill's final passage more Republicans voted for the bill in which conscription had been included than Democrats, and outdid their Democratic colleagues in the official acts which our Democratic opponents now tell us constitute the standard for this campaign.

I indorse the standard, but I deny the innuendo. On every measure which has had to do with providing for a vigorous prosecution of the war Republicans of the lower House have come to the rescue of, and exceeded, the Democratic Members of that body in loyalty.

Viewed in the light of eloquence without substance, reason might be found for election of a Democrat from New Hampshire, but in the calm, careful consideration of the deepest motives of loyalty and patriotism to country I maintain that it can not be based upon any national necessity shown to exist by past events.

[Editorial from the Rochester (N. Y.) Evening Times, June 8, 1917.]

FALSE TEST FAILS.

The first test to which the administration has subjected itself, politically speaking, since the declaration of war against Germany was in the recent special election to fill a vacancy in Congress from New Hampshire. The district was normally Republican. Only once in 27 years—and that in the year of Republican division—has it sent a Democrat to Washington. Last fall it reelected the late Congressman Sulloway by a plurality of more than 2,000. It went for the Republican candidate for governor by nearly 4,000. Although Wilson carried New Hampshire by 56, this district went for Hughes by 22. It was Republican territory.

The President, who is pleading for nonpartisanship—and getting it as far as Republicans are concerned—was unwilling, apparently, to let this normally Republican district pursue its political way in peace. Washington raised a partisan issue and partisan agents were sent into the district. The administration's spokesmen, alleging that they spoke by the President's authority, made the astounding assertion that a vote for the Republican candidate would be reckoned as a vote "for Prussianism and the Kaiser." In the face of the record of opposition to the President's war program which the leaders of his own party have made in Congress, these emissaries of the administration had the effrontery to plead with the New Hampshire Republicans to desert their own party as a means of displaying their loyalty to the Nation and to send another Democrat to Washington to "stand by the President."

The specious argument failed. The district failed to respond to the plea that it was "unsafe" to elect a Republican to represent a Republican constituency. Although the vote was light, the percentage of Republican preponderance was maintained. In the first test which the Democratic Party, at the administration's instigation, sought to make upon a false issue since the last presidential campaign, its failure was unmistakable. The first attempt to capitalize the war for partisan uses has met with disaster. It is a good omen.

Flag-Day Celebration.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. FRANK JAMES,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 15, 1917.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to have printed the speech made by Hon. M. CLYDE KELLY, Member of the House of Representatives from Pennsylvania, before 2,500 high-school students at the Central High School of this city, in connection with the celebration of Flag Day, June 14. The exercises were held under the auspices of the Grand Army of the Republic, and the speech is full of patriotic inspiration to every American, young and old. It is as follows:

THE MEANING OF FLAG DAY.

This is a sacred day. It is a day of memory and of hope. It awakens thoughts of by-gone time and the time that is yet to be. As we look upon the starry banner that gleams so proudly in our sight, we see America and the principles for which she stands.

Woven durably into the texture of the flag are the ideas for which Americans have struggled and fought and lived and died. For America is ruled to-day and always has been ruled by ideas. We call our country "Land of liberty," the "Land of opportunity," and other names which serve as inspirations to all true citizens.

We might well call America the "Land of consuming ideas." Of all the great countries of the earth, none have witnessed the origin and development of so many ideas of human progress and advancement. The power of a burning idea that takes possession of the heart of a single man and whose flame spreads to thousands has been felt many times in the history of this country.

Because the American flag is the symbol of the American spirit, each of these great ideas has been wrought into its web and woof. When we look upon the flag to-day we see the embodiment of these ideas and they give it meaning and value.

Washington's consuming idea was "Independence," and the Star-Spangled Banner floated triumphantly over a new nation to signify to all the world that that idea had been made a reality.

Lincoln's consuming idea was "Union," and its flame burned brightly in his heart during all the years of fratricidal strife; burned there until it was transferred by universal consent to the flag which waved over a nation, one and inseparable.

William Lloyd Garrison was one of those who knew both the pain and the joy of a consuming idea for human betterment. His life of storm and stress was devoted to the idea "Freedom," and its urge eternal drove him through difficulty and danger, dauntless and unafraid. Then, when the shackles had been stricken from the limbs of every chattel slave in America, that idea, too, became a part of the fiber of the Stars and Stripes.

Other great Americans have cherished consuming ideas with all their hearts. Cleaving to it only, with no divided allegiance, they have suffered and struggled and endured. Finally came the one triumph they craved, the weaving of their ideas of justice and righteousness into the standard of their nation, to be seen and acknowledged of all men.

So, the flag is ever growing in grandeur. It is greater and grander by every impulse of noble kind in the hearts of Americans. It does not mean to-day what it meant yesterday. In this throbbing and dynamic day it means more than it has ever meant since the deaf old bellman in Philadelphia pulled the rope and sounded out the strains of independence to all the world and the inhabitants thereof.

That was 141 years ago. Only a short time and fleeting in the annals of earth's peoples, and yet, strange to say, the flag that has floated for that period as the emblem of America is the oldest flag in the world.

John Paul Jones was the first to raise the new banner. With delight that hardy hero hoisted the new flag, with its 13 red and white stripes and its stars in the blue field, over his vessel. With delight he saw the colors of the new Nation saluted with respect in foreign ports. It was the pride of his valiant heart, and no man ever loved it more than he. Paul Jones it was who, when his vessel was sinking under a murderous fire from enemy ships, was asked if he had surrendered. He glanced toward his flagstaff, saw his starry emblem still flying proudly in spite of gashes and rents, and thundered out his immortal response, "I have just begun to fight." Little wonder that such irresistible courage won the day and that the Bon Homme Richard, though itself a wreck, was the victor and that its commander took his place among the kings of the sea.

On land the American flag was first given to the breezes when it was hoisted over Fort Stanwix, in New York, August, 1777, during that momentous campaign which ended with the surrender of Burgoyne and marked the turning point in the War of the Revolution

The oldest flag in the world; that flag, typifying the great Republic of the West, outdates all the other banners swung aloft by present-day nations. It is older than the British flag, which was adopted in 1801. It is older than the French tricolor, which first saw the light in 1794. It is older than the flag of Spain, which was born in 1785; older, even, than the emblems of the ancient Empires of China and Japan.

The Star-Spangled Banner is much older than the flag of the Imperial German Government, which was adopted in 1870. One thing is assured—the German flag is too young and too immature to demand obedience to insulting demands from that strong old banner of the red, white, and blue.

One hundred and forty years of growth and development. Yet in all the changeful circumstances which have marked those years that flag has never bowed conquered before any foe. Its history is all on one side—victory. Though bent by some of the blasts, it has weathered every gale, floating out in new strength and new splendor in the sunshine that follows storm.

It waved over Washington and his Continentals. Before it Burgoyne laid down his arms. It was the inspiring beacon light amid the horrors of Valley Forge. It was the conquering banner at Yorktown when the brothers in arms, Washington and Lafayette, clasped hands in the final struggle for national liberty.

That flag went through the storm of Lundy's Lane and waved from the new-made ship from which Commodore Perry sent his message, "We have met the enemy, and they are ours." It floated defiantly over the ramparts at New Orleans, where "Old Hickory" beat back the veterans of the "Iron Duke," Wellington.

That flag waved victoriously in the halls of the Montezumas in Mexico City. It was crowned triumphant at Cerro Gordo and Buena Vista. It was at the head of the triumphal march to the Golden Gate and the snow-clad Sierra Nevadas.

That flag endured the shot and shell of civil strife and came forth in new vigor and virility. From Fort Sumter to the apple tree at Appomattox, upheld by Grant and Sherman and Sheridan and a host of other gallant leaders, it came victoriously, not a single stripe dimmed nor a single star lost.

That flag floated from the ship from which Dewey sent his orders at the Battle of Manila Bay. It led the way for the reunited fighters from North and South up the hill at San Juan. It was the inspiration of Hobson and his daring associates at Santiago.

These records of victory, all of them, have been written into the fabric of the flag, never to be removed. Not less surely have been woven the victories of peace, the achievements of material kind during that century and more of history.

But these have not made the flag complete and unchangeable. The making of that flag is never completed. Lincoln spoke of the Nation's unfinished task at Gettysburg. So to-day we speak of unfinished tasks, and those which await the makers of the flag in this generation are greater than ever before.

Some of you here to-day without doubt have wished that you could have lived in the days when Washington and the founders of this Republic were performing their splendid tasks. Perhaps you have wished that you could have had a part in the great struggle of Abraham Lincoln in the sixties.

Let me say that you need have no fear as to the magnitude and the importance of the tasks awaiting you here and now. You live in a more vital epoch than any Americans who have gone before. The whole future of all the world is in the molding of the hands of to-day. Here, in this living present, is a pivotal point in the world's history, more far-reaching than any in the past. And it is upon America that the destiny of the world hangs trembling. The history of unborn ages depends upon the answer of America to the problems confronting her. I believe with all my heart that the work of America during the next five years will determine the world's history for the next five centuries.

In the shadow of such a heavy responsibility, with such fates hanging in the balance, we must have the consuming idea great enough and vital enough for the day and age. It must merit the devotion of men and women who will live for it, work for it, fight for it, die for it, if need be, so that it may be woven into the enduring texture of the starry emblem of America.

There is just one idea in all the world big enough for this moment of world crisis. That idea is "democracy." Thank God, it has been burning in the hearts of individuals long enough to make it flame out as a national ideal; yes; a world ideal; one sure abiding spot in this welter of a world in conflict. This Nation to-day has faith in democracy and whenever that time comes to a nation its history is sure to be soul stirring. It will write history in blazing figures for all the world to read.

Democracy—government of the people, for the people, and by the people. That is the idea which we of this generation are privileged to weave by faith into this flag we honor here to-day.

Our task is twofold in appearance, yet it is one task after all. It is to make the world safe for democracy and to make America sure for democracy.

That flag to-day stands for democracy around the world. Last Flag Day it carried no such meaning, but never again will it be without it. While its bright colors gleam bravely on high in the future, the world will read in them the doom of dynasties and the downfall of thrones.

That is a new meaning, indeed. In fact, we had become rather skeptical ourselves about democracy prior to August, 1914. Revolutions in South American countries occurring in quick succession made us argue that some peoples were unfit to rule themselves. Our sway in the Philippines started us to looking with favor upon the exercise of arbitrary power under certain circumstances. The idea of a Republic in China was cause for ridicule on every hand. Limitless disturbances in Mexico made us long for a leader who could rule with an iron hand. Above all, the glowing reports of German efficiency made us wonder whether rigid discipline might not be the solution of many vexing problems. Insidiously, subtly, the poison was working, and we were departing from the faith of our fathers.

Then, suddenly came this greatest and most terrible of world wars, and we were brought face to face with vital truths. We saw a mighty conflict forced upon nations not because their peoples desired it, nor because it could not have been prevented by peaceful arbitration, but because irresponsible rulers were consumed with vanity and were lustful for conquest.

The autocratic nations are responsible for this war. The central powers brought it about simply because there was no check to the power of their rulers, no authority in the people to say them nay even on the brink of such a frightful catastrophe as world war.

Germany is the foremost exemplar of autocracy in government. As represented by her rulers, the German Empire has long repudiated democracy. The Kaiser holds firm to the doctrine of the divine rights of kings. The Imperial Government is built on the idea that the ruler should take care of his people, but failing to do so he can be called to account only by Almighty God himself.

Franz Josef of Austro-Hungary, who was ruler when this war broke out, was, above all else, a believer in absolutism. Early in his reign, he was compelled to cede certain Italian Provinces to United Italy. The declaration of cession stated that the Provinces were to be permitted to choose the form of government the people desired. The Emperor refused to sign such a paper, saying: "The people have no right to choose their own form of government. The principle is immoral, and I will lose my Kingdom rather than consent to it." I am almost sorry that the old Emperor could not have lived to lose his throne for that very reason. Finally, to escape this "immoral" principle of the right of the people to choose their own government, Franz Josef handed the Provinces over to Napoleon III of France, and he in turn handed them over to the people.

Turkey is an absolute monarchy, and its entire history is a bloody record of the disregard of popular rights. Its very religion is a natural foe of democracy. Bulgaria, too, is firm in its adherence to the divinity of kings. These four nations make up the quadruple alliance, which represents but one idea, the idea of autocracy and the doctrine that might is right.

The spirit of the nations opposed to this alliance is democratic; and when the Russian people rose up in their might and deposed the Czar and his bureaucrats, the line at once became clear-cut and undeniable to any save a willful distorter of the facts.

Here in America we watched the conflict rage for two years and more. At first the stupendous struggle confused us, and our sympathies were dictated by many and unrelated causes. Then one outstanding fact raised itself above the smoke and fog and grew clearer with every passing month. It was that the war is a gigantic struggle between the principle of government by a despot and the principle of government by the people. The German efficiency which we had admired was shown to be the by-product of tyrannical power, to be used, if desired, in murderous assault upon the freedom of the world and the rights of humanity. The faults and wastes of people's rule were seen to be of small consequence, if liberty were secured.

As the situation developed we began to realize that America, the oldest democracy in the world, was vitally concerned in the final outcome of the struggle which raged in Europe. Some of us had seen it from the day of the desecration of Belgium, and hoped and desired that America would stride to the defense of the imperilled ideas of liberty in the world. But those who did not then see the issue were given abundant reasons by the tactics of Germany. Our own ships were sunk without warning, our citizens murdered, protests went unheeded or were answered with promises meant only for breaking. Barred zones were established, within which we were insultingly told destruction awaited our commerce. High officials from Germany organized conspiracies against our welfare, seeking to embroil us in war with friendly nations. Spies and plotters sought to destroy factories and bridges in dastardly attack upon national rights and national security.

All these brought more clearly than ever to the intelligence and feeling of Americans that this Nation's future welfare was in dire danger before an autocratic power seeking world dominion and recognizing no rules of civilized warfare. We began to realize that the world can not exist half autocratic and half democratic. We saw that as long as one man's will is supreme in Berlin the people's will is in danger of nullification in New York.

With that fact seen, there could be no hesitation. America seized the sword and plunged into the fray for the rescue of liberty. There was nothing else that could be done. Had we refused we would have been traitors to our history of the past, the need of the present, and the hope of the future. Had we refused, those stripes would have been turned to saffron-colored hues and those stars would have sunk in shame behind the dark clouds of a world's disdain.

To-day, with America in this war to the finish and with all its men and resources pledged for victory, we may well look upon the flag with new reverence and obtain from it new inspiration. It stands for a new day in the history of the world.

When the news of the fall of the Czar reached the German capital the chancellor announced it to the Reichstag and remarked, "Woe to the statesman that can not read the signs of the times." I would change it slightly and say, "Woe to the statesman that can not read the signs in time."

It is too late for the Kaiser of Germany, the Sultan of Turkey, the Emperors of Austria and Bulgaria, and every other absolute ruler in the wide world. The dynasties are doomed. Thrones and tyrannical power are forfeit to the idea for which Old Glory stands. They flung down their challenge to democracy. America has taken it up and marches forth to battle in a holy cause. They started the war; America will finish it.

To-day, wherever the American flag waves in the breeze, on schoolhouse, home, or Capitol, at the head of valiant fighters on the battle lines of Europe, or from the masts of gallant ships in the seven seas it is a blazing symbol that every Government on the face of the earth must be built on the consent of the governed. All America and whatever it possesses in men and resources are under requisition to carry out that determination. This war will not be ended until that high emprise has been accomplished.

We will make the world safe for democracy. But that is not all; we must make America sure for democracy, and perhaps it is the more difficult task after all.

That flag must stand for democracy at home. The Government that lives under its shining folds must be in the hands of the people and have but one aim—the advancement of the common good.

Democracy, in order to live, must make war against every individual and every social movement that stifles justice and crushes truth. It matters not who or what they may be, if they are protecting unjust privileges and vested wrongs, if they profit from the exploitation of the people, they are enemies, and their power to injure must be destroyed.

For the welfare of any people there must be production of the commodities that mean life, comfort, and happiness for human beings. This problem of production has been largely solved. The best brains, the finest appliances, the most marvelous machines have been devoted to that task. Great cities have sprung up, with almost their entire citizenship occupied in producing a certain commodity. The land, tilled with mighty implements and stimulated by every method known to science, has poured out its fruitful gifts with a lavishness never known before.

But, alas, while production of wealth is but half of the human problem, it has been regarded as the whole. Men forgot that equally important is the just distribution of wealth. And because they did, a few men piled up fortunes of wondrous size while a great host of men and women and children lacked even the necessities of life. In the midst of abundant wealth, poverty stalked unheeded and claimed its victims on every side. While producing wealth wonderfully we were distributing it infamously.

That situation has long been one of the danger points in America. To-day, in the midst of war, it is the biggest home problem with which we have to deal.

One phase of it is seen in the food situation in America. With abundant production of food supplies prices have been forced to such a height that many thousands of families have felt the sting of privation and suffering. Food gamblers and speculators, by juggling prices and cornering food supplies, have robbed both the producer and the consumer. Out in Chicago a few men in a gambling grain exchange are able to send the price of wheat down when they desire to buy and up when they desire to sell. By a series of chalk marks on a blackboard in a gambling den they are able to levy tribute on every dining table in the land. Every time they change the price of a bushel of grain by a single cent they change values in this country $50,000,000. When you remember that prices have jumped 40 cents a bushel in a single day in these grain pits you can understand the tax being levied by these pirates of commerce.

In a little different way by equally guilty methods the food cornerers are working. With their storehouses bursting with food supplies these manipulators refuse to put them on the market in order to keep prices at the highest notch. They let carloads of unspoiled fruit rot in cars on a railroad siding. They throw cargoes of food overboard in harbors. They contract in advance for great fields of potatoes and great orchards of fruit and then refuse to allow the potatoes to be dug or the fruit to be picked, so that prices may be kept high by such criminal methods.

Did I say criminal? The word is too weak. I believe that such food gamblers and food speculators are guilty of blackest treason to America. They are the ablest allies of the Kaiser. They are using tactics more dangerous than German submarines. With all my heart I would favor lining them up in front of a firing squad to meet the penalties of treason. If hanging be advocated, I would insist that it should be by reversing the usual method, so that they might be hung with feet upward and see their crime-stained gold running from their pockets.

Such conditions of injustice and crime in distribution must not exist longer under the folds of the flag that stands for democracy. These "wheat" kings and "food" kings of all kinds are upholding the very autocracy and irresponsible power against which we are waging war across the sea. America must say to these gamblers "you can not gamble with the people's bread under the protection of the Stars and Stripes." We must say to these cornerers of food "the flag which floats above the building in which your heaped-up food is stored will not permit you to retain possession for your evil purposes."

I am confident that such commands will be given in the near future. The American Congress dare not permit such injustice to continue. The food-control bill under consideration in Congress is framed to deal with the situation. In the stress and storm of war, with all the world depending upon America, we must realize that the people's Government is under obligation to put its hands upon the food supplies of the Nation and see that they are distributed fairly and justly without any interference on the part of business highwaymen.

It will be a great victory for democracy when control of prices by gamblers is changed to control of prices by the Government as agent for all the people. The joint interest of 100,000,000 Americans in a common storehouse will be an inspiring thing and it will mean justice in the distribution of those supplies which are essential to the life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness of every American citizen.

That is but one phase of the question, but the flag stands for every phase of just distribution of wealth. It stands for that system of distribution under which no man shall take from the mouth of his fellow the bread he has earned, nor any man get more than he earns from those who earn more than they get.

Now, these two great tasks of to-day require the best efforts of the best brain and blood and brawn in the land. To make democracy safe in the world requires the united efforts of all Americans in this war in which we are engaged. The man who for any reason whatever now hinders the prompt and efficient prosecution of this war is fighting against the flag and everything for which it stands. It is no time to deal gently with any anti-American, whether he be a cowardly slacker, a selfish politician, or a peace-at-any-price pacifist. We must see this war through to complete victory.

Whoso shrinks or falters now,
Whoso to the yoke would bow.
Brand the craven on his brow.
Freedom's soil hath only place,
For a free and fearless race;
None for traitors false and base.
Perish party, perish clan,
Strike together while we can
Like the arm of one strong man.

Those ten million and more Americans who registered on June 5 under the selective-draft law typified the spirit demanded. That was one of the greatest sights in all the history of this country. The young manhood of America stepping forward in solid phalanx, answering to the Nation's call, "Here I am; send me," was a sight to bring joy to every patriot, living or dead.

Thus were forever silenced the sneers of foemen that America could not act with efficiency and with united purpose; that her heroism had turned to cowardice and her manhood to weakness. Thus was proven once again that there are valiant hearts now, as always, to defend America and her flag on any land or sea.

The challenge of armed autocracy demands red-blooded courage, and America will not fail to meet that test. From those long lines of young men before every schoolhouse in America on June 5, as from the record of sacred ground everywhere, from hillside and seaside, from mountain crest and rye field and the decks of battered ships, may be gleamed one golden truth. "Greater than any terrible machine of destruction that the mind of man can conceive is the courage of American manhood, fighting for the American flag."

There need be no doubt as to the outcome of this war in which we are engaged. Before we lay down our arms the world will be safe for every nation where the people govern, to pursue its way in peace, unmenaced by the mailed fist of ruthless despotism.

I wish I could say that the task of making America sure for democracy is as simple and as certain of speedy accomplishment with finality. I can not say it for it is not true. To secure real democracy in America requires a struggle everlasting. It can not be won by cannon and battleships and aircraft. It must be wrought in the heart; in that eternal battle between greed and brotherhood, which has been raging since the beginning of time.

We must, all of us, come to see that simple justice is most profitable to each of us in the end and that an injury done the weakest, humblest citizen in America is an injury done to all.

To reach that conclusion we must break down barriers of creed and race and wealth and get together. We must know each other better. We must find our common mind and speak it in our common voice. We must recognize that the wisdom of all of us is greater than the wisdom of some of us. We must develop the kindness and courage of comrades, which is the highest type in the world.

How are we to accomplish this end and build this together spirit? No need to go far afield to find the means; it is right at hand at this moment. I believe it is to be found in the public-school building, which can be made the key to American brotherhood.

The schoolhouse has been the moving force in the past. Out from it have come the men and women who have molded American history and made the American flag. To-day it typifies a system of public education where 16,000,000 children are enrolled in the army of enlightenment and progress.

But I look further than the education of the coming generation. I look to the use of every public-school building as a social center where neighbors may meet for common counsel. I believe it is destined to become the very center of American life, the gathering place of all the citizens of the community to consider the questions which affect the common welfare, and to decide upon concerted action. I hope to live to see the day when the American flag over the schoolhouse marks the building which is the head-and-heart quarters of the entire citizenship of the community. I want to see the schoolhouse made the place where the people, regardless of all lines of creed or opinion or income meet in regular session, with proper organization, to consider and act upon every question which affects them as American citizens.

Then we shall have the means for making democracy sure in America. Then citizens will meet as sovereigns to consider the public interest, not their own selfish interests. They will meet, not as members of a political party but as associates in a noble enterprise which deserves their best efforts. Then we may be sure that the eternal struggle which is the price of democracy may at least be marked by eternal victory over every force that would despoil or destroy.

By all means let us have the flag afloat over the city hall, where the council meets; over the State capitol, where the legislature convenes; over the great dome of the Capitol here in Washington, where laws for the Nation are made. But grander and greater still, because it is the place from which all these others get their dignity and their power, let us have the flag over the schoolhouse, which marks the heart of American sovereignty, sure token that the will of the people shall be the law of the land.

Friends, let us be seers indeed when we look upon that flag. It is the oldest, strongest, most glorious, over all victorious banner in the world. It carries a potent meaning in this year of 1917, all it has meant in the past and more besides.

It is an omen of despair to autocrats trembling on their tottering thrones. It carries grim message to the hearts of Kaiser and Czar and Emperor and King who put the divine rights of rulers above the divine rights of men. Its colors spell out the doom of dynasties built upon the wrecked rights of the people.

It is a sinister sight, too, in the eyes of those who prey upon the people in business realms. Its Stars and Stripes gleam menacingly in the eyes of the exploiter and the traitor to the common good. It stands the embodiment of the power that will end the plots and conspiracies of greed, the power of the man called million, who shall yet make of government an agent to do his bidding in the struggle for justice.

But the flag, while grim omen to these, is to others a bow of promise, shining in brave colors against the storm clouds that had well nigh blotted out mankind's remembrance of the sun behind them.

It is hailed with joy by the motherland across the sea and her great daughters in every part of the globe; by glorious France, whose sons battled with us for independence in the heroic days of old; by Russia, new-born democracy, torn and convulsed, but struggling nobly toward the light; by valiant Belgium, rent and dismembered by barbarous foe, with everything lost but her own unconquerable soul; by all these and more—every nation on the globe that vests power in its citizenship and regards the rights of the people as more sacred than the rights of kings.

The flag is a harbinger of hope to all in America who battle against wrong where it is strong and who have faith to believe that this Government of ours must be one for the people, of the people, and by the people.

Above all our flag is a gleaming promise to all those who long for and hope for and pray for the lasting brotherhood of nations and enduring peace among men. Even on the black clouds of war may be seen the beautiful bow of freedom and peace for the peoples of the earth.

For we have learned through this mighty conflict that national organization and national cooperation can not be the last stage in the evolution of civilized society. No nation can live entirely out of relations with other nations, and the evil deeds of one brings danger and distress to all. The march of twentieth century civilization has changed the planet into a neighborhood, and in very self-defense all must support a fraternity of nations, its members bound together by such ties of mutual respect and good will that never again shall such a deadly war as that which rages to-day be possible. Upon Americans today rests solemn responsibility to lead in that sublime enterprise which has been the theme of dreamers, seers, and prophets down the centuries—to help greatly in developing the institutions which will bring to pass the parliament of man, the federation of the world.

Will you young men and women, who are just coming into responsibility in this greatest of all world epochs, not catch the vision of that beautiful banner, all it means, and all it may mean?

My best wish for you is a magnificent unrest in your blood and a sublime lack of repose in your hearts until the bugle call to service has been nobly answered. May you hear the call of liberty across the seas and stand supremely loyal in your devotion to America in this hour of her noblest effort for world democracy.

May you hear the call to make America sure for democracy, a land where faithful service receives its just reward, where honor rules the market, a nation whose one ambition is to serve the common good of mankind by securing enduring peace and welding all nations into a fraternity, each for all, all for each, and all together for a common cause.

That is the spirit of democracy, the consuming idea of the age. Nobler challenge never came to men or women in all the æons of the past. Shall we not here and now highly resolve to follow the gleam of that high emprise, never faltering nor doubting, whatever gales may blow, until we have written that idea into the fabric of the flag, never to be erased nor removed as long as there shall be a nation known as America and a flag of stars and stripes to stand as its symbol.

A Message from the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland to the Baptists of the United States of America.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. MONTAGUE,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 15, 1917.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a message from the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland to the Baptists of the United States of America.

The message is as follows:

A MESSAGE FROM THE BAPTIST UNION OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND TO THE BAPTISTS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

DEAR CHRISTIAN FRIENDS AND FELLOW BAPTISTS:

"Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ."

First, we thank God in Christ for you all, that your faith is proclaimed throughout the whole world; and with full and grateful hearts we praise Him that at this crisis in the life of mankind you are led by His spirit to join us, your brethren in the faith of the Gospel of Christ, in the fight for freedom and justice, for democracy and brotherhood, for good will and progress in all the world.

We know full well that all through this painful struggle we have had a large place in your sympathies and prayers. Not for one moment have we doubted that. We could not. You have watched us from afar, but your hearts have been with us. Your interest has been keen and sustained, and your desires for the victory of the soldiers of the people over the despots of Europe strong. You have aided us by your generous ministry to the imprisoned and the imperiled. From the beginning we have felt the reality and comfort of your companionship with us in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ. But now your President has proclaimed your breach with Germany and taken his stand by our side, with all your vast resources i faith and devotion, in enthusiasm for humanity and zeal for self-government, in care for the rights of small communities of men, and n inexhaustible materials of war, we feel that the wide seas no longer separate us, but we are marching in step to the God-given goal of universal liberty and universal peace.

It is natural and inevitable to us as Baptists that we should come together in this dark and cloudy day. It could not be otherwise. We are members one of another; we are one; one in our faith and ideals, aims, and spirit, thought and deeds. We are hewn out of the same rock; we share the same spiritual heritage from some of the greatest souls of the past. Our predecessors were yours. Their distinctive principles, noble, arduous, and fruitful service we share alike. We are one in our deepest convictions of truth and right, in our estimate of the incomparable virtues of the soul, one in our devotion to what our fathers called the "common man," to man as he is in the sight of God, and apart from all the separable accidents of his condition; one in our interpretation of the aims and functions and limitations of States, in the enthusiasms that sway our souls and constrain us to seek first and foremost the kingdom of God and His righteousness. A common faith in the absolute and exclusive sovereignty of the redeeming Christ over souls set us in the right path, and despotic persecutors kept our feet in the way we had to go, and at the same time heightened the value of our fellowship both for ourselves and for others.

As you never forget the courage and insight of John Smyth, the consummate genius and noble devotion of John Milton, and the heroism of the men of the Commonwealth who overcame the tyranny of the Stuarts just as "Free Russia" has got rid of the autocratic Czar, so we delight to recall Roger Williams, the champion of freedom of conscience, the legislative Moses of Rhode Island, and the father and founder of the Baptist churches of the States. Fidelity to conscience is in the soul of us. The democratic faith is yours and ours. Our churches have practiced self-government for three centuries. We have been and must be, anticlerical and antisacerdotal; for "one is our Master even Christ, and we are brothers," equal in the sight of the Eternal, and indwelt and enriched by the Holy Ghost for the work of His church.

Through all our history there shines clear and strong our common devotion to peace. Although we never accepted the absolute "non-resistance" theory of the teaching of Christ, we have always been advocates of peace. In the world we have had tribulation, and we have endured it for the sake of peace. We have fought against despots, but it has been for peace. We are the subjects of the Prince of Peace. We never met in congress, European or world-wide, without asserting our desire for the cessation of all war, the settlement of international disputes by arbitration, and the universal reign of peace. One of our primary interests when we met in Berlin was to "Ingeminate peace," for already we were shadowed by fears and misgivings. The same purpose stood out in our proceedings in Stockholm; and the memorable gatherings in London and in Philadelphia were dominated by the same passionate yearning for brotherhood and good will.

Through these meetings and through the interchange of denominational literature and of ministries our fellowship has developed a strong sense of solidarity, created a conviction that we stand for truths and principles necessary for the welfare of all communities of men, and especially for the peoples of Europe. For years you have been enriching us by your missionary zeal. Sweden, for example, has had some of her leaders trained in your schools, and many of her children domiciled in your midst have shown their attachment to their fatherland by sending help to the churches. For Russia you have labored much in the Lord. You have sustained her heroic preachers, and undertaken to aid in training their successors. Germany has many witnesses to your love. Indeed, the whole of Europe is in your debt; and by your union with us in the present contest "with principalities and powers and spiritual wickedness in high places" you are preparing for the day when we may afresh and in a freer world carry forward our great enterprise of giving to the whole of Europe the Gospel of Christ in its original clearness and fullness of power.

But now, to our unspeakable sorrow, our fellowship and common service have been rudely interrupted by this disastrous and distressful war.

Like you, we British Baptists hate and loathe all war. We are and have always been advocates of peace. Many of us, at great cost, opposed the Boer War. Indeed, we have never unsheathed the sword whilst it was possible to keep it in its scabbard, and if any other way had been possible for us we should not have taken it out in August, 1914. But there was no other way. As your President says, "we could do no other."

It is indisputable that not only was Germany preparing for this world war in her own boundaries, but was always endeavoring to create occasions of war with a persistence and a subtlety that filled all lovers of peace with apprehension and despondency.

The story of the provocation of France is one of the most pathetic chapters in the history of that brave people. The more pacific they became the more Germany thrust in its goads, the more abundant were her traps and snares; and whilst Sabatier and Saillens were rejoicing over the spiritual regeneration of France and commending her unwonted self-restraint and patience the more Germany goaded the Government of France to begin the attack. For over 40 years the policy of provocation was carried on. Bismarck began it, declaring the purpose "to bleed her white." He mutilated the Ems dispatch. He was constantly meddling with the internal affairs of the French people, and threatened war on the ground of their internal policy. He encircled them with suspicion and hostility through the press he controlled. The Kaiser followed on. The triple alliance was formed to complete the isolation of France. In 1896 the Kaiser formed his alliance with Abdul Hamid, the cruel murderer of the Armenians, arranged for the Bagdad Railroad, and took the Moslem world under his protection.

All through these years our Government was doing whatever it could to avoid war. At The Hague conference England labored most strenuously to secure a limitation of armaments. We saw the peril of the increase that was going on from year to year, and our people backed the appeal in every way they could. But no; Germany would have none of it. On the contrary, the appeals for reduction were met by an enormous extension of shipbuilding on the one hand and a vast increase of the land forces on the other.

In defense of her action Germany complained that she wanted "a place in the sun" and that the "powers" were setting up barriers against her advance, and yet from 1884 she had acquired 1,800,000 square miles of territory, i. e., an area larger than Germany and France, Austria and Hungary, Italy and Serbia, Portugal and Bulgaria, and had done so with the consent of the powers alleged to be thwarting her. The real situation was summed up by the general staff in 1914 in the words, "We shall smash France in three weeks, then wheel about and deliver a knockdown blow to Russia before she has time to complete her mobilization. Belgium will offer only the resistance of sullenness. England will not come in at all." Thus they planned to subjugate Europe to the German sceptre. It was with that temper that our Government had to deal, and it is undeniably certain that Viscount Grey strove with the utmost sincerity and with persistent energy for the pacification of Europe. He strained every fiber to keep the peace. Again and again he proposed conferences with a view to peace. At the very last moment, on July 31, four days before the declaration of war—but when Germany was already mobilizing her forces and directing them toward Belgium—he made a new effort for the maintenance of peace. He said to the German ambassador that "if Germany could get any reasonable proposal put forward which made it clear that Germany and Austria were trying to preserve European peace and that Russia and France would be unreasonable if they rejected it, I would support it at St. Petersburg and Paris and go to the length of saying that if Russia and France would not accept it His Majesty's Government would have nothing more to do with the consequences, but otherwise I told the German ambassador that if France became involved we should be drawn in."

Russia also had already sought to persuade Italy to mediate at Vienna in favor of peace, and Italy parted company with her allies, Germany and Austria, and declared that the triple alliance lapsed because the central powers had been aggressive. But Italy's action was in vain. The Czar was still anxious for peace and begged the Kaiser to help him "to prevent such a calamity as a European war."

It is an indisputable fact that our Government did all that it could to allay the storm and preserve the peace of the world. But the German Government had made up its mind, and the neutrality of Belgium was deliberately violated in the face of the treaty of London made on April 19, 1893, between England, Austria, France, Russia, and Prussia on the one hand and the Netherlands on the other.

That action swept us at once over the barriers between peace and war. It was a flagrant violation of law. It was a wrong done to the soul and to the homes of a small nation, a scornful and contemptuous tearing up of a solemn compact in the face of Europe, cynically described by the German Chancellor as "a scrap of paper." Like the shot that rang around the world, and roused the farmers of New England to the defense of their rights, so this calculated and deliberate defiance of an international compact stirred the spirit of Britain to rise and defend the Belgian people. A wave of moral indignation spread through the land. We were compelled to act, and to act in one way. It was the one duty. It was the will of God. We dared not hold back. England would have lost its soul if it had allowed the brave "little one" to be crushed out of existence by the perfidious Kaiser and his military lords.

Immediately we were a united people as we rarely have been before in our long history. There has been nothing like it in the churches; certainly not among our own people. Thousands of the young men of our churches rose with spontaneity and resolute daring to offer the great sacrifice of their lives for the cause. Our workers, Sunday-school superintendents and teachers, deacons, and leaders rallied to the flag as to a most holy task. Many of our ministers volunteered as chaplains and are acting as such. Our Young Men's Christian Associations rendered a magnificent service. The women of our churches were as keen and eager as the men. In short, the nation is one. Five million and forty-one thousand men voluntarily enrolled themselves in the Army before conscription. They could not hold back; the call was of God, and they must respond It was a question of conscience. We are fighting for Christianity against Paganism, for right against cruel might, for liberty against tyranny, for humanity against the works of the devil.

And the course of the war, in spite of our unreadiness to meet its demands, and our mistakes and errors, has completely vindicated the solemn responsibilities we accepted nearly three years ago. Nothing has so completely, so scarifyingly exhibited to us the awful, tragic, tremendous, unaccountable, and unimaginable horror of war. Had it not been demonstrated to the world how the Germans have made war during the last two years and nine months, we should have said it could never have happened, men could not be so debased, so brutal, so absolutely diabolical as they have been. But it has happened. The record before us is an unveiling of war such as has not been seen since the sack of Antwerp and Magdeburg. We might even go much further back than that and say such a revelation on the part of individuals supposed to have some culture, some training, some humanity, men never saw. Germany has aroused the abhorrence of the whole of the civilized world. She began by trampling law and treaty under foot in the violation of the soil of Belgium; then staggered humanity in the destruction of Louvain and Rheims; aroused indignation by slaying noncombatants, women and children, at Scarborough; sent out a cold-blooded decree that made the killing of noncombatants not an incident of heated warfare, not an accident, no, but a regular method of obtaining military advantage, and sent a thousand innocent people to death in the Lusitania. Lord Bryce's report consists of sifted evidence. We had difficulty in believing what is found in our papers. We said there must be exaggeration. This and that could not be true; but here you have the proofs set out by one of the most important and most responsible committees that ever sat on any international question. That committee says:

"It is proved—

"1. That there were in many parts of Belgium deliberate and systematically organized massacres of the civil population, accompanied by many isolated murders and other outrages.'

"2. That in the conduct of war generally innocent civilians, both men and women, were murdered in large numbers, women violated, and children murdered.

"3. That looting, house burning, and the wanton destruction of property were ordered and countenanced by the officers of the German Army. That elaborate provision had been made for systematic incendiarism at the very outbreak of the war, and that the burnings and destruction were frequent where no military necessity could be alleged, being, indeed, part of a system of general terrorization.

"4. That the rules and usages of war were frequently broken, particularly by the using of civilians, including women and children, as a shield for advancing forces exposed to fire, to a less degree by the killing and wounding of prisoners, and in the frequent abuse of the Red Cross and the white flag."

Add to that the sinking of hospital ships at sight, the murder of Capt. Fryatt, the execution of Nurse Cavell, the cruel deportations of men and women from Belgium and France; these and other atrocities have opened the eyes of the world to the corrupted soul of Germany, and compelled a united and universal condemnation of its aims and policy, its ambitions, and spirit.

Now, it is because we are seeking to bring this calamitous reign of barbarism and savagery to an immediate end that we hail with profound thankfulness and boundless hope the entrance of America into this European war. It is a mighty event for you and for us. We are inclined to say of it what Charles James Fox exclaimed of the fall of the Bastille, "How much the greatest event in the history of the world, and the best!" The revolution of 1789 has been wonderfully reproductive in its fruitfulness; but the revolution in the policy of the United States in 1917 will abound immeasurably more in the sum of good that will issue from it to the whole world.

Already it has fed our faith in the justice of our choice and the purity of our motives. Our faith is confirmed. We were sure that we were in the one and only right way at the beginning, but your action has developed and perfected our confidence, renewed our patience, and inspired us to further sacrifices on behalf of the vital human causes at stake. As our prime minister, Mr. Lloyd George, said: "The Americans coming into the war give the final stamp and seal to the character of the conflict as a struggle against military autocracy through the world."

How gladly we read the noble testimony of President Wilson. For what he says of you he says of us. "There is not a single selfish element in the cause we are fighting for. We are fighting for what we believe and wish to be the right of mankind, and the future peace and security of the world." And Dr. Page, your distinguished ambassador to Britain, says, with equal trust: "We have set out to help as best we can in the enterprise of saving the earth as a place worth living in, not for any material reward, not for territory, not for indemnity, not for conquest nor for anything save only the high duty to succor democracy when it is desperately and villainously assailed. We come with a clear conscience only for an ideal—that is the Republic." We are stronger for that witness. We go forward with a stouter heart and a bolder step, resolved not to submit or yield until the foe is overcome.

Nor can we fail to see that your intervention has burnished and brightened our ideals, set out as they are in language of lofty eloquence and crystal clearness by your President, and sent us forward assured that we are not only on the right path, but that we are going to victory, righteousness, and peace.

Moreover, the peace we seek is all the nearer for your action; it is certain that you will shorten the period of the war, for you bring to our aid the greatest resources of power left in the world, and that in the critical hour of our need. Your help is practical and wise. It offers exactly what we most want—food and ships—and what meets our material as well as our spiritual necessities. The President's appeal is a model of perfect wisdom. It is an appeal to all, and solicits "a great international service army," a notable host engaged in the service of the Nation and the world, the efficient friends and saviors of freemen everywhere; praying them to meet the supreme test of the Nation, the test in which we must all speak, act, and serve together. "We must supply ships," he says, "by hundreds; submarines or no submarines, food supplies must be carried across the seas, no matter how many ships are sent to the bottom." All that is as brave as it is generous, and as sane as it is strong, and can not fail of a mighty response.

Nor can we doubt that the presence of America will be a guaranty for a real and abiding peace and for the abolition of war once and for all from the category of human crimes. It will translate us from the diplomatic atmosphere and the doctrine of "the balance of power" to a "league of nations," based on the final extinction of absolutist autocracies and the cooperation and partnership of nations. America is intensely pacific. With unflagging zeal your leaders have taken a foremost place amongst the men who make peace on earth. Great sums of money have been invested in the interests of peace. Year by year its advocates—lawyers, statesmen, professors, preachers—have gathered at Mohonk; and we are sure the whole influence of America will be concentrated on the task of obtaining a constructive and continuous peace, based on just and wise foundations, not to be broken up by the ambitions and plottings of the few, but framed to abide as long as the sun and moon endure.

Thus your entrance into this war feeds the conviction that, in spite of all that is disastrous, it will achieve great and lasting benefits for mankind and add to the moral health and happiness not only of America and the allies, but of Germany and of all other peoples. It will check the growth of militarism and secure the reduction of armaments. It will make the world, in the fine phrase of your President, "safe for democracy"; secure the ideal of Lincoln, the government of the people, by the people, and for the people; and establish the rights of the individual to a free and full expression of his nature. It will lead to an Areopagus of the nations, which will frustrate the attempts of individuals and cliques with 'interests" to serve and work out plans for social reconstruction in every country, for Poles and Serbs, for Roumanians and Britons; provide for the natural expansion of peoples as well as the settlement of disputes; maintain good faith and uphold public law amongst the nations.

Dear brethren, we know not when this day of strife will end, but however long it may last and however checkered may be its course, our fellowship with one another will be an increasing satisfaction and the assurance of our unity in faith and aim, in effort and in hope, will be an unfailing fountain of strength and joy. We are stronger because you are at our side, and we shall march with surer feet and braver heart because we march together to the new heavens and the new earth in which righteousness and peace shall dwell, not as occasional visitors, but as perpetual guests.

One luminous fact shines like a bright star in the sky of our life. For more than a hundred years America and Canada have dwelt together in peace. The sword was sheathed. An agreement was signed that forts and guns and all the implements of war should disappear from the frontiers of Canadians and Americans. They did. For the first time in the experience of democratic nations it was affirmed that war is not the way to settle the disputes of nations. For the first time an act of disarmament took place, war was repudiated, and arbitration established as the right cause. Half a century later the Alabama arbitration sealed the contract first of all made and justified the hopes entertained of it.

It is a prophecy and a promise.

Praying that the God of righteousness and peace may lead us and enable us to work out His holy will, and hasten the day when Christ our Savior shall be universally acknowledged as King of kings and Lord of lords.

We are, sincerely, yours in the love and service of Christ and His Gospel,

W. W. FULLERTON,
President of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland.

Ex-President of the Baptist World Alliance.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN Q. TILSON,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 15, 1917.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from a very brief business visit to my home town of New Haven. I found the people as usual, filled with patriotism and the desire to manifest it in practical and helpful service. The military registration had been completed, the number registering having exceeded the Government estimate. One big-hearted, broad-backed citizen, always taking a helpful part in every benevolent work, informed me that New Haven was already in sight of the city's allotment of the $100,000,000 for Red Cross work. The cashier of the largest bank in the city showed me a single subscription made by one of our youngest, yet one of our most progressive, manufacturing corporations for $1,000,000 of liberty bonds. Others were doing as well according to financial ability, and all seemed to have the most perfect confidence that the city would subscribe its full allotment.

In fact, everyone seemed disposed to "do his bit" in the great crisis through which the Nation is now passing. Nothing, however, impressed me as much as the subscription made by Admiral Foote Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of New Haven, for a $500 liberty bond. It is, indeed, inspiring to see this small and rapidly diminishing band of the gallant survivors of the great Army that fought the battles of the Republic more than 50 years ago now again responding to the call of their country by investing of their limited post funds in a loan to aid the Government they risked their lives to save in the days of their youth. Awaiting my return to Washington was a brief letter from the acting adjutant of Admiral Foote Post informing me of their action, which I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The letter referred to is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ADMIRAL FOOTE POST, NO. 17,
DEPARTMENT OF CONNECTICUT,
New Haven, Conn., June 9, 1917.

Hon JOHN Q. TILSON, M. C.

DEAR SIR: I take pleasure in informing you that Admiral Foote Post, in their meeting this evening, voted to subscribe for $500 liberty bond.

With our great esteem for you and your good will for us, shown on many occasions, I felt that you should be informed of this action.

Very truly, yours,

D. W. SHARPE, Acting Adjutant.

River and Harbor Bill.

Hon. W. C. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, submits to the American people an illuminating communication on "The Need for the Use of Our Interior Waterways."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. SMALL,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 15, 1917.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me by the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD I have great pleasure in appending a most interesting and timely communication from Hon. W. C. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, to the press of the country, and released for publication on the 14th instant. Secretary Redfield convincingly points out the inability of the railroads of the country to meet the present demands for the movement of traffic, which incapacity will be accentuated with the movement of the fall crops and the increasing demands upon the railroads by reason of the progress of the war.

The Secretary further demonstrates a fact which is apparent to every observant citizen that the only other instrumentality of transportation upon which we can rely with any hope of meeting this congestion of traffic are the interior waterways of the country. He appropriately asserts that it is the patriotic duty of every citizen to cooperate for the improvement of our waterways and for the establishment of additional water carriers.

While these facts are obvious, nevertheless, Secretary Redfield discharged a very essential public service in impressing these economic truths upon the public mind. The most obvious deduction arising out of the present world war is the necessity of every nation engaged in the conflict to mobilize all its resources. While the training of an army and the manufacture of arms and munitions with all the other equipment of war are the primary essentials, yet all these are useless without the production and distribution of the necessary supplies of food and clothing and the numerous other products necessary for the prosecution of modern war. Transportation is a corollary of production, without which industry would be useless. Congress has realized this condition by appropriating millions of money with which to build ships for trans-Atlantic service for the purpose of transporting supplies to our own Army and to our allies. But we must first transport these supplies to our ports. Neither the railroad tracks nor the available cars can meet the demands upon them. As the Secretary so cogently observes, "Where shall we turn for relief except to our waterways?" There is no other recourse.

It must seem strange to intelligent citizens that in the face of this crisis some Members of Congress are contending that we should suspend the maintenance and improvement of our waterways during the period of the war, and are indulging in facetious and unfounded criticism of our waterways. Such opposition can not find defense at the bar of public opinion and will be justly rebuked.

The communication of Secretary Redfield is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington.

THE NEED FOR THE USE OF OUR INTERIOR WATERWAYS.

The president of one of our leading railways has recently said: "The railroads of the United States operated as one system are carrying more freight than ever before in the history of the country, but when they have carried traffic up to 100 per cent of their capacity there still remains 15, 25, perhaps 30 per cent in traffic which it is impossible for them to carry at all." Another prominent railway president stated early in June, 1917: "If the war goes on the total amount of transportation now available will not be enough."

No one who knows the facts will question that the railways of the country are overwhelmed by the present traffic. There is said to be a shortage of 150,000 cars. Radical measures are being taken in an effort to meet the situation. One railway has canceled 200 passenger trains from its summer schedule. Another has withdrawn 40 such trains. Special trains are refused and convention traffic is disapproved. Suggestions are made by railway managers looking toward the more effective use of locomotives and cars. Since the first of last November over 900 new engines and more than 44,000 new cars have been placed in service, and on April 1 orders were outstanding for over 2,000 locomotives and over 100,000 cars. Yet even with these the facilities of the railroads are insufficient for the task laid upon them. As we look toward the future conditions are found to exist which seem certain to make the problem even more serious than it is to-day. It will not be long before large bodies of troops must be moved with their equipment in this country. We shall soon have our own Army in France and shall add to it from time to time, and this will mean an insistent demand for the regular uninterrupted flow of munitions and supplies from our industries to our seaports. Each of the 16 new cantonments for troops, which must be ready by September 1, will require over 1,300 carloads of lumber. Already in the Southwest the harvest has begun. If all kinds of crops—cereals and vegetables—are taken into consideration, a much greater acreage has been planted than ever before, and this increase is largely in perishable foods which must be moved quickly to be available. The demand upon our canning and preserving industries is greater than ever before and likely to increase. The season upon the Great Lakes has been late, with less than the usual time available for transporting the large bodies of ore waiting to be moved and the masses of coal required in our Northern Central States. The congestion upon our railroads is not likely to diminish, and only the ablest management and the largest available equipment will make it possible for them to conduct the national traffic without serious delays. To this a railroad officer points in saying: "It will be absolutely necessary to use such transportation as there is for essential things. The public should willingly give up the nonessentials."

It is, of course, true that the utmost cooperation must prevail between shippers and carriers to keep things moving. To this end a circular letter was issued by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, addressed to the 7,000 trade organizations in the country, urging the maximum capacity loading of freight cars by users and the elimination of delays in unloading. This has met with an encouraging response, but it is not sufficient and can not be made sufficient to solve the serious transportation problem which confronts the country. The condition is such that our railway plant used to its utmost is insufficient for the work, and likely to become still more so as demands upon it increase. Under these circumstances it is necessary that every possible use be made both for local and through freight of all interior waterways, canals, rivers, and lakes; and this must be done not only as generally but as quickly as possible if we are to escape serious congestion.

There is more than sufficient business for both railway and waterway for many months to come. Wherever, therefore, throughout the country a barge or a boat, a scow, a lighter, or a motor vessel can be made to take the place of a railway car it ought to be done. Such arrangements as are practical should be made along all our great waterways to develop promptly methods for using the water as a means of transportation. This is the time to get idle barges and scows into use, to repair old barges, to build new ones, and to take advantage of a patriotic duty of water transit in every practicable way. The Chief of Engineers, United States Army, states:

"Fortunately these boats are of comparatively simple construction and can be rapidly built if all boat yards are fully utilized for this purpose. In fact, these barges could be built at innumerable points along the streams and launched without accumulation of expensive machinery or plant, as it is practically a question of supplying the relatively simple materials and the labor required in actual construction of the boats. Tonnage capacity can doubtless be created by such barge construction much more rapidly than by car construction."

Cities and towns on waterways ought in their own interests to take steps to encourage water transit and to extemporize, if needs be, means for bringing it quickly into service. Public bodies like chambers of commerce and boards of trade should also take the matter up actively where conditions make it possible to do so and give their support to the men who endeavor to develop transportation by water on a temporary or permanent basis. It is encouraging to note the proposed formation of companies to conduct transportation on the Mississippi River. Such organizations to-day do a patriotic and most helpful service. They should be helped forward wherever they may be started in every reasonable way.

If, as is quite possible, the war shall last more than a year, our Nation may find itself a year hence with its industries of all kinds driven to the full and with special energy devoted to more extensive as well as more intensive cultivation. At the same time our troops will have to be moved and the regular flow of supplies maintained for the armies abroad. It will be difficult, if not impossible, to expand the railroad system in time to meet the additional demands upon it which these circumstances may bring. Many of the great waterways of the land, however, are almost unused, and a great opportunity for national service is open by means of them to those who have the energy and foresight to take the matter up and develop water transportation into a practical fact. Every river, lake, and canal should be used. Every enterprise, large or small, looking toward their practical use should have encouragement. The president of one of our greatest railway systems has recently said, "So long as the war lasts the railroads of the United States will cooperate to the fullest possible extent with the waterways of the country in order that the needs of the country may be served.

It must be evident to reflecting men that nothing which advances the interests of the country as a whole can be permanently hurtful to the great transportation systems of the land. There is no reasonable basis for antagonism between the railway and the waterway. Each is the servant of the other, and the success of each is in the long run helpful to the other. It is not to the final and the largest interest of the railway that the waterway should be neglected. Each has its own place in the national economy, and the highest success of each depends in no small measure upon the success of the other. It is at this time a matter of national duty to develop the interior waterway and to give it that part in the Nation's economic life to which its extent and variety entitles it, and this should be done as promptly and as thoroughly as possible by temporary means if need be in order to get the traffic moving, and then by permanent means in order to make the movement a solid part of our national life. This process can only be helpful in the long run to everyone concerned and to the country as a whole.

This circular should be a call to the patriotic citizen who can help along. It means that he who has an available barge or scow or motor boat should use it; that the small yards where these can be built should get busy and repair old ones and build new ones. It is a call to those who insure merchandise moving by water to do so at reasonable rates, lest by excessive charges they become obstructors to the public good. It is a call to those who perform such services as towing to do the work at a reasonable charge, lest they in their turn stand in the Nation's way. No financial reward compensates for holding back the movement which the country needs. We have a wonderful national endowment in the Mississippi River and the great streams that flow into it, in the rivers of the South, the West, the East. That endowment lies largely idle, but now is the time which calls for its use. The problem is, of course, an economic one, but it is more than that—it is a patriotic one. Let him that can come to help, thinking first of his country and second of himself.

A committee under the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense has been formed to advise in promoting the immediate use of all our waterways. As at present constituted it consists of George E. Bartol, president of the Philadelphia Bourse; Brig. Gen. William M. Black, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington; Capt. J. F. Ellison, Cincinnati, Ohio, former secretary of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress and late general manager of the Amazon Navigation Co.; Joy Morton, Chicago, Ill., a director in many financial, mercantile, and transportation companies; James E. Smith, St. Louis, Mo., president of the newly formed Mississippi Valley Waterways Association; Walter S. Dickey, Kansas City, Mo., manufacturer of clay products and president of the Kansas City Missouri River Navigation Co.; and M. J. Sanders, president of the New Orleans Board of Trade and representative for many years of the Leyland Line of steamers. The address of the committee is Room 1042, Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

The effort to promote the use of our waterways has the approval of the War Department, the Commerce Department, and the Shipping Board, and so far as they can these will cooperate in the work. The Department of Commerce, therefore, issues this statement to indicate on behalf of our commerce how grave the situation is, and to ask from business and commercial organizations everywhere that the practical help to be given in this emergency by water transportation have their early and thorough consideration.

The Webb Export Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. VOLSTEAD,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 15, 1917.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, on June 4, 1917, appeared in the Economic World an article that in clear and convincing fashion points out what seems to me some fundamental objection to the policy sought to be established by the passage of the so-called Webb export bill. To call attention to these objections I submit the article for insertion in the RECORD under leave to print. The following is the article:

COOPERATIVE SELLING V. THE MIDDLEMAN IN THE UPBUILDING OF OUR FOREIGN COMMERCE—CAN THE MIDDLEMAN ADVANTAGEOUSLY BE ELIMINATED FROM FOREIGN TRADE?

[By W. P. Goemann.]

I. THE COMMONLY ACCEPTED PICTURE OF EXISTING CONDITIONS.

Business leaders have of late set up the claim that our existing system of exporting through either a direct selling organization or by middlemen—importers, exporters, commission houses, or manufacturers' agents—is inefficient, wasteful, and therefore an insurmountable obstacle to the expansion of our foreign trade. In their opinion, the future of our overseas commerce demands that the Sherman law be amended so as to permit manufacturers to combine for the purpose of handling foreign sales on a cooperative basis. This contention has been indorsed by almost every important chamber of commerce and trade association in the country. President Wilson has repeatedly urged Congress to legalize such combines. The Federal Trade Commission has officially stamped them with its approval and submitted a voluminous report to Congress for the purpose of proving that cooperative selling is sound in theory and workable in practice.

America's handicap: What does this report prove? It vividly outlines the handicaps under which the American exporter labors. It shows how European transportation costs from factory to shipboard are lower than American charges, because or special export rates and of shorter hauls. The lack of an American merchant marine and the resulting slow and irregular shipments at artificially high rates are clearly established. For example: The American prices of both coal and cement are lower than those quoted in Europe; yet our producers of both commodities are undersold by European producers in the South American market because of the discrimination by the shipping combine against traffic originating in American ports. The commission points out how trade is hampered by the absence of American banks in foreign countries, able to supply dollar exchange, discount notes, collect drafts, furnish credit to American exporters and the importers of American goods, and willing to give reliable information on local business conditions and ratings. The small overseas investments of the United States are cited, and it is shown how trade "follows the loan." Thus, when Messrs. M. Samuel & Co., of London, loaned $50,000,000 for the development of Hankow, China, they specified that all materials required must be purchased through their London office. The report proves also that the sale of American goods is made difficult, if not impossible, by the fact that the public utilities and industries of half the world are controlled by European capital and managed by European engineers and superintendents. Again, the report brings out the fact that the American manufacturer does not study the customs, needs, or prejudices of foreign consumers—being kept busy by the home market. All of the foregoing are very real obstacles to America's commerce, but they can not be removed by an amendment to the Sherman law, which does not affect them in the slightest degree.

These are the handicaps under which importers and exporters of American products have been compelled to fight the country's commercial battles. In spite of them, however, they have not only held past gains but have increased American exports year by year. In 1900 United States exports were valued at $1,370,763,571; in 1905 they had grown to $1,491,744,641; while in 1913, the last year before the war, they amounted to $2,428,506,358. Wholly or partly manufactured goods, the most desirable class of exports, are also being sold abroad in increasing volume; in 1900 they constituted 58.70 per cent of the total exports; in 1905, 60 per cent; while in 1913, 62.03 per cent of American goods purchased by foreign countries came under this classification. Can the economic organization which has done this with inadequate facilities be called a failure?

Economics of cooperation: The Federal Trade Commission believes that cooperative selling would result in better service, do away with needless expense, and enable the small manufacturer to compete on equal terms with foreign rivals. But it does not attempt to furnish proof of these claims. On page 13 of the commission's report it declares: "The report is limited in that no detailed description is given of the agencies by which American export trade and that of other countries is carried on." The commission would establish the inadequacy of an institution which it does not analyze. This task it leaves to the business men and publicists whose opinions the commission prints. The advantages they claim for cooperation are primarily two: First, general advantages; second, an improved selling system. In the first group would be placed: The ability of a combine to study the needs of foreign markets; to hire efficiency experts capable of advising members as to how these requirements can be met; to conduct extensive advertising and educational campaigns for the purpose of creating a demand for American products; to maintain a joint credit bureau. In the second group would be found: The elimination of competition between American exporters by fixing price, limiting supply, standardizing products, dividing territory, and establishing rigid terms and conditions of sale; the maintaining of foreign offices and warehouses in charge of a staff of experts; the handling and financing of orders which are too large for the individual manufacturer; the lowering of transportation costs by shipping in shipload lots; the development of trade which can not be profitably carried on at present; the securing of all of these advantages, while lowering selling costs by dividing the expenses among many exporters.

Manufacturers or exporters who believe that the benefits outlined in the first group would justify the necessary outlay can at present legally combine to further these objects. Countless trade associations in all parts of the United States are doing all these things without violating the law. A consideration of these facts leads to the conclusion that the first group is, as salesmen say, "a talking point."

The question of standardization of prices, products, and trade practices can not be gone into in detail, but it should be carefully considered whether the rapid progress which American industry has made in the past can be continued if the inefficient are protected, while the efficient are hampered by agreements. Superior service, lower prices, and increased sales have always followed the ceaseless trying out of new methods and products and the instant adoption of improvements which are the results of keen competition. It is well known that a wide variety of products stimulates consumption.

II. THE FUNCTION OF THE MIDDLEMAN.

Foreign trade and the middleman: In regard to the improved selling methods possible under cooperation all of the discussion is devoted to cooperation versus direct selling. The importers, exporters, commission houses, and manufacturers' agents are not considered; therefore, their inefficiency is not established. It is not shown how or why cooperation would result in better service or lower costs—and service and cost are the basis of all trade. Thirty-five United States consuls prepared special reports for the Federal Trade Commission on the influence of foreign combinations on American trade. It is significant that not a single consul believed that combination of American exporters was necessary, while many expressed the opinion that it would not prove practical. These men, who are studying the methods of successful exporters in all parts of the world, stated that if banking and shipping facilities are provided the middleman can dispose of all goods that are adapted to foreign markets, into which entry is allowed by tariff provisions.

The importance of the middleman as a trade factor is shown by the fact that before the war Great Britain, with 590 large firms doing business in China, controlled 56 per cent of its imports; Japan, with 1,269 concerns, most of which were small merchants, transacted 20 per cent of the business; the 131 American firms were able to secure 6 per cent of the trade; while Germany's 296 merchants handled 5 per cent. English textiles are known all over the world; in 1913 Great Britain's textile exports amounted to $885,000,000, against Germany's $280,000,000 and $75,000,000 for the United States. This huge trade has been built up by the middlemen who market England's woolens and cottons. Prof. O. M. W. Sprague, of Harvard University, testified: "Practically all British export trade has been developed by export houses, not by combinations of producers, and not by means of direct representation of single producers." On page 95 of its report the Federal Trade Commission also comments on this well-known fact, declaring that "British export trade has been built up in general by merchants men not concerned with manufacturing, but with buying and selling only."

The middleman as a specialist: It is not generally known that the middleman won this important place in world commerce in direct competition with huge combines. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries great chartered companies, of which the Hudson Bay and East India companies are the most familiar, "eliminated the wastes of competition" by dividing the world into trading zones. These companies were given a legal monopoly. They were favored by the Government in every possible way. They enjoyed every advantage peculiar to big business. Still they were displaced by individual traders, who succeeded where they had failed, by concentrating on a limited territory, by a quicker turnover of a smaller capital, by freedom from hampering regulations, by instant adjustment to local conditions, by their expert knowledge of all phases of the business. They were specialists. Modern business is controlled by the specialists. Experience has shown that the best results can be obtained and financial stability increased by distributing the risks of commerce over a wide area.

The degree of concentration and freedom permitted by this system increases efficiency and penalizes the inefficient. This is of peculiar importance in exporting which can not be standardized, as every market must be handled differently. Therefore, trade can reach its maximum only if each market is developed by independent traders able and willing to accept full responsibility in regard to credits, present demands, and future needs. This is best shown by reprinting the qualifications which the Federal Trade Commission believes a successful textile exporter must possess: "The merchant exporter must know every detailed requirement of every country to which he would export, the weight and fineness of cloths required by the consuming public, the colors, the class of pattern demanded by the fashions of the respective countries, the customs and requirements as to credits, the tariff imposed upon each class of goods, the port charges, the kind of packing required, the size of package to which dealers are accustomed, length of piece required by purchaser, the color of paper in which the package should be wrapped to conform to the custom of the trade, and all of the other minute details which form so large a factor in determining success or failure in foreign markets."

These are a few of the services rendered by the middlemen. The competition among them is very keen, so that the manufacturer whose goods can satisfy a local demand at a reasonable price can always find houses eager to handle the same. Their inability to sell goods which can not meet the acid tests of price, quality, and adaptation to local needs is viewed by many manufacturers as an unncessary limitation on their sales, and is, therefore, advanced as an argument for cooperative selling, which would, it is said, be able to develop trade that can not be carried on under existing conditions. An attempt of this kind to change the customs of an importing nation is not business but benevolent gambling. At the present time all reasonable possibilities are quickly developed by the importers and exporters who are found wherever goods are bought and sold.

A world-wide organization: Although each individual trader is absolutely independent and financially responsible, the importers of different countries handle each other's goods, so that, viewed as a whole, they form a world-wide sales organization. No matter how insignificant a country's commercial life may appear, no matter how small its volume of trade may be, individual traders by acting as distributors for a wide variety of commodities will be able to do a profitable business. Thus, in the most inaccessible regions of the Congo traders are found who purchase and export rubber, ivory, gum copal, cocoa, and copper; while acting as importers and distributors of textiles, hardware, foodstuffs, etc. Individually, traders of this type may not appear to warrant serious notice; but they are found by the thousands in all parts of the world so that, collectively, they transact a trade which yearly runs into the hundreds of millions.

At the other extreme, of course, are found the giant importers and exporters, like the Japanese firm of Mitsui & Co., which has 1,525 employees and a combined capital and reserve of 35,000,000 yen ($17,000,000); or Jardine, Mathson & Co., with headquarters in Shanghai, who control and manage steamships, railroads, banks, cotton mills, and other enterprises. Trading houses of this size are not confined to the Orient; they are found all over the world.

No matter what the size or character of these traders they are all firmly established as part of the economic life of the country and community in which they do business. Their heads are respected citizens and influential in business circles—often having an interest in or controlling local enterprises. At all times they can obtain the willing cooperation and support of the local financial and political powers.

Can the middleman be displaced? Could a so-called cooperative system displace these traders, or would it merely create a new set of middlemen? No organization, however large, could displace or ignore the small local traders through whose hands the commerce of the world passes. Their overhead expenses are so widely distributed that there is not the slightest reason for believing that the costs for this service could be lowered. The combines' success would depend on the maintenance of the most cordial relations with them. Therefore, the dissension which would be caused by an arbitrary attempt to fix terms and price or to limit supply would merely play into the hands of trade rivals of other countries, who would make every effort to capture this trade by offering satisfactory terms.

But the small trader is merely a secondary consideration in the great cooperative scheme, the foundation of which is the establishment in leading commercial ports of showrooms, offices, and warehouses to permit the carrying on of a direct wholesale business. In this case the middlemen are the rich and powerful importers and exporters who at present control this trade. They would accept the entrance of the combine as an open challenge and would fight it by every means in their power. Would a conflict of this kind benefit American commerce? Mr. F. Johnston, of the American Exporter, believes that serious damage to American trade would follow, as "elaborate foreign selling organization for the average manufacturer would not only be unnecessary, generally speaking, but positively detrimental because the important distributing factors would be antagonized at the start and be in a well entrenched position to retaliate." The fight between these two selling systems will be a battle to the death. Which will triumph?

III. MIDDLEMAN OR COOPERATION?

Hundreds of independent traders in both the importing and the exporting countries will be opposing a few huge, unwieldy combines controlled by distant managements. Under these circumstances the individual has many advantages.

Technical knowledge and incentive: Every importer and exporter has a specialized knowledge of the commercial and industrial conditions of the district in which he does business. He has first-hand knowledge of the country's distributing methods. He has studied and knows how to satisfy the local prejudices. He knows which habits peculiar to the people can be made the basis of a profitable trade; he is expert in cultivating business of this character. The financial, commercial, and political customs and requirements are clear to him. He knows which laws must be obeyed, which commercial requirements must be met, which business formalities of a semisocial character can not be disregarded. He is perfectly free at all times to take advantage of any opportunity which may present itself—ready instantly to change his methods. He is forced to this attitude of mind by the fact that he has assumed heavy financial responsibilities. His energy and enterprise arise from the fact that his income depends absolutely on business transacted; while incentive is supplied by the knowledge of the rich rewards won by the successful middleman. This combination of knowledge, freedom, responsibility, and incentive has won many a commercial battle. It is enabling Japanese merchants to drive the cotton goods of other countries out of the great Chinese market.

It is a first principle of trade that knowledge of local trade conditions is so valuable as to be almost priceless, for it can only be acquired by long residence and experience. Any attempt to standardize the needs of different markets would result in serious loss of trade. Therefore, there is every reason to suppose that the individual will always be able to maintain this advantage. Little improvement would result from the employment of resident managers whose knowledge and experience would be of little value if they were hampered by inflexible rules. Besides this quick adjustment to new conditions, initiative, energy, and incentive would all be lacking.

Connections and public opinion: Through years of service the middlemen have built up the closest financial and commercial connections in the worth-while importing countries, and have acquired that all-important asset, the good will of the trade there. They have financed the retailers by extension of credits. They are experienced in handling their customers; in many cases their relations have been continued for so long a time that the personal element figures largely. The men who have built these connections are skilled in maintaining them and would strongly resist any attempt to break them up. Could this be done by an American combine?

It is likely that the established middleman would be assisted by local legislation or political action, while he would be strongly supported by public opinion. A combine of foreign manufacturers would be looked upon as a foreign trust trying to drive domestic business men out of business. This is shown by our own agitation against the German potash cartel in 1905, by our antidumping law of 1916, and by the antitrust suit of the United States against the Mexican Sisal Combine. Thus, if popular feeling did not lead to political action, the middleman would still be able to capitalize the prejudice against the "foreign monopolist."

Finance and credits: A large part of foreign trade is financed by the middlemen, who either purchase on a cash basis or by acceptances which can be freely discounted by the manufacturers. The middleman extends credit to his customers on his own responsibility. A combine would be compelled to assume this vast burden. To protect itself it would necessarily maintain rigid credit standards, which would act as a restriction on trade. The trader can take chances which could not be safely taken by representatives whose authority was limited by an arbitrary credit system, for the trader's liability is individual and is limited to a certain territory, the business conditions and possibilities of which are fully known to him. He is in close touch with his customers. As a consequence the credits he gives are always in harmony with the demands of trade, as all possibilities are eagerly financed by opposing traders. The flexibility and widespread distribution of commercial hazards made possible by this system permits trade to be developed to the maximum at the minimum of cost and risk to the manufacturer. If the manufacturer who sells through the middleman himself extends credit to foreign customers, the middleman can supply information based on experience and make collections.

Service and claims: Good will can only be maintained if the many disagreements which are continually arising in business are instantly and completely adjusted to the satisfaction of the customer. The individual engaged in keen competition tries to avoid friction and to clear away misunderstandings as rapidly as possible; he can do this because he is acting on his own responsibility and protecting his own interests. Experience has taught him that dissatisfied customers are a liability which can wreck any business, and that a concession which errs on the side of liberality is often the best policy.

This can not be done by the representative of a combine, who is bound hand and foot by detailed regulations which are drawn up to protect the manufacturer by reducing claims to the minimum. No matter how liberal these allowances may be, they could only be collected after endless "red tape," which would make the customer feel that, after much discussion, he was being given as a favor that which he believed to be a right. One of the objects of cooperation is to lessen the power of the customer, as it is said that "competition only benefits the foreign consumer." True; but the foreign customer pays the bills, and permanent business can only be based on benefit to the consumer. The representatives of powerful organizations are apt to feel that the business is too large to warrant consideration of the "fads" of individual customers—wherein lies the middleman's opportunity.

Expenses: During business depressions the middleman maintains his organization on his own resources; and he is paid solely for results, exports are charged only with expenses actually incurred in making sales. These charges are kept at the lowest possible level by competition. The members of a combine, on the other hand, would have to maintain a complete organization at all times and to provide its running expenses irrespective of the amount of goods sold. In addition, the combine would be forced to spend large sums annually on an elaborate system of supervision. This is an expense which the middleman escapes entirely. Therefore, it is likely that the selling expenses under the "cooperative system" would at least equal the present charges, while there is a strong probability that they would be ultimately increased by high salaries and by attempts to develop unprofitable markets or to change trade customs.

It is doubtful whether a combine could cut transportation charges. At present the middlemen ship in large lots to important distributing points, where shipments are broken up and divided between the various local markets. Goods are also sent in shipload cargoes whenever this is possible, but the volume of trade between two ports does not often justify shipments of this size. Besides this, many middlemen operate or are interested in tramp steamers.

Capital investment: Millions and hundreds of millions of dollars are invested in the aggregate in the innumerable concerns now engaged in the world's foreign trade. Each of these concerns is a financial unit. If a unit of capital is poorly managed or wrongly invested it is swiftly eliminated without loss or danger to trade as a whole. On the contrary, business benefits by this process, as it is only burdened with the carrying charges of capital which is successfully invested. The manufacturer who sells through middlemen derives the benefits of their investment without assuming the slightest liability.

All this would be changed by cooperative associations. The manufacturer would not only be compelled to furnish the capital to duplicate existing facilities, but he would be called upon to make good all losses. The success of the combine would depend on its showing as a whole. A large part of the profits earned by self-supporting trade would be absorbed by the high fixed charges resulting from failure in some markets or semifailure in others. "A chain is as strong as its weakest link." These high carrying charges become a serious handicap when it is considered that the combine would be compelled to compete with capital, every unit of which was self-supporting.

Danger of dissension: How could an expert combine divide orders and allot expenses so as to satisfy all? Every member would have capital invested and would claim "equal rights." Some goods would sell with little effort. Others would be sold with great difficulty; still others would be unsalable. It would be almost impossible to make the manufacturer whose goods did not sell believe that they were "being pushed."

As Mr. C. H. Jones, of the Commonwealth Shoe Leather Co., declares: "If a salesman were carrying my goods and another manufacturer's shoes, and if he did not sell my shoes I would be pretty sure to say he was improperly influenced by the other man." The manufacturer whose goods "sold themselves" would refuse before long to pay high charges so as to finance a campaign to create a market for others' goods. The adoption of a sales and advertising policy would be a source of contention and inside politics. The middleman would surely keep a close watch for the least sign of dissension, and by offering favorable terms to disgruntled members would attempt to break up the combine.

Selling specialities: Again, there are goods which sell because of their perfect adaptation to a limited field. These goods sell on quality, on workmanship, on the results they produce. They can only be marketed by men who are willing to devote time and energy to pushing the product and who have a thorough knowledge of its technical uses. There are four methods by which this class of trade can be handled: First, by direct selling; second, through manufacturers' agents; third, through importers or exporters; and fourth, by cooperation. The first method is used by the Standard Oil Co., the Singer Sewing Machine Co., and the International Harvester Corporation. The second is believed by many to be the ideal method for a small manufacturer to handle foreign sales, as the manufacturers' agent furnishes his own capital, pays his own expenses, is sole agent for a limited field, and is paid only for goods sold. Therefore he produces results. Thus, although the International Harvester Corporation maintains its own selling force in Algeria, the United States consul at Algeria reports that an American competitor, the Walter A Wood Co., whose machines are sold through a local jobber, is steadily gaining a larger share of the business. Many importers and exporters also act as manufacturers' agents. The Federal Trade Commission rightly believes that the small manufacturer can not afford to maintain a foreign selling organization. It also holds that both manufacturers' agents and importers can not properly develop this class of business, as the interest and incentive are lacking—"their profits come from the total, and it is the total with which they are chiefly concerned." Therefore it advances "cooperation" as the only solution. This argument could be used with greater force against a combine, whose representatives assume no financial responsibility and whose income is not dependent on business transacted.

Large orders: It is a debatable question whether it is sound economic policy for combines of manufacturers to finance orders for material for use in enterprises of a constructive kind, which are too large for the individual manufacturer. Is this not the function of the banker and investor? Should not this business be handled by local branches of American banks which can dispose of securities to American investors? Again, many believe that these orders must be handled directly by the manufacturers' own engineers, as machinery of this character is manufactured according to specifications.

Cartels and other combines: It is said that the success of foreign cartels and combines proves that the plan of "cooperation" is workable. The commission's report presents all the evidence favoring cartels in the most favorable light. It must be remembered that the operations of German cartels are a close State secret. Their failures are never permitted to reach the public, while success is proclaimed in all parts of the world. It is admitted that the most successful combine in the world is the German steel cartel. In common with all other German cartels it was formed to maintain domestic prices at an artificially high level. In the course of time it was found that this could only be done if the surplus was instantly removed from the home market. As a means of attaining this end it adopted the policy of selling in foreign markets at any price the goods would bring—German steel has been sold abroad at $7 per ton below the German price—and of paying high export bounties. It can not be said that this trade is negligible, as in 1913, 38 per cent of the total German steel production was marketed by the cartel. Can a sales organization which can only make "sales" by giving goods away be called successful? On page 28 of Part II of the commission's report, Consul General J. G. Lay states that in spite of the strong opposition of the Rhenish-Westphalian Coal Syndicate—the all-powerful coal cartel of which the Government is a member—English coal has displaced German fuel in parts of the German home market. The same authority states that the German cement cartel is being rapidly driven out of foreign markets. The only cartels which have been able to secure a fair price are the potash cartel and the chemical and dyestuff combines. They have done this because the world needed their products, not because their selling methods were better than their competitors. Before the war there were no competitors—potash being a natural monopoly and chemicals an acquired monopoly resting on patent control and the skill of Germany's chemists.

The commission has gone through English industry with a fine comb for the purpose of proving its contention that foreign trade can only be developed by combines. It cites many instances. Most of these are trade associations of the type commonly found in the United States. It gives three isolated examples of the maintenance of a common engineering staff by noncompeting manufacturers—the Egyptian Engineering Co., the Anglo-Chinese Engineers' Association, and the Representation for British Manufacturers—all of which operate in one market, represent a limited number of manufacturers, and do not standardize products, restrict supply, or fix price. The commission does not show that sales have been increased, costs lowered, service bettered, or middle men displaced by these "combines."

The commission devotes a great deal of space to a group of English coal operators, who, it believes, are able to prevent the sale of American coal. To prove this it shows that American New River and Pocahontas coals cost from $2.85 to $2.90 at Hampton Roads, while an English coal of corresponding quality—"best admiralty large"—sells for from $4.62 to $4.74 at Cardiff. American costs are further reduced by the fact that a 6,000-ton cargo can, with the use of automatic machinery, be loaded at Hampton Roads in from six to eight hours, whereas the same operation consumes from six to eight days at a Welsh port. These advantages, which ought to assure a world-wide sale for American coal, are, in the commission's opinion, nullified by a combine of Englishmen who control the coaling stations of the world. But doubt is thrown on this by a few facts contained in Exhibit VI of the report, which show that 7 of the most important members of the English combine act as selling agents for 11 producers of American coal, and by the admission that "apart from the quality of her coal and her geographical situation, England's position in coal export trade may be definitely ascribed to an adequate and cheap supply of marine transportation."

Mr. P. S. Heintzleman, formerly American consul at Mukden, recounts the history of the Japanese Cotton Export Syndicate, which made use of all "economies" claimed for the cartel. In addition, it was granted bank credits at specially low rates as the result of a government guaranty, and was allowed large rebates by the transportation interests. This unfair competition, together with the fact that Mitsui & Co.—one of the world's largest exporters—acted as its selling agent, did not enable the syndicate to displace the independent importer and exporter in the cotton-goods trade of Manchuria. On the contrary, the combine was driven out of business in 1912 after a career of six years. This is but one of the many examples of the failure of "cooperation" in a great country's export trade.

Flag-Day Address of President Wilson.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. EVANS,

OF MONTANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 15, 1917.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted me to extend my remarks, I desire to incorporate an address made by Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, on Flag Day, June 14, 1917, as follows:

FLAG-DAY ADDRESS MADE BY PRESIDENT WILSON AT THE CELEBRATION ON THE MONUMENT GROUNDS.

My fellow citizens, we meet to celebrate Flag Day because this flag which we honor and under which we serve is the emblem of our unity, our power, our thought and purpose as a Nation. It has no other character than that which we give it from generation to generation. The choices are ours. It floats in majestic silence above the hosts that execute those choices, whether in peace or in war.

And yet, though silent, it speaks to us—speaks to us of the past, of the men and women who went before us and of the records they wrote upon it. We celebrate the day of its birth, and from its birth until now it has witnessed a great history, has floated on high the symbol of great events, of a great plan of life, worked out by a great people. We are about to carry it into battle, to lift it where it will draw the fire of our enemies.

THOUSANDS ABOUT TO GO FORTH.

We are about to bid thousands, hundreds of thousands, it may be millions, of our men—the young, the strong, the capable men of the Nation—to go forth and die beneath it on fields of blood far away—for what?

For some unaccustomed thing? For something for which it has never sought the fire before? American armies were never before sent across the seas. Why are they sent now?

For some new purpose, for which this great flag has never been carried before, or for some old, familiar, heroic purpose for which it has seen men, its own men, die on every battle field upon which Americans have borne arms since the Revolution?

These are questions which must be answered. We are Americans. We in our turn serve America, and can serve her with no private purpose. We must use her flag as she has always used it. We are accountable at the bar of history and must plead in utter frankness what purpose it is we seek to serve.

It is plain enough how we were forced into the war. The extraordinary insults and aggressions of the Imperial German Government left us no self-respecting choice but to take up arms in defense of our rights as a free people and of our honor as a sovereign government. The military masters of Germany denied us the right to be neutral.

They filled our unsuspecting communities with vicious spies and conspirators and sought to corrupt the opinion of our people in their own behalf. When they found that they could not do that their agents diligently spread sedition amongst us and sought to draw our own citizens from their allegiance—and some of those agents were men connected with the official embassy of the German Government itself here in our own capital.

They sought by violence to destroy our industries and arrest our commerce. They tried to incite Mexico to take up arms against us and to draw Japan into a hostile alliance with her—and that, not by indirection, but by direct suggestion from the foreign office in Berlin.

DENIED USE OF HIGH SEAS.

They impudently denied us the use of the high seas and repeatedly executed their threat that they would send to their death any of our people who ventured to approach the coasts of Europe. And many of our own people were corrupted. Men began to look upon their neighbors with suspicion and to wonder in their hot resentment and surprise whether there was any community in which hostile intrigue did not lurk.

What great nation in such circumstances would not have taken up arms? Much as we had desired peace, it was denied us, and not of our own choice. This flag under which we serve would have been dishonored had we withheld our hand.

But that is only part of the story. We know now as clearly as we knew before we were ourselves engaged that we are not the enemies of the German people and that they are not our enemies. They did not originate or desire this hideous war or wish that we should be drawn into it; and we are vaguely conscious that we are fighting their cause—as they will some day see it—as well as our own.

IN GRIP OF SAME SINISTER POWER.

They are themselves in the grip of the same sinister power that has now at last stretched its ugly talons out and drawn blood from us. The whole world is at war because the whole world is in the grip of that power and is trying out the great battle which shall determine whether it is to be brought under its mastery or fling itself free.

The war was begun by the military masters of Germany, who proved to be also the masters of Austria-Hungary. These men have never regarded nations as peoples, men, women, and children of like blood and frame as themselves, for whom governments existed and in whom governments had their life.

They have regarded them merely as serviceable organizations which they could by force or intrigue bend or corrupt to their own purpose. They have regarded the smaller States, in particular, and the peoples who could be overwhelmed by force, as their natural tools and instruments of domination.

PURPOSE HAS LONG BEEN AVOWED.

Their purpose has long been avowed. The statesmen of other nations, to whom that purpose was incredible, paid little attention; regarded what German professors expounded in their classrooms and German writers set forth to the world as the goal of German policy as rather the dream of minds detached from practical affairs, as preposterous private conceptions of German destiny, than as the actual plans of responsible rulers; but the rulers of Germany themselves knew all the while what concrete plans, what well-advanced intrigues lay back of what the professors and the writers were saying, and were glad to go forward unmolested, filling the thrones of Balkan States with German princes, putting German officers at the service of Turkey to drill her armies and make interest with her Government, developing plans of sedition and rebellion in India and Egypt, setting their fires in Persia.

The demands made by Austria upon Serbia were a mere single step in a plan which compassed Europe and Asia, from Berlin to Bagdad. They hoped those demands might not arouse Europe, but they meant to press them whether they did or not, for they thought themselves ready for the final issue of arms.

WOULD THROW BELT OF POWER ACROSS SEA.

Their plan was to throw a broad belt of German military power and political control across the very center of Europe and beyond the Mediterranean into the heart of Asia, and Austria-Hungary was to be as much their tool and pawn as Serbia or Bulgaria or Turkey, or the ponderous States of the East.

Austria-Hungary, indeed, was to become part of the central German Empire, absorbed and dominated by the same forces and influences that had originally cemented the German States themselves.

The dream had its heart at Berlin. It could have had a heart nowhere else. It rejected the idea of solidarity of race entirely. The choice of peoples played no part in it at all. It contemplated binding together racial and political units which could be kept together only by force—Czechs, Magyars, Croats, Roumanians, Turks, Armenians—the proud States of Bohemia and Hungary, the stout little commonwealths of the Balkans, the indomitable Turks, the subtle peoples of the East,

DID NOT WISH TO BE UNITED.

These peoples did not wish to be united. They ardently desired to direct their own affairs, would be satisfied only by undisputed independence. They could be kept quiet only by the presence or the constant threat of armed men.

They would live under a common power only by sheer compulsion and await the day of revolution. But the German military statesmen had reckoned with all that and were ready to deal with it in their own way.

And they have actually carried the greater part of that amazing plan into execution. Look how things stand. Austria is at their mercy. It has acted, not upon its own initiative or upon the choice of its own people, but at Berlin's dictation, ever since the war began. Its people now desire peace, but can not have it until leave is granted from Berlin.

ARE IN FACT BUT SINGLE POWER.

The so-called central powers are in fact but a single power. Serbia is at its mercy, should its hands be but a moment freed. Bulgaria has consented to its will and Roumania is overrun.

The Turkish armies, which Germans trained, are serving Germany, certainly not themselves, and the guns of German warships lying in the harbor at Constantinople remind Turkish statesmen every day that they have no choice but to take their orders from Berlin. From Hamburg to the Persian Gulf the net is spread.

EAGERNESS EASY TO UNDERSTAND.

Is it not easy to understand the eagerness for peace that has been manifested from Berlin ever since the snare was set and sprung? Peace, peace, peace has been the talk of her foreign office for now a year and more; not peace upon her own initiative, but upon the initiative of the nations over which she now deems herself to hold the advantage. A little of the talk has been public, but most of it has been private.

Through all sorts of channels it has come to me, and in all sorts of guises, but never with the terms disclosed which the German Government would be willing to accept. That Government has other valuable pawns in its hands besides those I have mentioned. It still holds a valuable part of France, though with slowly relaxing grasp, and practically the whole of Belgium. Its armies press close upon Russia and overrun Poland at their will. It can not go farther; it dare not go back. It wishes to close its bargain before it is too late and it has little left to offer for the pound of flesh it will demand.

SEE POINT WHICH FATE BROUGHT.

The military masters under whom Germany is bleeding see very clearly to what point fate has brought them. If they fall back or are forced back an inch, their power both abroad and at home will fall to pieces like a house of cards. It is their power at home they are thinking about now more than their power abroad. It is that power which is trembling under their very feet, and deep fear has entered their hearts.

They have but one chance to perpetuate their military power, or even their controlling political influence. If they can secure peace now with the immense advantages still in their hands which they have up to this point apparently gained, they will have justified themselves before the German people; they will have gained by force what they promised to gain by it—an immense expansion of German power, an immense enlargement of German industrial and commercial opportunities.

WILL THRUST THEM ASIDE.

Their prestige will be secure, and with their prestige their political power. If they fail, their people will thrust them aside; a government accountable to the people themselves will be set up in Germany as it has been in England, in the United States, in France, and in all the great countries of the modern time except Germany.

If they succeed they are safe and Germany and the world are undone; if they fail, Germany is saved and the world will be at peace. If they succeed, America will fall within the menace. We and all the rest of the world must remain armed, as they will remain, and must make ready for the next step in their aggression; if they fail, the world may unite for peace and Germany may be of the union.

AIM TO DECEIVE MANY PEOPLES.

Do you not now understand the new intrigue, the intrigue for peace, and why the masters of Germany do not hesitate to use any agency that promises to effect their purpose, the deceit of the nations? Their present particular aim is to deceive all those who throughout the world stand for the rights of peoples and the self-government of nations; for they see what immense strength the forces of justice and of liberalism are gathering out of this war. They are employing liberals in their enterprise.

They are using men, in Germany and without, as their spokesmen whom they have hitherto despised and oppressed, using them for their own destruction—socialists, the leaders of labor, the thinkers they have hitherto sought to silence. Let them once succeed and these men, now their tools, will be ground to powder beneath the weight of the great military empire they will have set up; the revolutionists in Russia will be cut off from all succor or cooperation in western Europe and a counter-revolution fostered and supported; Germany herself will lose her chance of freedom, and all Europe will arm for the next and final struggle.

INTRIGUE NO LESS ACTIVELY CONDUCTED.

The sinister intrigue is being no less actively conducted in this country than in Russia and in every country in Europe to which the agents and dupes of the Imperial German Government can get access. That Government has many spokesmen here, in places high and low. They have learned discretion.

They keep within the law. It is opinion they utter now, not sedition. They proclaim the liberal purposes of their masters; declare this a foreign war which can touch America with no danger to either her lands or her institutions; set England at the center of the stage and talk of her ambition to assert economic dominion throughout the world; appeal to our ancient tradition of isolation in the politics of the nations; and seek to undermine the Government with false professions of loyalty to its principles.

WILL MAKE NO HEADWAY.

But they will make no headway. The false betray themselves always in every accent. It is only friends and partisans of the German Government whom we have already identified who utter these thinly disguised disloyalties.

The facts are patent to all the world, and nowhere are they more plainly seen than in the United States, where we are accustomed to deal with facts and not with sophistries; and the great fact that stands out above all the rest is that this is a peoples' war, a war for freedom and justice and self-government amongst all the nations of the world, a war to make the world safe for the peoples who live upon it and have made it their own, the German people themselves included; and that with us rests the choice to break through all these hypocrisies and patent cheats and masks of brute force and help set the world free, or else stand aside and let it be dominated a long age through by sheer weight of arms and the arbitrary choices of self-constituted masters, by the nation which can maintain the biggest armies and the most irresistible armaments—a power to which the world has afforded no parallel and in the face of which political freedom must wither and perish.

For us there is but one choice. We have made it. Woe be to the man or group of men that seeks to stand in our way in this day of high resolution when every principle we hold dearest is to be vindicated and made secure for the salvation of the nations. We are ready to plead at the bar of history, and our flag shall wear a new luster. Once more we shall make good with our lives and fortunes the great faith to which we were born, and a new glory shall shine in the face of our people.

Address of Hon. Dick T. Morgan, of Oklahoma, at the Commencement of Union Christian College, Merom, Ind.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. S. D. FESS,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 15, 1917.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks I insert an address delivered by our colleague, the Hon. DICK T. MORGAN, of Oklahoma, June 6, 1917, at the commencement of Union Christian College, Merom, Ind. Mr. MORGAN graduated at this institution in 1876, and on the forty-first anniversary of his graduation was called to deliver the graduation oration, which follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. DICK T. MORGAN, OF OKLAHOMA, AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF UNION CHRISTIAN COLLEGE, MEROM, IND., JUNE 6, 1917.

The four decades which have just passed cover nearly one-third of the history of the United States under the Constitution. If these years were measured by the progress that has been made and by the changes that have been wrought, they would constitute two-thirds of the history of the Nation. The United States of 1917 is not the United States of 1877. In the period spanned by these years there have been marked and marvelous changes—changes in the occupations and pursuits of the people, changes in the methods and instrumentalities of business, changes in the mode of transportation and communication, changes in the industrial, political, and social forces of the Nation; changes in the spirit of the church, in the character of the school, and in the power of the press, and changes in national problems, in national duties and responsibilities, and in national dangers.

In these years the unerring and invincible hand of time has made alterations and transformations in our national structure. The Great Sculptor of human events has conceived and carved a more imposing statue of the Nation, and the master artist of history has painted a more beautiful, attractive, and inspiring portrait of the American Republic. Silently and yet as irresistibly as the universe rolls through unbounded space these changes have been wrought. In them, through them, and by them the old nation has been buried in the silent tomb of the past and a new nation has been born into the world.

DECLINE OF AGRICULTURE.

Forty years ago agriculture was the chief occupation of our people. Two-thirds of our people resided on the farm. To-day two-thirds of our people reside in our towns and cities.

The sun of agriculture is no longer the center of our industrial universe. Like an immense magnet, the city has drawn the people of the country to it. The tide of our population has poured into our towns and cities like the waters of the Mississippi Valley have flowed into the Gulf. Urban interests dominate rural forces. Factories, mills, and manufacturing plants, stores, mercantile establishments, and commercial houses, trade, transportation, and financial institutions overshadow agriculture. The country which God made is an adjunct of the city which man made, into which for a full century the country has sent the flower of its population and the cream of its wealth.

In these years our population has increased from about 40,000,000 to 100,000,000. Our population has not only grown in numbers but changed its character. Since 1860, 27,000,000 immigrants have come to our shores. These people and their descendants constitute more than one-third of our population. This influx of foreign-born citizens has put new blood in the veins of our people, changed their ideals and aspirations, modified our institutions, and developed new moral, social, political, and economic forces, which have influenced the life of our people, changed the character of our citizenship, and written a new chapter in the history of the Nation.

OUR WEALTH HAS INCREASED.

Within four decades our wealth has increased from $25,000,000,000 to $200,000,000,000. In that wealth there is national strength, national efficiency, and national prestige. In it there may be national peril and national danger. Dollar signs may multiply until they become danger signals.

Within the last 10 years Congress has enacted laws which have to do with the conservation of wealth, the taxation of wealth, the regulation of wealth, the dissemination of wealth, and the creation of wealth. At the present time the measures before Congress attracting the greatest attention are those pertaining to wealth. Wealth presents two main problems: How to produce it successfully and how to distribute it equitably.

Our economic policies have been favorable to the production of wealth. We have not succeeded so well in its equitable distribution. Official records show that we have 120 persons each of whom have a net annual income in excess of $1,000,000; 329 persons each of whom have a net annual income in excess of $500,000; and 3,824 persons each of whom have a net annual income in excess of $100,000. These records show that 336,662 persons have an aggregate net annual income of $6,794,359,400, a sum larger in amount than the value of the annual crops produced by the 6,000,000 farmers of the United States and a sum double in amount the total wages paid in 1910 to more than 7,000,000 persons employed by our manufacturing establishments.

The college graduate of 1917 will be confronted with this wealth. Its influence permeates society, business, and politics, affects every calling, profession, and avocation of life, touches every avenue of human activity, extends to every portion and section of the country, and is felt around every fireside and in every home in the land.

I am not here to denounce wealth, to criticize those who possess it, to belittle its importance to the Nation, or to underestimate its benefits and blessings.

I am here to express my earnest hope that this great wealth shall not become a menace to the Nation; that it shall not be made an instrument of oppression, but that it shall be used for the glory of our country and for the good of mankind.

THE NEW BUSINESS WORLD.

We have had a revolution in the methods and instrumentalities of business. The modern business corporation has been invented. It has become the chief instrumentality in the business world. Our great industrial corporations possess immense capital, employ large numbers of men, control a large percentage of the business in their respective lines, and, combined, they dominate the business interests of the Nation.

The rise of the big business corporation has been the source of political agitation. I shall not enter upon a discussion of the trust question. I will say that our large industrial corporations should be the servants and not the masters of the people. More and more the sentiment prevails that our great industrial corporations are "impressed with a public use"; that the owners and managers should regard themselves, in a way, as trustees for the public; and that, in the administration of this trust they should have in view the rights of the public, the prosperity of the country, and the welfare of the millions of men they employ.

THE LABOR WORLD.

Concentration in business has had its counterpart in the organization of labor. The American Federation of Labor has a membership of more than 2,000,000 persons. It is a national organization of great activity and influence. Under it are State and local organizations. Our labor organizations have not attained the zenith of their power. Neither have we determined how we shall settle controversies between capital and labor.

Public sentiment, the great arbiter in labor disputes, recognizes that both capital and labor have rights, and that justice should be done both. It demands that capital shall be protected and rewarded, and that wage earners shall have adequate compensation, favorable working conditions, reasonable hours of labor, and such other advantages and opportunities as comport with the rights and dignity of American citizenship.

INVENTIONS HAVE INFLUENCE.

The human mind can not comprehend the influence which modern inventions have exerted. In the earlier days came the cotton gin, the steamboat, the railway, the telegraph, the sewing machine, and the reaper. In later years we have added the typewriter, the telephone, the phonograph, the electric light, the electric railway, wireless telegraphy, the linotype, the automobile, the aeroplane, and thousands of other inventions which have many times multiplied the man power of the Nation.

In their combined influence these inventions have revolutionized trade, transportation, and commerce, changed the habits, customs, and occupations of our people, opened new fields of employment, made new opportunities for our people, and contributed in a thousand ways to the building of the new nation of 1917.

POLITICAL WORLD CHANGES.

The political atmosphere has been modified and purified. Corruption in politics has diminished. Fraud in elections has decreased. A higher standard of morals is demanded of public officials. Candidates are limited in the use of money. Publicity of campaign expenditures is required. A secret ballot is in the hand of the voter. The old-fashioned nominating conventions have been abolished. Primary elections are in vogue. The initiative and referendum are in use. The recall is being tested. United States Senators are elected by direct vote of the people. And many other reforms have been adopted.

All along the line our political machinery has been remodeled, improved, liberalized, modernized, and perfected. The tallow candle and the kerosene lamp have ceased to be the lights of our poltical highways. In their stead electric lights have been installed. Now, as never before, political maneuvers are conducted in the bright light of the noonday sun.

On the whole, these changes have been for the better. There is still room for improvement. The rising generation should go forth into the world imbued with the spirit of political reform, determined that in this free country we shall have decent politics, honest elections, a free ballot, and a fair count.

THE PRESS KEEPS PACE.

The press has kept pace with the progress of the world. It constitutes one of the great educational forces of the Nation. Newspapers and magazines have multiplied in number, improved in character, and grown in influence. They disseminate information and knowledge, publish the news of the day, record the events of the world, print editorial comment and criticism, discuss the questions of the hour, and are welcomed as friends and companions in practically every home in the land. They are all powerful in the political world; they mold public sentiment, and public sentiment rules the world. The press has contributed largely to the progress of the Nation and has been one of the great lights which has guided the American people to higher attainments, to greater achievements, and to a loftier civilization.

THE RELIGIOUS WORLD.

In these years the religious world has changed. Our churches are more liberal toward each other. The spirit of Christian union prevails. The missionary spirit is more pronounced. The men and mission movement has been nation wide in its influence. Christian colleges and universities have multiplied, their equipment has been enlarged and improved, and vast millions have been given for their endowment. A philanthropic wave swept over the country and touched the hearts of many men possessed of great wealth.

During the last 25 years more than $3,000,000,000 have been given for educational, religious, and philanthropic purposes. In the centuries to come these gifts will be a perpetual power for the extension of Christianity, for the promotion of Christian education, and for the enlargement of the influence of our benevolent and philanthropic institutions.

GREATER NATION DEVELOPED.

In all our marvelous changes a greater and better Nation has been produced. Our population is greater than the combined population of England and France, and a little less than the combined population of Germany and France. Our wealth is greater than the combined wealth of England and France and greater than the combined wealth of German and France. A high English authority recently estimated that the annual savings of our people were $4,000,000,000—an amount almost equal to the combined annual savings of all the people of England, Germany, and France.

We lead all other nations in agriculture, in mining, in manufacturing, in our means of transportation and communication and in our internal commerce. Our resources surpass by far those of any other nation. Our educational facilities are of the highest character. We have attained eminence in art, science, and literature. Our people excel all others in inventive genius and our citizens are the most intelligent and progressive in the world.

WHAT MADE US GREAT?

The question arises, What made this country great? It may be asserted that the building of this new Nation has been due to climatic conditions, to the extent of our area, to the fertility of our soil, to the wealth of our mineral deposits, to the gold and silver hidden in the mountains of the West, to the vastness of our forests, to our Great Lakes, our mighty rivers, and our splendid harbors. But all these things were here throughout the centuries of the past, while this continent remained a wilderness inhabited by an uncivilized race. All these things were here during the 300 years following the discovery of America, and still there was no great nation on the American Continent.

Our reliance in the future should not be placed in our natural resources, in our great wealth, nor in the strength of our Naval and Military Establishments. Our safety is in our citizenship. Should the time unhappily ever come when this citizenship shall materially deteriorate in physical strength, in intellectual vigor, or in moral stamina the American Republic will decline, its power will recede, its strength will weaken, its influence will wane, and its glory will fade.

DUTIES OF CITIZENS.

On March 4, 1909, for the first time in my life, I witnessed the inauguration of a President. I saw William Howard Taft hold out his hand and touch the Holy Bible held by the Chief Justice of the United States. I heard him repeat the solemn oath of office which made him the Chief Executive of the Nation and placed in his keeping the welfare of 100,000,000 American citizens. This oath gave to one man immense power, placed upon him tremendous responsibility, imposed upon him the most arduous duties, and placed him in a position where his influence would be felt throughout the world.

A few days later I saw the Representatives elect assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives. I saw them, in groups by States, march down in front of the Speaker, hold up their hands, and take the oath of office which gave to each of them power in the National Government, and gave to them new duties to perform and additional responsibilities to bear.

The President and Senators and Representatives in Congress should be true to the trust reposed in them and should faithfully and diligently discharge the duties of their offices. It should be borne in mind, however, that the same Constitution and laws which give power to these high public officials also give power to every voter and impose duties and responsibilities upon every citizen. The voter and the citizen are under the same obligation to perform their duties as the President is to perform his duties. Fundamentally it is not the public officer but the citizen who holds the destiny of the Nation in his hands.

GOOD CITIZENSHIP.

Good citizenship is the basis of good government. Good laws contribute to good government, but good laws do not necessarily make good government. With good citizens and bad laws there will be better government than with bad citizens and good laws. The laws do not make the citizen—the citizen makes the laws. Then, what are some of the chief characteristics of good citizenship?

Industry is one of the elements of good citizenship. No one can be a good citizen who is not industrious. Every citizen should have some useful and honorable business or profession or engage in some work which will contribute to the good of society.

The selection of a calling for life is sometimes a difficult problem for young people. As a matter of fact, it is not so important what you do as how you do it.

I saw a Representative resign his seat in Congress rather than face charges which had been filed against him. I saw a United States Senator expelled from the Senate—said to be the greatest legislative body in the world—on account of alleged fraud in his election. I saw a United States judge impeached by the House of Representatives. I witnessed his trial before the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, under the Constitution, and I heard the judgment of conviction which drove him from his exalted position, robbed him of his power, and sent him out into the world in disgrace and dishonor. These incidents, and others like them which might be mentioned, show that it is not the office one holds, but the conduct of the incumbent in office, which brings distinction, credit, and honor. So it is in private life. It is not what you do, but how you do it, that brings success in life, recognition in the world, and earns for you the gratitude of your country.

When a life work is selected it should be pursued with industry, energy, and persistence. There can be no national success, there can be no individual success, without industry. Industry is the master key which unlocks the door of success for the nation as well as for the individual. Failure is the inevitable penalty which idleness imposes; success is the reward, the golden crown of life, which industry bestows. There is no demand in any business, calling, or profession for the idle, indolent, lazy man. He is a dead-weight to his community and country, a stumbling block in the way of progress, and a promoter of disorder, mischief, immorality, and crime.

MORALITY IS GREAT FORCE.

Morality is an element of good citizenship. There are two great forces in the world—good and evil. They are antagonistic in their nature. Between these forces there can be no "peace without victory"—no compromise, armistice, or truce. You can not be neutral between these forces. You must align yourself on one side or the other. It is your duty to enlist under the banner of righteousness and resist evil in all its forms, phases, and aspects. There are many ways this may be done.

We may resist evil, first, by our words, by what we say, by the wrong we denounce and the right we uphold; second, we may resist evil by the lives we live, by the deeds we do, and by the examples we set; third, we may resist evil by giving our time, talent, and money for the advancement of every good cause; fourth, we may resist evil by cooperation with others—by cooperating in the building and supporting of churches, in the founding and maintaining of Christian colleges and universities, and in organizing and promoting various kinds of societies, institutions, and movements which will uplift the world and increase the sum of human happiness.

RIGHTS OF OTHERS.

Regard the rights of others. The Government, which imposes duties, also confers rights and privileges. These rights are valuable. Under our free Government the rights and privileges of citizenship are sacred and priceless. Under no conditions should a citizen be deprived of these rights and privileges. To do so violates the fundamental principles upon which organized society is based and upon which civil government is founded. Young people make it a rule to regard the rights of others. By doing so you will add to your personal popularity, promote your success in business, contribute to the peace and good order of your community, and illustrate by your conduct one of the most valuable traits of citizenship.

In our National Capital, there are many statues, monuments, and memorials erected in honor of American citizens who have rendered conspicuous service for their country. Two of these monuments tower above all others. One is the Washington Monument, the other is the Lincoln Memorial. Washington and Lincoln did not live for themselves alone; they did not die for themselves alone. Washington was the founder of this Republic; Lincoln was its preserver. We can not be Washingtons; we can be Lincolns. We can be preservers of this Republic. We can live unselfish lives. If we have wealth, we can use it in the service of others. If we have talent, we can use it for the benefit of humanity. If we hold high positions in life, we can render patriotic service to our country and our fellow citizens. Whether we have little or much we can contribute something for the good of others.

RESPECT THE LAW.

It is the duty of every citizen to respect the law. There can be no organized society, no civil government, without law. We have nearly 100,000 men and women in our Federal and State penitentiaries; we have double this number in our minor prisons; and we have a still larger number of criminals who have escaped arrest, conviction, and imprisonment. We spend more money on our criminals than we do in educating our children. There is no limit to the supply of our criminals. Drought, floods, and insects may destroy our crops, but the annual harvest of criminals never fails.

But these are the criminal classes. Among our citizens generally there should be a higher respect for the law. Too many so-called respectable people do not have the proper regard for the law. This condition should be corrected. Respect for the law should be taught in our homes, in our schools, in our churches, on the rostrum, and in the press.

I appeal to the young people in this audience to go forth into the world determined in your hearts, first, that you will respect the law; second, that you will recognize its supremacy; third, that you will render true and faithful obedience thereto; fourth, that in every appropriate way you will aid in its enforcement; and fifth, that at all times and under all circumstances, you will uphold the law and order, good government, and civic righteousness.

There are two kinds of laws—human and divine. Respect for the human law meets the requirements of good citizenship. The ideal citizen, however, respects the divine law. He selects the Book of all Books for his guide, conforms his life to its teachings and principles, and takes the Chief Character therein revealed—the lowly Nazarene—as his friend, companion, and Savior.

PATRIOTISM MUST RULE.

Patriotism is one of the essential elements of good citizenship. It is the duty of every citizen to revere the flag. The flag is the emblem of our country. The Stars and Stripes symbolize the Nation—with all its people, with all its power, with all its wealth, with all its resources, and with all its institutions. Any insult to the flag is an insult to the Nation and to all its citizens, individually and collectively.

Reverence for the flag means patriotism. Patriotism is the supreme test of citizenship. It has been said, "Love of country is one of the loftiest virtues." It matters not what other virtues a man may have; he is not a good citizen if he does not love his country. The flag should have a place in the home, in the school, in the church, and in the heart of every American citizen.

The unexpected has come to our Nation. We are engaged in war with the foremost military power of the world.

Our Navy is already on the high seas participating in the contest. Thousands have volunteered for service, and are now wearing the uniform of their country. Everywhere our people are responding nobly to the call of our country. No one can foretell the end of the war, or the conditions upon which peace will finally come. In this crisis I put my faith in the character of American citizenship. Hitherto dark clouds have hovered over the national horizon. The American people have always been equal to the occasion. They have met every emergency. They will not fail now. Our people will make any sacrifice that is necessary to conduct this war to a successful conclusion. Abraham Lincoln in his immortal Gettysburg speech expressed the hope "that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom." May it be the earnest prayer of all our hearts that through this war all the nations of the world shall have a new birth of freedom, and that forever thereafter peace shall reign among them.

Democracy of the World.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. IRA G. HERSEY,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, June 18, 1917.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the address of the Hon. Elihu Root, chairman of the United States Commission to the Russian people Friday, June 15, 1917:

PETROGRAD, FRIDAY, VIA LONDON, SATURDAY.

"The Russian people consider war inevitable and will continue it. The Russians have no imperialistic wishes. We know that you have none. We shall fight together to secure liberty, freedom, and happiness for all the world. I am happy to say that I do not see any moral idea or factor between America and Russia to divide us. The two peoples—Russia fighting tyranny and America standing as the oldest democracy—hand in hand will show the way to happiness to nations great and small."

These ringing words, expressing the attitude of the Russian Government toward America and the American mission, headed by Elihu Root, were voiced to-night by Mr. Tereschtenko, minister of foreign affairs, responding for the Council of Ministers to Mr. Root's address of sympathy and good will on the part of the American Government.

The American ambassador, David R. Francis, presented the Root mission to the ministers in the Marinsky Palace, explaining that the mission had come to Russia to discover how America can best cooperate with its ally in forwarding the fight against the common enemy. The presentation was very informal, only a few Russian officials and the members of the American embassy attending. Mr. Kerensky, the youthful minister of war, just back from the front, wore the khaki blouse of a common soldier.

The ministers listened with rapt attention to Mr. Root's address, which was a powerful utterance, both in substance and manner.

Mr. Tereschtenko rose from a sick bed to attend the presentation, and responded without notes, expressing great joy in welcoming the commission from America. He said Russia's revolution was based on the wonderful words uttered by America in 1776. He read part of the Declaration of Independence and exclaimed, "Russia holds with the United States that all men are created free and equal."

Mr. Tereschtenko sketched the history of the Russian revolution briefly, saying that the Russians, enslaved for centuries, threw off all the old order just as the wind blows autumn leaves from the forest. Russia now faces two problems, said the minister, the necessity of creating a strong democratic force within its boundaries and the fighting of an external foe. Then he declared for war and expressed an unbounded confidence in the power of Russia to meet the situation.

MR. ROOT SPEAKS FOR DEMOCRACY.

"Mr. President and members of the council of ministers," said Mr. Root, "the mission for which I have the honor to speak is charged by the Government and people of the United States of America with a message to the Government and people of Russia. The mission comes from a democratic Republic. Its members are commissioned and instructed by a President who holds his high office as chief executive of more than 100,000,000 free people by virtue of popular election, in which more than 18,000,000 votes were freely cast and fairly counted pursuant to law by universal, equal, direct, and secret suffrage.

"For 140 years our people have been struggling with the hard problems of self-government. With many shortcomings, many mistakes, many imperfections, we still have maintained order and respect for law, individual freedom, and national independence. Under the security of our own laws we have grown in strength and prosperity. But we value our freedom more than wealth. We love liberty, and we cherish above all our possessions the ideals for which our fathers fought and suffered and sacrificed, that America might be free.

"We believe in the competence of the power of democracy, and in our heart of hearts abides faith in the coming of a better world, in which the humble and oppressed of all lands may be lifted up by freedom to a heritage of justice and equal opportunity.

"The news of Russia's new-found freedom brought to America universal satisfaction and joy. From all the land sympathy and hope went out to the new sister in the circle of democracies. And the mission is sent to express that feeling.

"The American democracy sends to the democracy of Russia a greeting of sympathy, friendship, brotherhood, Godspeed. Distant America knows little of the special conditions of Russian life which must give form to the government and laws which you are about to create. As we have developed our institutions to serve the needs of our national character and life, so we assume that you will develop your institutions to serve the needs of Russian character and life.

"As we look across the sea we distinguish no party, no class. We see great Russia as a whole, as one mighty, striving, aspiring democracy. We know the self-control, essential kindliness, strong common sense, courage, and noble idealism of the Russian character. We have faith in you all. We pray for God's blessing upon you all. We believe you will solve your problems, that you will maintain your liberty, and that our two great nations will march side by side in the triumphant progress of democracy until the old order everywhere has passed away and the world is free.

FEARFUL DANGER THREATENS.

"One fearful danger threatens the liberty of both nations. The armed forces of a military autocracy are at the gates of Russia and the allies.

"The triumph of German arms will mean the death of liberty in Russia. No enemy is at the gates of America, but America has come to realize that the triumph of German arms means the death of liberty in the world; that we who love liberty and would keep it must fight for it, and fight for it now, when the free democracies of the world may be strong in union, and not delay until they may be beaten down separately in succession.

"So, America sends another message to Russia—that we are going to fight, and have already begun to fight, for your freedom equally with our own, and we ask you to fight for our freedom equally with yours. We would make your cause ours and our cause yours, and, with a common purpose and mutual helpfulness of a firm alliance, make sure of victory over our common foe.

"You will recognize your own sentiments and purposes in the words of President Wilson to the American Congress when, on the 2d of April last, he advised a declaration of war against Germany. He said:

"'We are accepting this challenge of hostile purpose because we know that in such a Government (the German Government), following such methods, we can never have a friend; and that in the presence of its organized power, always lying in wait to accomplish we know not what purpose, there can be no assured security for the democratic governments of the world. We are now about to accept the gauge of battle with this natural foe to liberty, and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the Nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included; for the rights of nations, great and small, and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience.'

"'The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundation of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.'

AGAIN QUOTES THE PRESIDENT.

"And you will see the feeling toward Russia with which America has entered the great war in another clause of the same address. President Wilson further declared:

"'Does not every American feel that assurance has been added to our hope for the future peace of the world by the wonderful and heartening things that have been happening within the last few weeks in Russia? Russia was known by those who knew her best to have been always in fact democratic at heart in all the vital habits of her thought, in all the intimate relationships of her people that spoke their natural instinct, their habitual attitude toward life. The autocracy that crowned the summit of her political structure, long as it had stood and terrible as was the reality of its power, was not in fact Russian in origin, character, or purpose, and now it has been shaken off and the great, generous Russian people have been added, in all their naïve majesty and might, to the forces that are fighting for freedom in the world, for justice, and for peace. Here is a fit partner for a league of honor.

"That partnership of honor in the great struggle for human freedom the oldest of the great democracies now seeks in fraternal union with the youngest. Practical and specific methods and the possibilities of our allies' cooperation, the members of the mission would be glad to discuss with the members of the Government of Russia."

Italy and the Italian Mission.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ISAAC SIEGEL,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 13, 1917.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, the South has been welcoming the Italian war mission, which arrived here on May 23, and wherever its members have come they have been acclaimed by all of our citizens. It has, indeed, been a triumphal progress which has been awaiting them wherever they have journeyed throughout the United States, and within a few days the people of New York City will extend to them a reception which will equal that which has been bestowed unto Gen. Joffre and Mr. Balfour. It is, indeed, a remarkable change that has occurred in the state of mind of many of our people. Newspapers and others that had in the past plastered the Italian immigrant that has come here with charges and insinuations which those who have come in contact with the Italian people have known to be untrue are now engaged in singing their praises. It has taken this war to awaken many of our people to the realization that the men who have come from Italy have worked here by the sweat of their brow, performing the most arduous kind of labor in all kinds of weather, and many times for small wages. They are commencing now to recognize the fact that whatever may have been said against the Italian immigrant was not expressed after careful thought or deep study. It was the off-handed expression of men who had reached hasty conclusions without thorough investigation. Many things may be said against the city of New York by those who do not know its fullness of heart and its depth of soul. Nowhere in this country is merit more quickly appreciated, regardless of race, creed, or color.

Many people have said of New York that it was a self-satisfied municipality, devoid of real patriotism, and given over to gross materiality. Others have said that it was not an American community, and yet during the past week it has not only subscribed but more than subscribed the amount of liberty-loan bonds that it was expected that its people would take. It presents a lesson to be emulated by all other cities throughout the country, and it points with pride that within its gates are to be found men, women, and children who have come from all over the world and from every part of the United States, proud and happy to be part of it, ready to do their duty to the country, and amongst these is the greatest Italian population to be found in any city of the world.

They are making good progress in every line of endeavor, whether in education, art, or music. They are taking an active interest in civic matters in the city of New York, and the boys of Italian descent can be found in our Army and Navy equal in proportion to the ratio of their population to that of the rest of the country.

The coming of the Italian Mission to the United States is bound to increase our respect for the men who have come from Italy, and when people commence to read, to study, and learn more about those who are in their midst and the country from whence they have come the usual result of knowledge follows, namely, greater respect for neighbors and a feeling of gratitude as well as appreciation for their coming. No words of mine can give adequate praise to the invention of the wireless by one of the members of this mission, Senator William Marconi, and if Italy was only entitled to the admiration of the world for giving to it Marconi and his invention, then posterity would gladly bestow it, but Italy has done more in this war than is generally known.

Italy entered the conflict with the idea of having paid back to her the Provinces along the Trentino and Trieste fronts and has spent about $400,000,000 each year since. It is a remarkable fact that in 20 years' time Italy had so reduced her national debt that at the time when it became one of the belligerents it had only 5 per cent of it due and owing to foreign nations, or, in other words, in a score of years Italy had been able to redeem 45 per cent of its national debt.

The following editorial from the New York Times of May 24, 1917, has this to say about Italy:

ITALY.

It is of good augury that the Italian war mission arrived in Washington yesterday. On May 23, 1915, the Italian Government informed Baron Burian, the Austro-Hungarian foreign minister, that Italy would regard herself as at war the next day; and the first blood in the war between the two nations was shed on May 24. Memorable and splendid were those days and nights of popular emotion in May. At last the great net of German intrigue was torn apart by an angry democracy. From the Villa Malta, on the Pincian Hill, Prince Von Buelow, the sometime chancellor, cleverest of German diplomatists and men of the world, married to a patrician Italian woman, familiar with the Italian language and Italian politics, German special ambassador since the preceding December, had brought to bear all the arts of persuasion, intimidation, corruption.

The great Roman families, the plutocrats, the industrialists, the Vatican, and the "blacks," every class was wheedled; and every class had seemed content with neutrality. Socialists and the bourgeoisie, the army to a considerable extent, the docile, obedient politicians of the Italian Chamber, experts in the gospel of the spoils and machine politics, practiced to perfection for years by the great boss, in or out of office, Giovanni Giolitti; finance, a host of intellectuals, had sworn by Germany. Bismarck had driven Italy into the triple alliance, sowed hatred between her and France by encouraging the latter to take Tunis, "an Italian colony guarded by French soldiers," as some Italian statesman has called it, just as Italy was reaching for it. Bismarck, too, had played the Vatican against the Quirinal. Italy had nowhere else to go. If Austria was her old foe and oppressor, to Prussia she owed the recovery of Venetia, to the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War, Rome.

Germany had "penetrated" the peninsula. The country was prosperous, but the Banca Commerciale, a German institution with an Italian name, had come in 20 years largely to control industry, finance, business. It had money and jobs a manifold clientage, retainers of all sorts, a powerful press, strong, numerous friends in city and national government. It was the boss behind the boss. It was the director and intimate of Giolitti.

Let us remember these things. Let us remember the high generous passion that swept all the Germanophile obstructions away. Belgium and the Lusitania, Ypres and Rheims had stirred the multitudes, though the sleek parliamentarians did not know it. There had been riots in the cities in the early spring, demonstrations at the embassies of the allies. Giolittists had been attacked in the streets. The King had shown his wish as far as he could. On May 5, 1860, Garibaldi and The Thousand left Quarto, near Genoa, on that strange, romantic expedition to free Sicily. There was to be a celebration on May 5, 1915. The King, King "by the grace of God and the will of the people," wrote of Garibaldi's setting forth "with an immortal daring toward an immortal goal."

How d'Annunzio, no longer an Apuleian or a Petronian novelist, but a patriot-poet, wearing the laurel of Carducci, spoke nobly for "Greater Italy" at Genoa and Rome, spoke in the Forum to multitudes, denouncing Giolitti as a criminal and a traitor, denouncing "the lackeys of the Villa Malta"; how in all the cities there were great popular proally demonstrations; how Giolitti's parliamentary majority melted away, the Salandra-Sonnino Ministry was sustained, and war was voted by both chambers, only a few Socialists and bitter clericals opposing; how the Romans, 200,000 strong, a Colonna, Syndic of Rome, at the head, marched in torchlight procession to the Quirinal; how Giolitti fled to Piedmont—if we have forgotten these things, it is right now to recall them.

It is right to recall that in the spring of 1915 every omen pointed to German victory. Since the Marne and the Aisne the British and French had done nothing. The Russian armies had begun their long retreat with incredible loss and slaughter. A Teutonic movement on Kieff or Odessa was looked for by many. Separate peace offers to Russia by Austria and Germany were reported to the Italian foreign office. In dark days, to be followed by dark days, the Italian democracy came into the war for democracy. And after Montenegro and Serbia fell, after the Gallipoli fiasco, while the ferocious German assault was thundering against Verdun and Russia was rebuilding her shattered military machine, what would have happened if Austria could have thrown her whole strength on the eastern front?

For 400 to 450 miles, from the rock of the Carso, past the Carnia and the strange, monstrous red-stained Dolomites, past the Trentino to the Tonale Pass and Stelvio, the eternal snows of the Ortler and Adamello, everywhere Austria is ramparted by ranges, everywhere Italy has to fight uphill. Wonderfully, with surpassing skill and courage, have her troops under her great chief of staff, Cadorna, fought their difficult fight.

The Italian war mission is headed by a member of the House of Savoy. One of its members is a king of science. We salute in them and that mission the gifted, strong, and generous democratic nation whose name is dear to the civilized world.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

SERVICES NOT TO BE FORGOTTEN.

Italy as a country is as well known to Americans as any in Europe because of the great number of them that have visited it, and its history, up to recent years, forms no small part of our textbooks for secondary and advanced education. We are, however, strangely and, considering the size of our Italian population, rather mysteriously out of touch with modern Italy, and concerning its living men of eminence not many of us know more than a few of their names. So, too, the part which Italy has played in the war is not generally understood and appreciated here, though in proportion to her resources she has probably done at least as much for the good cause as any of its other supporters, and her accomplishments have been neither small nor unimportant.

To the military achievements of Italy Il Cittadino, of this city, calls deserved attention, its motive being, of course, to gain for the members of the Italian mission, who have just arrived, recognition in some degree comparable to that which has made so notable the welcome accorded to the representatives of Great Britain and France.

Even at the beginning of the war, it reminds us, Italy's carefully reasoned and fully justified abandonment of the Central Empires, with which she had been in alliance, was of enormous service, in that it relieved France from what otherwise would have been the task of guarding her Italian frontier. After some months of comprehensible delay, Italy entered actively into the war on the side of the allies, timing her declaration of belligerency so that it stopped the German rush into Russia and compelled Germany and Austria to use against Italy great numbers of troops drawn from the eastern and western fronts. At Durazzo Italy saved the remnant of the Serbian Army—the men now fighting in Macedonia—and she captured Monastir, the only allied victory in that sector.

And Italy can claim the credit of being the only one of the allies to carry the war into enemy territory on a really large scale, and thereby she has given anxious occupation to large forces of both Germans and Austrians—forces which, but for her courage and efficiency, would have been available for employment elsewhere and might have affected seriously the course of events.

"Two Wrongs Do Not Make One Right."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. H. LaGUARDIA,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 15, 1917.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks I want to include a letter written by a resident of my city to my colleague from Minnesota, the Hon. HAROLD KNUTSON. It is indeed gratifying that the gentleman's efforts and activities on the floor of this House are not only known and recognized in his own State but also in the East and in the great State of New York. In the short time that he has been a Member of this House he has on several occasions taken an active part in the debates on important measures before the House. It seems that the old custom of the first-term man not actively participating in the affairs of the House has found an exception in the case of the Hon. HAROLD KNUTSON, of Minnesota.

The letter follows:

262 STANTON STREET,
New York City, June 13, 1917.

Hon. HAROLD KNUTSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: At a recent declamation contest held at the Alfred Corning Clark House in this city I entered as one of the contestants. For my recitation I chose your speech delivered on April 5 entitled "Two Wrongs Do Not Make One Right" and was chosen first-prize winner. The judges and many in the audience afterwards complimented me upon the subject.

Though I may not possess the speaking ability that you have, still it was the contents of the speech that decided in my favor. I chose your speech because I felt the same way as you did on the subject matter, and that made me put much more feeling in my talk.

I thought it my duty to write and inform you of my success and also to thank and congratulate you for that speech.

Very truly, yours,

SAMUEL B. REIMAN.

The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT F. POLK,

OF DELAWARE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 16, 1917.

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, in view of the many thorough examinations, surveys, and reports made by the highest military engineering authorities of this Government, and the reports of commissions appointed by the President of the United States under authority of Congress, upon the project of uniting the great Delaware and Chesapeake Bays by canal, all of which said reports are matters of public record in the shape of Senate or House documents, and all of which have recommended either the construction of such canal or the acquisition of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, it would seem unnecessary at this time to go into detail either as to the facts or merits of the project; but as the minority members of the committee state that "they feel the House should have a thorough understanding of what the condemnation of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal really means," and as that is just what those who favor the project want and there is nothing to conceal, for if the spotlight of publicity and investigation has ever been turned upon any proposed governmental project this project has had such light directed upon it for a period of upward of 40 years, and not once in that time has there been an adverse report by any commission, committee, or board of military engineers, I propose to state only the facts ascertained and the conclusions reached by those who have, officially and unofficially, made a thorough and impartial study of the project.

In Senate Document No. 215, second session Fifty-ninth Congress, there appears a full report of the hearings, proceedings, and conclusions of the commission appointed by the President of the United States in 1906, under authority of joint resolution No. 37, approved June 28, 1906, to examine and report upon a route for the construction of a free and open waterway to connect the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays, of which commission Gen. Felix Agnus, of Baltimore, was chairman. In this report the following is the conclusion of said commission with respect to the commercial, military, and naval advantages of such canal, which sets forth these advantages more clearly than I could hope to do:

The distance from Baltimore to Philadelphia will be shortened by 323 miles, from Baltimore to the mouth of the Delaware Bay by 184 miles, by the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal. Vessels can proceed from Baltimore to the mouth of the Delaware with full protection in weather when it would be hazardous to venture into the open sea.

The history of this canal project across the Maryland and Delaware Peninsula has been a constant emphasis of its advantage to commerce.

At each of the public hearings in Baltimore, Wilmington, and Philadelphia, the business organizations of the city were represented by committees of leading citizens and speakers, including Representatives in Congress, members of the judiciary, and officers of the city and State. The commission found in these great cities—and elsewhere also—a remarkably efficient and practically unopposed demand for the ship canal.

So many forceful speeches were made at the hearings that it is difficult to choose from them, but because of his well-known conservatism and his high standing with the American people, these words from the distinguished jurist, Hon. George Gray, at the Wilmington meeting, seemed to be especially pertinent:

Anyone who looks at the map or, indeed, any map of this region can understand why as early as 200 years ago it occurred to the intelligent voyagers to this country that a canal across this narrow neck of land would be a necessity of the future. It was talked about 150 years before it was accomplished, and across that upper narrow portion of the peninsula a canal was at last put which has served largely to promote the commerce of our country and this region. No one can overestimate the advantage it has been between the North and the South. The coal, lumber, and general merchandise which has found a cheap passage has been a considerable advantage.

Now that the country has grown in wealth and population it is a natural sequence that attention should be called to its important relation to the country at large. A great deal of the commerce of the Chesapeake Bay from Baltimore, from Washington, and all the affluents of the Chesapeake Bay go up that canal. Now, if it was a ship canal it would connect the two geographical divisions of the country—all that country east of the Hudson—with the country that lies west and south of the Chesapeake. That little obstruction compels an ocean voyage of several hundred miles, and there is to be considered not only the distance, but the expense. The plan for the canal should commend itself to the Representatives of all the country. You could not contradict the propositions which these simple facts support. It would be of immense importance. Whether you are in favor of liberal appropriations or not, it has every argument that it would be for the better support of the National Government.

Even stronger testimony may be found in the action of the commercial bodies and other public organizations of the cities and towns along the Atlantic seaboard, the more important of which are contained in the records of public hearings on file with the proceedings of the commission.

The significant development of the public hearings was the conviction of leading business and transportation experts that the railroads of the Atlantic seaboard were having great difficulty in handling freights and that the extraordinary growth of the country's business had already taxed them to the limit of their facilities. In the Eastern States the freight congestion has become a serious embarrassment to business.

The rise of the railway caused the decline of the canal until recently, when the railway could not meet all the public demands.

It is very unfortunate that there are no satisfactory statistics of our coastwise trade, although it represents many times the value of our foreign commerce.

The fact that vessels engaged in coastwise trade are not required to file copies of their manifests at the customhouses makes the record difficult.

The projected canal across the Maryland-Delaware Peninsula would unquestionably be a great convenience to foreign shipping. The view that it would not be used by ocean-going ships is the same contention that arose when the other great ship canals were built, but their history has shown that when the channel is cut the ships will always take the shortest course.

The Delaware and Chesapeake Bays have a shore line of 2,500 miles, with 500 tributary streams and more than 10,000 registered vessels.

The commerce of the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays, registered and otherwise, has been estimated all the way from 50,000,000 to 90,000,000 tons annually. This is much larger than the tonnage of the entire annual foreign commerce of the United States.

Of the registered tonnage traffic in a recent compilation, 25,873,167 were on Delaware Bay points and 24,151,932 on Chesapeake Bay points. These figures, however, do not include the undocumented and unregistered tonnage traffic, which would add nearly 100 per cent to the total.

Considerably less than one-tenth of the traffic on the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays and their various points belongs to foreign commerce. The great value of the proposed canal would be in facilitating the coastwise trade.

It is estimated that at least 2,000,000 tons of coal would go through this canal to consumers farther north. Under the present conditions much of this coal has to make a detour by way of the Capes, and often the vessels must lie at Hampton Roads 10 or 12 days, and even 2 weeks, waiting a shift of wind.

The experts who appeared before the commission believe that the canal would cheapen coal for the New England points. Lumber will be an important item. Its movement northward from the Carolinas and other Southern States is much hampered by the inadequacy of the present canal. With a free canal the coast would be about half the present rate, according to the experience of the lumber trade on the Great Lakes.

Coal and lumber have been mentioned, but they are only two of the numerous products, among which may be counted cotton, corn, staves, hog products, poultry, and vegetables, live stock, hay, fisheries, tobacco, coke, wool, potatoes, peanuts, phosphate, turpentine and resin, zinc, and stone.

It is estimated that the South each year has over $2,000,000,000 worth of raw materials. A very considerable part of all this seeks northern markets, and in return the North sends machinery and supplies of all kinds. All this movement would be aided by the proposed canal. The manufacturing interests touched by waterways, which this canal would connect, and of which it would become part, have an annual total production of considerably more than $1,000,000,000.

Many of the great industrial concerns have located on the seaboard, so as to have the advantage of cheap transportation.

It is the commission's opinion that the deep-water canal across the upper end of the peninsula would be of very great advantage to commerce. It would give the West a seaboard more than 100 miles nearer the ocean than it now has. It would relieve hundreds of vessels of the necessity of a dangerous sea route, which in years gone by has cost tens of millions of dollars in wrecks. It would save time and expense to the trade movements of the whole country. It would immediately affect the 11,000,000 people upon the two bays and their tributaries, and would contribute to the interests of all the population, it would stimulate production, and be of direct financial benefit to American industries. The commission believes the commercial advantage will fully justify the expenditure of the funds necessary to complete the work.

In a general strategic sense the military advantages of the proposed ship canal appear most prominently in the channel offered for the rapid transit of naval vessels from one bay to the other to concentrate against hostile naval fleets or for the breaking of blockades.

To make the canal thus available at all times its termini must be thoroughly protected by sufficient coast defenses to render its passage at all times open. This is at present secured on the Delaware for the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal route by existing defense and on the Chesapeake by the defenses of Washington, Baltimore, and Hampton Roads, which an attacking naval force would hesitate to leave in its rear, sheltering cruisers that could demolish its boats of communication and supply. But full strategic use of the canal would be secured only by adequate coast defense at each terminus. It is not considered that a project for the defense of the Chesapeake terminus lies within the scope of this report, as such project should receive careful consideration by competent board of military engineers. The cost would be practically the same for either route.

Assuming, however, that both termini are to be properly defended, the canal itself offers many advantages to such defense by the ready means of intercommunication afforded. The canal would permit the prompt interchange of troops and munitions between the coast batteries, and particularly of the submarines, scout boats, and coast-defense monitors, that now form an important factor in seacoast defense, thus minimizing the number required for a complete defense.

Another important feature of the canal would be the obstacle presented by it as an adjunct for land defenses. These would serve as a base for troops operating to break up military occupation of the peninsula or to check advances therefrom without reembarcation, should such occupation become effective. A geographical study of the Atlantic coast of the United States as at present defended shows the peninsula of Maryland and Delaware as the most vulnerable and suitable place for the location of a base for land operations, should our Navy be driven from the seas. This was demonstrated by history in the War of 1812.

The line of the canal property defended would also prevent the closing of land communications to the coast forts on the Delaware in case their reduction by siege should be attempted with a view to opening the way for a naval advance on Philadelphia. Should the proposed Sassafras route be selected for the route of the canal, additional defenses would be required on the Delaware to protect the entrance and prevent distant bombardment of vessels in the canal. Such defense would require the expenditure of over $2,000,000 for the abandonment of the present defenses of the Delaware and their reestablishment at a point farther down the river, probably in the vicinity of Listons Point.

The Civil War developed the enormous value of the present canal as a means of transportation of troops, supplies, and prisoners. While our railroad facilities have greatly increased since that time, it is easily conceivable that in future wars or internal disturbances the proposed ship canal would very likely prove an important adjunct to rail transportation and possibly a vital factor in campaigns, should rail transportation be interrupted by accidents, strikes, or hostile raids.

The experts of the present Naval General Board would be satisfied for the canal to pass vessels of 16-foot draft and 60-foot beam; in other words, monitors, torpedo boats, and destroyers. The commission fully agrees that the principal naval uses of the proposed canal would probably be as stated and is inclined to think that for the present purposes a canal of 30-foot or perhaps of even 27-foot draft would be ample. It further believes that just as many battleships will be required with as without the canal, as it would plainly not be within the province of the heaviest of the fighting units to remain in harbor entrance for local defense.

However, it is the opinion of the commission that the experts look too much to victory and ignore such conditions as defeat or at least heavy punishment in battle.

While the General Board of the Navy may not recognize the probability of transference of the battle fleet as a whole through the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, it is not difficult to conceive of that fleet, badly crippled in a general engagement at sea, limping home in detail to be divided for repairs among several such navy yards as Norfolk, League Island, and New York. When repairs are finished the safer and better way to assemble would be by way of the ship canal, either to the Delaware or the Chesapeake.

It is the opinion of the commission that aside from commercial uses the construction of the proposed canal will be of great strategic value as an adjunct to our land and naval forces.

I would like to read part of a statement made before the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association in 1915 by a gentleman who has given years of study of this project, Hon. WILLARD SAULSBURY, a Senator from the State of Delaware and now President pro tempore of the United States Senate:

I have gone into this question of the acquisition of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal as I would examine the most important law case I ever had, where clients of mine might become interested to the extent of millions of dollars. I have acted, so far as I could volunteer my services in this examination, as the counsel of the Government, and every word I have said I believe would be approved by any open-minded man who will exhaustively examine the reports of Government engineers, of commissions, and committees of Congress. They are many in number and extend over a period of 42 years, beginning in 1872 and ending last April.

Let me give you as briefly as I can some of the undisputed facts about the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal. It is a little less than 14 miles long from the entrance at Delaware City to the outlet at Chesapeake City. The distance from Philadelphia to Delaware City by water is 42 miles, from Chesapeake City to Baltimore 56 miles, making a total distance between these two great cities by water 112 miles. The canal will pass vessels 220 feet long, having 9 feet draft and 24 feet beam. The distance by water compared with rail between Baltimore and Philadelphia is 96 miles by rail against 112 by water. Freight delivered in Philadelphia to the small boats plying through the canal at 5 o'clock in the afternoon is landed at Baltimore at 7 o'clock the next morning, while the average time for freight deliveries by rail is something like two to three days.

The gross earnings of the canal from tolls on vessels passing through it for the past four years have averaged about $175,000 annually; its cost of operation has averaged $65,000, leaving a net annual income from operation of $110,000. The interest on its bonded indebtedness of $2,602,950 at 4 per cent is $104,118, leaving a net annual income above all charges of about $6,000. The interest on its bonds was some years ago decreased from 5 per cent to 4 per cent and has been earned and paid.

Its average annual gross earnings between the years 1864 and 1874 approximated $400,000, and during the same period its average annual operating cost was about $130,000, leaving $270,000 for charges and dividends.

There are 10,000 boats engaged in the commerce of the two great bays and their tributaries, which have a shore line of 2,500 miles, and the commerce of these waters is over 100,000,000 tons annually.

On the Delaware Bay and tributaries and on Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries we have a combined traffic, as shown by the report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, exceeding 50,000,000 tons annually; and if to this the undocumented and unregistered tonnage is added, which includes the vast amount handled daily by thousands of local trading boats, the tonnage is estimated to exceed 100,000,000 tons; and this tonnage is almost equally divided between the two bays—the tonnage of Delaware Bay and River and tributaries for 1912, as I compile it from the engineer's report, aggregating 26,267,355 short tons, while the tonnage on the Chesapeake Bay and tributaries, which I am not sure is as accurate as the other figures, and in some respects is possibly duplicated, amounts to 36,333,489 tons.

In 1904 (H. Rept. No. 2725, 58th Cong., 2d sess.) the combined tonnage of the two bays and tributaries was stated to be almost exactly 50,000,000 tons, and from a statement of the Department of Commerce, Bureau of Navigation, the registered tonnage, represented by 4,391 sailing vessels, steam vessels, and barges, was six hundred and ninety-two thousand and some hundred tons.

The population of the States to be immediately benefited by the canal is about one-sixth of the total population of the United States, and estimated at 14,092,627 people.

Last year—1913—5,778 boats passed through the canal, carrying 908,689 tons of freight, an average of less than 200 tons to each vessel, boat, or barge. This is not a small traffic, but the Government engineers have estimated, declaring their estimates to be conservative, that this tonnage on a 12-foot canal such as now recommended would be 2,537,000 tons, and the annual saving to commerce, as estimated by the Board of Engineers, if the Government shall take over the canal, widen it to 90 feet and deepen it to 12 feet, will be $1,414,000. The cost, including the acquisition of the canal at a reasonable figure, will be between seven and eight millions of dollars, which provides for a purchase price of the canal of $2,514,000. It is believed that the canal can be condemned for this figure, although the various boards of engineers have estimated that the Government, to duplicate the canal, would have to expend $3,700,000. This estimate as to the cost of reproduction is itemized in Senate Document No. 215, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, page 18. Government engineers have consistently and uniformly recommended its purchase for $2,514,000. The approaches to the canal at its Delaware end are defended by the forts on the Delaware and New Jersey shores as well as an old fortification in midstream, and the Chesapeake end is above the important defenses of the whole of the Chesapeake Bay. There are no difficulties in the deepening and enlargement of the canal; indeed, no rock work even will be necessary.

Ten lives is the average death toll taken by the sea on the rough outside passage between the Delaware and Virginia Capes. One of my colleagues asked me when I was urging this matter in the Senate, what the Atlantic Ocean was there for if not to sail boats on, and I told him 10 lives could be saved annually and proved it by official reports, and then I showed him that this canal shortened the water passage between Baltimore and Philadelphia by 308 miles, and between Baltimore and New York, by going out the Delaware Capes instead of the Virginia Capes, by 180 miles. Indeed it will materially shorten the distance from Baltimore to Europe.

Believing as I do in the great utility this canal would be to the commerce of the country with even the small improvement its deepening to 12 feet would make, believing as I do that a demonstration of this canal at that depth will prove absolutely to the Government the great desirability that it should be made a ship canal through which our warships may be concentrated for the defense of our country in time of war, I feel that I would be unpatriotic if I did not urge that this work should be taken up by the Government. I believe it is now in a position where we will soon have the last word on this project so far as the able engineers of the Army and Navy can say that word. When after the most careful study and consideration of all the reports which have been made on this project by skilled engineers of the Army engaged in work on waterways to the committees of both Houses of Congress made by commissions, in the membership of which civilians were included, one becomes convinced that there can not be two opinions on a proposition by men who have sufficient intelligence and industry to learn the facts, one is inclined to be somewhat impatient with the trifling and almost unintelligent criticism or questions raised concerning it.

When it became impossible in the last Congress to start this great project by an appropriation, feeling absolutely confident that no capable engineer could make an unfavorable report on this project, I offered and secured the passage in the Senate of a resolution directing the Secretary of War to secure, prepare, and report to the Senate summaries of the reports of the Government commissions, officers, and engineers heretofore made, and such facts, information, and opinions of boards or officers of the Army and Navy as he may deem proper or pertinent as to the advantages or disadvantages, commercial, naval, or military, of the acquisition of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal by the United States, with such information as he can secure as to the price at which the property can be purchased.

In my judgment, gentlemen, when the Secretary responds to that resolution in a report setting out the facts known to the Government regarding the canal, its great possibilities for good to commerce and the national defense, there will be no popular criticism or objection to the action of the Government in taking over this property and making it available in the broadest sense and in the biggest way for commercial, naval, and military purposes.

I believe in this great work. I believe its greatness will be demonstrated and its benefits certified to by the best engineers and the highest officials in this branch of the Government service, and on the report which will be made pursuant to that resolution I pin my faith that there will be a start made by this Government in the development of that waterway for commerce and defense. I believe this waterway will come to be used by the great ships of the United States; I believe its usefulness will be so proven that the Government will soon proceed, after its practical development has shown the people of this country its great advantages, to extend northward a canal which may be similarly used between deep water in the Delaware River and New York Bay.

I do not believe that anyone should advocate this latter work until the small and less expensive work is done and demonstrates its usefulness and success, but when the two are completed then the enormous advantages to this country will be self-evident. The whole fleet of the United States without knowledge of an attacking force could be concentrated anywhere on our Atlantic seaboard from Narragansett Bay to the Virginia Capes. Should such concentration ever be needed for defense the value of such a passageway would be incalculable. Can anyone to-day compute the value to the German Empire, either in money or for defense, of the great but less important military canal at Kiel?

Our greatest warships last only a few years. At the end of 10 years they go into the second line of defense, I believe, because they have become partially obsolete and outclassed. For less than the cost of one warship this great project may be demonstrated. For the cost of a few warships the whole great project may be accomplished with a saving to the commerce of the country of 20 per cent on this investment, and 1,000 per cent advantage for the military and naval defense of this country over that of Germany's great military canal at Kiel.

The Secretary of War, in response to the resolution referred to by Senator SAULSBURY, transmitted to the United States Senate at the first session Sixty-fourth Congress, certain information relative to the proposed acquisition of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, the probable cost thereof, and as to the advantages and disadvantages, commercial, naval, and military of the acquisition of said canal by the United States, and that report fully justified the faith expressed by Senator SAULSBURY above quoted, and the judgment of those who have for years been advocating this project as a means of national defense and commercial expansion. I desire to read the report of the War College Division of the General Staff upon the question of the military advantages of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, it having been referred to said division by the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, February 27, 1915.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

Subject: Military advantages of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal.

1. There is returned herewith a memorandum, with attached papers, on the above subject, dated February 24, 1915, from the Secretary of War to the Chief of Staff, wherein three questions are submitted:

(a) The military advantage, if any, of the existence of this canal.

(b) Whether a canal along this line would be of any military advantage; and if so, what?

(c) What character and size the canal would have to be in order to be of any advantage?

These questions apparently refer both to the present and contemplated canal along this line.

2. In answer to 1 (a), it is believed that the existing canal has some value as it exists to-day as an obstacle to the advance of a hostile expedition landing on the west bank of Delaware Bay and advancing against Wilmington and Philadelphia. The fine, undefended harbor at Lewes, Del., makes such a landing a probability. The canal, especially at the locks, is so narrow, only 24 feet at the locks, as to form an obstacle not very formidable. The canal is too small for the passage of submarines or other naval craft that would be used for preventing the landing of troops from hostile transports, and too small and obstructed by locks for rapid transport of troops and material from one bay to the other.

3. As to 1 (b), a sea-level canal along this same line would be of very great military importance from the following points of view:

(a) For the movement of submarines and other craft that must constitute an important part of our coast defense system.

(b) As forming an almost impassable obstacle to the passage of troops advancing to attack Wilmington or Philadelphia from the peninsula between Delaware and Chesapeake Bays.

(c) For the transport of men and material of the Coast Artillery and the Coast Artillery support from one bay to the other.

4. The first of the points enumerated in paragraph 3 is a military one, because submarines and other small craft are believed to be at present an integral part of the seacoast defense, for use not only against naval attack on the harbors but in a still more important sense against transports attempting to land a hostile force on our shores in case of the defeat of our Navy. Seacoast defenses reach no farther than the range of their guns, and it is impossible to distribute mobile army troops at all possible landing places to prevent the landing of troops without so frittering away the army in small detachments as to render it almost impossible to collect them for united action. A canal such as proposed would allow the whole force of submarines, etc., to be held in one of the two bays and used with equal efficiency in either. Without the canal the force of submarines, etc., must be divided between the two bays, and to reinforce one another they must attempt a passage by the outside, a distance of over 200 miles as against about 15 miles by the canal.

A canal along this line and one from Delaware Bay to New York Harbor would make a landing of hostile troops almost impossible between Narragansett Bay and Chesapeake Bay, and the construction of this canal is an important step toward the accomplishment of this result.

5. As an obstacle and a part of the land defense of Wilmington and Philadelphia, a canal suited for other commercial and naval purposes would be of great importance. Defended by a few troops and small gunboats, such an obstacle (of the size recommended below) would hardly be crossed, and it is not believed that it would be attempted.

6. As a means of transport it has a measure of value for the easy transportation of men and material between the fortifications of Delaware Bay and of Baltimore.

7. As to 1 (c), the objects set forth in paragraph 3 above can be obtained by a sea-level canal having a depth of 18 feet at mean low water and a bottom width of about 150 feet. While tides of 6 feet to 10 feet prevail in the waters at the ends of the canal, investigation has shown that guard locks will not be necessary and that an open canal will be entirely feasible.

M. M. MACOMB,
Brigadier General, Chief of War College Division.

I concur.

TASKER H. BLISS,
Brigadier General, United States Army, Acting Chief of Staff.

I concur.

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

The history of the past has proven the value of this canal as a means of defense. During the Civil War the part it played was a most important one. It kept the Army of the Potomac in the field; it fed it; it clothed it; and furnished it with ammunition. Capt. Philip Reybold, in an address before the commission, whose report I have referred to and read portions of, set forth its extraordinary value to the Government during the Civil War in the following account:

Just look over to Bermuda, only 600 miles off your coast, with its harbors, coaling stations, and dry docks, and to Halifax, where the same conditions exist near your main border—harbor bases to harbor great fleets of battleships, cruisers, and armor clads—bases from which they can be sent out to scour our coast. We are taught from earliest boyhood that history repeats itself, and there is some history that we want this Government to take steps to prevent its ever being repeated. On the 24th day of August, 1814, the Battle of Bladensburg was fought, and the British, under Gen. Ross and Admiral Cockburn, captured Washington, burning the Capitol, White House, and all the public buildings. The American people do not want that repeated. Suppose to-morrow that the lookout at Cape Hatteras or Kittyhawk should send a message flying over the wires that a foreign fleet was heading for the Chesapeake Capes with their battle flags flying, would not a ship canal, then, along the line of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal be worth $20,000,000 to the Government, through which battleships from League Island could be rushed and stop that fleet before it reached the mouth of the Potomac? It was this disaster that resulted in the building of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, and that is why the Government contributed $450,000 toward its construction.

Now, sir, as you sit in that chair, do you realize what an important part this little canal, with its locks only 24 feet wide and only 10 feet of water over its sills, has played in the history of this country? Do you realize that if that canal had not existed in April, 1861, that the session of the Congress of the Confederacy that convened in Richmond would not have been held there? They would have been sitting in the same hall where Dr. Burton sits to-day, with so much honor to his State, and the same flag would have floated over the dome of the building. Now, let us see: On Wednesday, the 17th day of April, Virginia seceded from the Union, and was starting her troops north to go to Washington. There was not a handful of troops in that city nor a breastwork thrown up, and the Federal Government started its troops south. You know what happened in Baltimore on Friday, the 19th of April, as the Sixth Massachusetts passed through, and that night every bridge on the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad was burned from Baltimore to the Susquehanna River and totally destroyed, and the Federal Government had absolutely no means of transporting troops along the seaboard by rail to Washington. In fact, all land communication was severed.

On Saturday, the 20th, the Government seized all the propeller steamers in Philadelphia that could pass through the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, and how well I remember that Saturday night as they steamed down the Delaware River and passed through the canal, and before daylight in the morning they were at Perryville, and just as the sun was peeping up over the horizon the trains arrived at Baltimore with the troops, where they were rushed on board of steamers and hurried away down the Chesapeake to Annapolis, and by way of Annapolis Junction to Washington, and when that body of troops arrived at the Capital the Confederate outposts were at the Virginia end of the Long Bridge, and for the next 60 days this Chesapeake & Delaware Canal was the key to the whole Federal situation.

The Potomac was closed by a series of batteries from Aquia Creek to its mouth and its waters were patrolled by a steamer called the Page, which the Confederates had converted into a gunboat. Suppose there had been no canal, what then would have happened? You would have never heard the cry of "All quiet on the Delaware," and the blood that soaked into Virginia soil would have been poured out in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and reconstruction would have taken place in the North instead of the South. This canal throughout the whole war played a most important part; it kept the Army of the Potomac in the field, it fed them, it clothed them, and furnished them with their ammunition and all other stores.

Now, sir, if this little canal, with locks only 24 feet wide and only 10 feet of water over its sills, was so vital then, what would a ship canal be along its course if a foreign fleet was on our coast? Take the Kiel Ship Canal it is 64 miles long and cost Germany $40,000,000, but it saves just two days steaming around the peninsula of Denmark. Experts estimate that canal as being equal to 15 battleships to Germany as a means of defense. Take this peninsula of Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, it takes 48 hours to steam from the Delaware end around to the Chesapeake end, and if you had a ship canal cutting through those 14 miles of peninsula it would be worth a whole fleet to the United States, as one fleet would be able to do the work of two; and it seems to me, sir, taking that side of the question and the commercial side, that the shorter the canal and more directly north and south it runs the better it will be for both the commercial and military interests.

When this great chain of canals, if completed, and the Erie Canal finished, then you can load your coal barge in Baltimore and send her through to Duluth, and when the coal is discharged you can reload with iron ore, carry it back to Sparrows Point, and there fashion it into a steamship to carry the products of the Baltimore mills by way of the Panama Canal to Valparaiso or China.

Mr. CROZIER. As we are making a public record, I do not think that we ought to allow Capt. Reybold's modesty to stand in the way of having it placed on record that it was his father, Capt. Reybold, who suggested to the Federal Government seizing these boats and utilizing the canal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having presented a true and accurate statement of facts relative to this project, I am willing to leave to the fair judgment of this House whether the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal is a "rotten, obsolete canal," or whether it is a meritorious project from both a commercial and military point of view.

There was a time when abuse was mistaken for argument, but not so now, and I do not believe the membership of this House will permit its judgment to be warped by such means.

The acquisition and development of this canal by the United States as a free and open waterway to connect the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays has been recommended time and time again by the highest military engineers of the Government, among them being Gen. Thomas L. Casey, Col. Craighill, Gen. Bixby, Col. Black, Col. Flagler, Capt. Turtle, Gen. Humphreys, and Admiral Dewey, because of its value in promoting commercial expansion and as a means of defense. Do you believe these gentlemen would recommend that the Government acquire, either by purchase or condemnation, "a rotten, obsolete, canal"?

Do you believe Judge Gray, than whom no man enjoys to a greater extent the confidence of his fellow citizens of the entire country, would advocate the Government taking over "a rotten, obsolete canal" to give "a splendid opportunity for owners of worthless stock and depreciated bonds to dispose of them to the Government," as stated in the minority report?

Do you believe that Senator SAULSBURY, who has been so honored by his native State as to elect him to the United States Senate and by his colleagues elected President pro tempore of the Senate, would stand sponsor for a scheme to unload on the Government "a rotten and obsolete canal"?

You know as well as I do that they would not.

In consideration of these facts, can you doubt the merit of this project? It is meritorious, and it should have been acquired and developed by the Government years ago. Had this been done four years ago, when it was so strongly urged, it would have been completed and in full operation to-day, and we would have had provided, as a means of defense of Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore, and the Nation's Capital City, and the country of the Middle States lying back of them, "such an obstacle, defended by a few troops and small gunboats, as would hardly be crossed, and it is not believed would be attempted," as is aptly stated by Gen. Macomb in his report to the Secretary of War.

I know it has been argued that this project is not a war emergency measure, but I believe it is, and a very important one at that, for in case of attempted invasion the attempt in all probability would be made at a point where a means of defense such as this would be necessary to prevent attacks upon the large cities of the middle Atlantic seaboard and check any attempted invasion of the interior by a foreign enemy. That part of the coast which would most likely be selected by an enemy for such purpose would probably be the west bank of the Delaware Bay, and, as Gen. Macomb says, "the fine, undefended harbor at Lewes, Del., makes such a landing a probability." This very part of the coast is the key to an invasion of the interior. Shall we go on in the future as we have in the past, without making any effort at preparedness to defend ourselves against such an obvious danger, resting secure in the thought that no such attempt would be made? If we do, I am afraid we will have a rude awakening when it is too late.

What really constitutes a war-emergency measure? Merely provision for raising an army and building a navy, issuing bonds, providing for revenue, food control, and conservation, or must we, in order to carry into effect successfully these things, also provide for supplying the Army and Navy with the necessary means of transportation, with food and clothing, and to effectually carry out any scheme of food control and conservation provide the means necessary for its proper distribution, and to put the country into such a shape of defensive preparedness as to meet any contingency which might present itself?

If this is the correct and sensible view of it, I believe it absolutely necessary as a war measure that the rivers and harbors of the country should be put and kept in a state of usefulness in view of the serious situation with regard to congestion of freight traffic on the railroads of the country, and the seriousness of the situation can not be overestimated, for all over the country railroad terminals are overwhelmed and thousands of cars loaded with nonperishable freight are standing idle in the yards and on the sidings of the railroads.

I know personally that this condition exists in my own State and I doubt not the same condition exists elsewhere. We will have to use all available means of transportation this year to handle the foodstuffs, munitions, and so forth, and I believe it will present a very troublesome problem, but give the country the increased facilities that the proposed rivers and harbors projects contemplate and provide for, at the earliest possible moment, and no matter what difficulties we may have to meet in the immediate future by reason of the stress of war, we will be in the best shape possible to handle such problems as may be presented.

Of course, if we had the power to know how long the war will continue, and what the outcome of it would be, and assurance of no further hostilities which we would be called upon to meet, we might view all these things in a different light. We all hope—we all believe that the ingenuity and the indomitable spirit of the American people, in conjunction with those who are our allies in the present struggle, will win this war. But do we know? What would happen if the allied forces in France should not be successful? Do any of you doubt that in such an event the United States would have to defend its coast from invasion by the most ruthless and inhuman force that the civilized world has ever known, an enemy who stops at no brutality and to whom the word "humanity" has been lost in the lust for power.

Then why is not every effort made for every sort of preparedness a war emergency measure? Why delay until we are face to face with such a contingency.

Why should not a project that is an effort to make for immediate future preparedness be a war emergency measure?

That is just what the project for the acquisition by the Government of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal means—a present effort for immediate future preparedness.

It is meritorious, it is not a scheme to give stockholders and bondholders of "a rotten, obsolete canal" an opportunity to unload on the Government, as is intimated in the minority report, as is evidenced by the support of the best thought and cleanest public men of the Nation, who have given it study; would make for commercial expansion; and from a military and naval point of view is of great strategic value as a means of defense of the National Capital, the large commercial cities of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Wilmington, the greatest powder-making plant in the world, upon which our Government, to a large extent, must depend for explosives and munitions in time of war; and the key to the interior of the Middle States.

I have tried to confine this statement to ascertained facts the truth and correctness of which can not be disputed or disproved. It is a plain business proposition for national preparedness and security from foreign invasion within the area that would be protected by this project.

Is such a proposition worthy of your support? I believe in it, and I believe it is. I leave it with you for your decision, and I have all confidence that such decision will be reached by calm and unbiased consideration, uninfluenced by unwarranted misstatement of facts and abuse.

Old Glory, The Banner of Democracy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. RUSSELL,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 16, 1917.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous consent given to me I desire to insert an address delivered by my colleague [Mr. BORLAND] before the Elks Lodge in Washington on Flag Day, June 14, 1917:

OLD GLORY, THE BANNER OF DEMOCRACY.

[An address delivered by Hon. WILLIAM P. BORLAND, Representative in Congress from Missouri, before Washington Lodge, No. 15, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, at Washington, D. C., June 14, 1917.]

Brother Elks and friends, you have commemorated to-night with these beautiful and appropriate ceremonies the one hundred and fortieth anniversary of the birth of Old Glory. We are surely entitled at this time to call the starry emblem of our Nation by the affectionate title of Old Glory, because, with some possible obscure exception, it is the oldest national flag afloat to-day. We are accustomed to think and speak of our country as a young Nation and our flag as the flag of a new people, and it would startle most of us to recall that in the 140 years which have elapsed since the Stars and Stripes first kissed the breezes of the Western World, the flags of almost all the great nations which greeted it on June 14, 1777, have disappeared and new ones have taken their places. Ours is the oldest flag afloat, and our Government is the oldest unchanged form of government in the civilized world.

When this flag was given to the breezes, the flag of France was the fleur de lis. The flag of old England was not the present ensign of the British Empire, but only that of the union of England and Scotland. The black, white, and red of united Germany had not come into existence, for Germany itself was but a scattered collection of fragmentary feudal States. United Italy had not been born. There is no flag in the world that I now recall which has survived unchanged those momentous years, and the governments of the world have changed with even greater rapidity. France has been three times a republic and twice an empire. Spain, Holland, Belgium, Norway, Sweden, Austria, and Portugal have been subdivided and reunited. Persia and Turkey have yielded to democratic tendencies. The flag of Japan is but little more than half a century old, and in the last days even Russia and China, the oldest and most absolute of monarchies, have changed to republics.

Let us not forget in our rejoicings over this auspicious day what stability and success have attended this great experiment of the Western World for government by the people. While our thoughts are busy with the wonderful conception of the perpetuity and dignity of our institutions, let us not forget that our people are to-day the most homogeneous Nation gathered under a single banner. When this old banner floated out in the early years of our struggle for national life it sheltered beneath its folds less than 3,000,000 immigrant pioneers, crowded in a narrow strip of land on the storm-tossed coast of the Atlantic. To-day it has been carried across a continent 3,000 miles in width, and protects a Nation of a hundred million people—the strongest, richest, and one of the largest Nations the world has ever seen. It has been planted by the blue waters of the Pacific and carried beyond to the perfumed isles of Hawaii and to the rice fields of Manila. It gathers to-day beneath its folds a mighty Nation of a hundred million people, yet more uniform, more homogeneous, and more united in their ideals of national life than any other nation of the globe.

We have been accustomed to hear from some of the sensational writers of the magazine world that this Nation of ours was a mere melting pot filled with turgid streams from every quarter of Europe, who carried with them and retained all their racial prejudices and traditional animosities; that we were a mere patchwork of a Nation, held together by no bond of national feeling, but faultily and hastily stitched up by some high-sounding political phrase of political equality. We were told that as a nation we must still find ourselves, must develop and establish national ideals and national aspirations, and that then, and only then, could we hope to have such a thing as a national spirit. No falser statements ever escaped from the unguarded tongue of the sensation monger. There is no nation on the globe to-day so closely united in thought and feeling as ours. There is no country where the common ideals are so uniform and so universal, where the standard of living is so nearly alike, nor where the spirit of a united nation is so strong.

Commerce knows no State lines. Political thought is much the same in every part of the Union, and the moral standards of the people do not vary with localities. From Plymouth Rock to the Golden Gate there stretches 3,000 miles of territory inhabited by a restless and progressive people, sharing one civilization, with one language, one literature, and one law. Still in the more crowded quarters of our great cities may be found what is known as the foreign element, but how rapidly do they mingle with the great ocean of Americanism around them. No foreign quarter can remain long isolated from the general influence of democracy. The first generation born on American soil has abandoned forever the crowded, narrow foreign quarter and has mingled in the great flood of American people, so that it can no longer be identified. In leaving behind the squalid poverty of the foreign quarter, with its privations and its hardships, its isolation from the differences of race, religion, and tongue, the immigrant's son has left behind him also the narrow and cramped ideals and the petty prejudices, the heritage of centuries of repression and misrule.

If one look to-day into the faces of the average American audience in any place except the crowded sections peopled by the newest immigrants it will be impossible for him to tell the child of a foreign-born citizen from the child of the native son. He may read the list of names of those present in the audience and find in that list the flavor of the history and the struggles of every obscure and feudal State in Europe, and yet when he comes to compare the list with the men before him he can not select out the owners of the names by any distinguishing characteristic of race, creed, or birth. The truth is, the people of America are more nearly alike than the people of any other great nation. Germany is the most unified of the greater countries, and yet it is easy to tell the flaxen-haired Prussian of the north from the square-shouldered, black-browed Bavarian of the south. Great Britain is itself a collection of little kingdoms, and no man mistakes a Scotchman for an Irishman or either for a Welshman. In Italy it is not difficult for the experienced observer to tell the Florentine and the Genoese from the Neapolitan or the Sicilian. The Austrian Empire is a collection of 17 warring nationalities, who speak alien tongues and resent all suggestion of a common interest. Russia has so many peoples beneath her flag that it is said there are some nations there who do not know that other nations belong to the Russian Empire. Even little Switzerland, which we love to think of as the Mountain Republic, closely knit together by its heroic struggles, has its money and its laws printed in three languages, Italian, French, and German. Yet to-day it is almost impossible for any but the well-traveled American to tell a Massachusetts Yankee from a Texan. No foreigner has ever been able to discriminate between Americans by the locality in which they were born.

And our ideals are the same. Wherever we find a community of Americans, whether in staid old New England or upon the plains of Texas, upon the shore of Florida, in the mountains of Idaho or Montana, or on the genial coast of California, or in far-off frozen Alaska, there springs up immediately by spontaneous growth the American ideals of equal rights and fair play, of the fundamental necessity of public education, of the establishment of law and order, the toleration of religious feelings, and the sanctity of the home.

Nay, more; we may take a group of plain American lads from commonplace American homes, who have had no special opportunities in life except to absorb in the air they breathe the universal principles of American democracy. We can put them down into the jungles of the far-off Philippines, or in revolution-torn Cuba or plague-infested Panama, and they will begin with unerring certainty the reconstruction of American life. By the first dawn of the next day they will begin to clean up the community in which they live and make it safe, sanitary, and American.

In this presence I may give utterance to another thought which has been borne in upon me with increasing force as I have studied the causes of this growth of Americanism. Among the factors which have brought about this unity of sentiment and loyalty to the flag there has been no more potent force than the influence of the great fraternities, and notably the distinctively American institution, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. This order teaches patriotism and a love and reverence for the flag as part of its tenets. The thousands of members throughout the land have learned that lesson upon their initiation into the lodge. They hear it repeated in all the beautiful ceremonies and rituals, such as that in which we have just taken part. The Elks cherish the flag as one of the cardinal principles of their order. They never fail to commemorate its special day and to keep before the people the blessing of its influence. Proudly, yet lovingly, they place it in the pinnacle of power. It is enshrined in their hearts and finds expression in the public and private acts of their lives. To the Elks, with their widespread influence in every State and city in our land, belongs very justly a large measure of the credit for the feeling of loyalty and devotion to the flag so spontaneously exhibited by the American people in the last few days. To them belongs the glory of having made Americanism a living reality.

The very existence of fraternities is a strong bond of democracy. They tend to unite all men everywhere before a common altar in the acknowledgment of a common set of moral truths. They banish sectionalism, prejudice, and distrust, and make us realize that the things which divide us are accidental and temporary, while the things which unite us are eternal. These common aspirations are like a golden chain to link our hearts together.

We look into the hearts of our brothers and feel that they acknowledge the same moral truth that we ourselves acknowledge; that they seek to be guided by the same principles by which we hope to govern our lives. The man who has stood upon the level floor of the lodge has learned two lessons: The equality of all and the dignity and worth of each individual. He had drunk deep at the very wellspring of democracy. He has learned both charity and justice. Hereafter he can not feel the same selfish isolation from his fellow or the same contempt for the defects or misfortunes of others. The teachings of fraternalism are directly opposite from the cult of feudalism. Fraternalism is democracy, feudalism is brutal discrimination and injustice. Hence under the all-prevailing influence of fraternalism the power of feudalism and class distinction has disappeared. Men have come to love democracy with a passionate devotion very much different from the mere intellectual belief in equal rights which prevailed among the advanced thinkers when Old Glory was first kissed by the sun. And to-day democracy is able to show to the world that it has taken root in men's hearts as that old flag has stood erect through all its successive birthdays.

We have been told that this country had no national life, no real national unity, no national ideals; that it had no principles worth fighting for; that its so-called democracy was simply political indolence and national squalor; that it lacked all sense of honor founded upon patriotic devotion; that because it had no feudal rank, no aristocratic class, it possessed no chivalry; that its whole sense of life was sordid and greedy; and that it reveled in money getting and in the idle and vulgar display of wealth. We realize that it has been the taunt of the years gone by that democracy could not defend principle; that it was but another name for low aims and unworthy purposes. This is the eternal conflict between democracy and feudalism, a feudalism which has long outlived all sense of honor, all feelings of humanity, and all usefulness to society, and yet this fetid feudalism has taunted democracy that it could not and would not defend either its people of its principles.

To those who gave such taunts and who hold such views, a final and crushing answer was given on June 5, 1917, when 11,000,000 young Americans stepped forth from the ranks of the people on the same day and enrolled themselves to defend the same flag. As the sun in his course rolled across the Western Hemisphere that day, he awakened in every village the self-same spirit of Americanism, the self-same response to the call of the common country, the self-same devotion to the banner so affectionately termed Old Glory. Such an event never happened in any country of the globe, and it could not happen to-day in any country except our own. It is impossible to conceive that it should even be tried. So stupendous an event was hailed as incredible by the wise men of the East. It was said that it would take an army to raise an army in the United States, and therefore the United States would never have an army.

I trust that these critics of democracy have had their final answer; that they have had an adequate lesson in the binding force of free government and the principles of democracy.

Our flag is the symbol of equality. It bears in its glorious folds no mark which is not emblematic of equal rights. It was born upon the field of struggle for the rights of man. It was baptized with the blood of the heroes who sacrificed themselves to the principle of self-government and home rule. It was the first flag to fly the skies which contained no feudal emblem, no insignia of a royal house. From the earliest dawn of history, flags have represented the power of kings and nobles, and have been graced and adorned with all of the beauty of heraldry and the marks and distinctions and trappings of royalty. Men have fought for centuries under flags which represented some kind of political or spiritual lordship, but when our flag was given to the breeze for the first time, men fought under the flag of the free.

Its stripes alternate red and white, representing the blood and treasure of 13 revolting Colonies, and its stars, which have grown in number upon the blue field representing the self-governing States of the perpetual Union. Everywhere and through all its design equality and self-government and great principles of democracy are emblazoned before the world. There is a striking absence of the lions or dragons or the fabulous beasts which have marked the feudal banners, and their place has been taken by the equal stripes and the equal stars. Since that dawn of democracy's day when the Starry Banner of freedom and equality was given to the breeze we have seen the feudal ensigns disappear slowly but surely from the earth. First, the flag of France displaced the lilies of the Bourbons with the tricolor of the Republic, and each step in the progress of the world has been marked by advancement of democracy and the defeat of feudalism. When the ancient Empire of China was shaken to its foundations, the yellow dragon disappeared from the flag and its place was taken by the six plain stripes representing the Provinces of the Celestial Empire. Emblematic is this of the growth of democracy throughout the earth and the power of liberty to enlighten the world. Emblematic is it also of the final triumph of the principles of humanity where every man's rights are as equal and his interest as sacred in the eyes of his country as they are in the eye of his God. The shelter of democracy falls equally upon the humble and the great, the powerful and the weak. It spurns the distinction of rank and the tyranny of the strong. It has adopted long since the teachings of Sacred Writ that not a sparrow falls but the Creator of the universe takes note of its fate. In the eyes of a democracy the life, the hopes, and the destiny of the humblest of its citizens are sacred.

We have followed Old Glory through 140 years of its history, and what it means to us we want it to mean to all the world. We have seen it carried through the struggle of the infant colonies, through all the dark days of national disaster, through the bitterness of defeat, through privation and peril until the black midnight of Valley Forge broke into the cloudless dawn at Yorktown. We have seen it wave above the victory of Perry on Lake Erie and the deathless achievement of Jackson behind his cotton bales at New Orleans. We have seen it triumph at Buena Vista, at Monterey, at Cerro Gordo, and Chapultepec. We have seen it sway back and forth in the mighty storm of the Civil War. We have seen it at the high-water mark of that great struggle upon the field of Gettysburg, where for three long days under the burning sun of July the brothers who wore the blue and the brothers who wore the gray hurled themselves against each other in fratricidal strife until they proved to themselves and all of the world that they were one in courage, one in race, and one in destiny. We have seen it with Dewey in Manila Bay and with Sampson and Schley at Santiago, and we shall see it carried in triumph across the bleeding fields of France and Belgium, a beacon of hope to the suffering world. Before it we shall see rolled back the age-old tyranny of rank and privilege until the banner of democracy shall wave in victory above the last stronghold of feudalism on earth.

Forty Feet at Hell Gate.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM,
OF MARYLAND,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 16, 1917.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for deepening the New York Harbor at Hell Gate to 40 feet is shown by the editorial from the World, of New York, May 18, 1917:

FORTY FEET AT HELL GATE.

To provide Cuxhaven and the Elbe with a back door at Kiel, Prussia engaged in an infamous war of conquest upon Denmark, and Germany has since poured out millions upon the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal. To provide the immense naval and merchant shipping of New York, the world's greatest port, with a back door through Long Island Sound, Congress has until now refused the expenditure of a comparatively trivial sum.

A 40-foot channel to the navy yard is provided for in the new rivers and harbors appropriation bill, which takes the place of that beaten by filibustering in the last session. Only a 35-foot depth is provided for Hell Gate, the back door. Navy experts are emphatic in urging that Hell Gate be no exception. The 40-foot channel throughout is strongly advocated by Representative MURRAY HULBERT, the New York member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. It takes so long to get any Government project started that it is important to start right. Compared with the margin of efficiency the difference in cost is trivial.

The improvement of the East River as an alternative outlet of New York is a proper war emergency measure. The improvement of the East River as a time-saving means of expediting commerce is a peace economy. On both grounds the 40-foot channel should be provided.

Aeronautics.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MURRAY HULBERT,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 16, 1917.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, on April 2, 1917, I introduced House bill 3, to establish a Department of Aeronautics, and for other purposes.

This bill provides for the creation of a Department of Aeronautics, with a secretary, who shall be the head thereof, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

To the Department of Aeronautics there shall be transferred the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps of the War Department and the Office of Naval Aeronautics of the Department of the Navy, and the President is further authorized to transfer to the Department of Aeronautics at any time any bureau, division, or other branch of the Government engaged in work pertaining to aeronautics, which, of course, would authorize the transfer of the aeronautical service in the Post Office Department.

Within the Department of Aeronautics there shall be the following bureaus:

(a) Bureau of Land Operations.
(b) Bureau of Naval Operations.
(c) Bureau of Radio Communications.
(d) Bureau of Construction.
(e) Bureau of Aeronautic Research.
(f) Bureau of Motor Power.
(g) Bureau of Personnel and Accounts.

For the purpose of efficient organization at the outset, officers and enlisted men of the War Department and Navy Department, who are now detailed in the aeronautical services, shall be transferred into the service of the department of aeronautics.

An appropriation of $1,000,000 for administrative purposes is provided for.

The counterpart of this bill was introduced in the Senate by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and is known as S. 80.

Hearings upon this bill were begun before a subcommittee—of which Senator SHEPPARD is chairman—of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, on Tuesday, June 12, 1917, and Rear Admiral Robert E. Peary, United States Navy, Lieut. Col. L. W. B. Rees, of the Royal Flying Corps, British Army, and Mr. Howard E. Coffin, chairman of the aircraft production bureau of the Council of National Defense, have already appeared before that committee and been heard.

Rear Admiral Peary will resume his testimony on Monday, June 18, and will be followed by Mr. J. Bernard Walker, editor in chief, Scientific American, Gen. George W. Goethals, and other noted authorities upon the subject of aeronautics.

Under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I submit for the information of the House an article from the Washington Star of June 16, 1917:

AIRMEN OF THE ALLIES TO BE TRAINED IN THE UNITED STATES—AMERICAN TO CONSTRUCT PRACTICE MACHINES AND LEAVE EUROPEAN PLANTS FREE TO MAKE BATTLE PLANES.

As United States manufacturers of aircraft are not at this time equipped for making battle planes, and must develop a type, but are in a situation to supply all the training aeroplanes needed, it is now contemplated that the United States shall be the great training field for aviators of all the allied nations. The aircraft production board of the Council of National Defense has formulated such plans.

Battle craft construction would then occupy the French and British plants exclusively. In the meanwhile, the development of an American type of battle craft would permit the United States to provide by next spring a formidable and steadily increasing addition to the French and British air squadrons.

"Our plan contemplates nothing less than driving the German fliers out of the air and maintaining a constant raiding patrol over territory for 50 miles back of the fighting lines," said Chairman Howard E. Coffin, of the board, in a statement. "If we carry through our program to produce the thousands of machines planned, the permanent supremacy of the allies in the air is assured. What we need is the money to carry the program through."

The American training machine has already been made the standard for all the allies, in order that parts may be interchangeable. While existing American plants are said to be able to supply only 10 per cent of the number of machines wanted, arrangements have been made for the conversion of numerous automobile and other factories for airplane building.

EUROPE TO SEND AVIATORS HERE.

If European aviators are sent to the United States for elementary training, the number of training fields will be increased to a score or more and additional universities will be designated to give technical aviation courses. Thousands could be given a degree of knowledge and skill on this side of the water, and that would make it only a matter for a few weeks at most after their arrival in France before they could join the active squadrons at the front. Their machines and equipment would be furnished to them in France

Mr. Coffin's statement was prompted by a report from Paris that Germany expected to put 3,500 additional planes at the front by next spring.

"Compared with the number of airplanes on which both groups of belligerents so far have been able to rely," he said, "a new force of 3,500 planes next spring might well prove discouraging to the allies. The French and British alone probably can not more than hold their own against Germany's output. Pitted against America's added resources, properly organized, the situation immediately changes. If we can carry through our program to produce the thousands of machines planned, the permanent supremacy of the allies in the air is assured.

"The allies so far have not been able to develop the use of bombing machines to the needed extent because they could not secure enough airplanes to carry out this work upon a great scale. We should furnish them the necessary number of airmen to drive all hostile machines to the ground and carry out the bombing as well as the observation work unhindered."

WANTS UNITED STATES AIR SERVICE PLACED UNDER ONE HEAD.

Coordination of the aeronautical activities of the Government under one head is necessary to have the resources of America fully utilized in building the navy of the air and getting supremacy there, just as Germany has developed her submarines. Howard E. Coffin, chairman of the aircraft production board of the Council of National Defense, told the subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee at a hearing on the Sheppard-Hulbert bill to create a department of aeronautics in the Cabinet. The United States, he said, can develop this industry without interfering with the resources of preparing the Army and Navy.

"It's a question of material, time, and organization which face us to-day in developing this industry," Mr. Coffin said. It is a comparatively easy matter for the Army and Navy, from the experience of the allies, he said, to decide on the type of machines which are needed, but the production is the great question, and the industrial forces must be organized and many plants converted into turning out the parts which go into the machines.

He said the manufacturing resources of Germany were already strained and they could not meet the competition with America in air activity without weakening in some other sphere.

America, he declared, is the great reservoir of men who will make good airmen and contains the resources for producing the machines, but it is necessary to assemble and coordinate these activities so as to turn out the large number of aircraft which will be needed.

Training schools are being established and good progress made in beginning the production of the machines, Mr. Coffin said, but some appropriations will be necessary.

Representatives of America, Canada, and Great Britain have agreed on a standard machine, which will be used in training the airmen, and types of the heavier and speedy machine of the French are available, and will be standardized for use by this Government, he said, explaining, however, that it was necessary for beginners to train with the slower and easier controlled machine.

The United States, Mr. Coffin stated, should follow the example of Great Britain and create a board to deal with the after-war development of aircraft.

Mr. Coffin suggested that manufacturing of machines for obtaining the control of the air was the very best help which America can give the allies.

The importance of this bill is particularly emphasized by Brig. Gen. George O. Squier, Chief Signal Officer, United States Army, who, in an interview on June 15, 1917, discussing the great aeroplane program, which, if passed by Congress, will involve an appropriation of something like $600,000,000, said:

Aeroplanes are the logical fighting machines for Americans, because we are an imaginative people, and when our imagination strikes fire nothing can stop us. The game ideally suits the American temperament, and every young American worthy of the name should be keen to join our flying army.

An army in the air, regiments and brigades of winged cavalry, mounted on gas-driven flying horses, could blind the eyes of Germany until her gunners, absolutely deprived of range finders, would be put out of business by the allied artillery. The magnificently obvious thing is to knock out Germany's eyes by a thrust through the air. But my idea would be something vastly larger than a thrust. An inundation of airplanes would better express the idea in its magnitude.

Sweep the Germans from the sky, blind the Prussian cannon, and the time would be ripe to release an enormous flock of flying fighters to raid and destroy military camps, ammunition depots, and military establishments of all kinds. The firing upon troops by machine guns from airplanes is becoming commoner and more accurate. Once given an upper hand, the flying machine becomes a frightful engine of destruction.

During peace times the machinery of this House provided three committees, of 21 members each, to consider legislation and appropriations for the entire military and naval affairs of the United States, which amount, in the aggregate, was less than the amount which we can reasonably expect we shall soon be asked to appropriate for the building up of our aeronautical service, so that the importance of having a separate and independent committee to deal with this paramount service is at once apparent. I have therefore introduced a resolution providing for the creation of such a committee, to be known as the Committee on Aeronautics, consisting of 21 Members of the House, which resolution has been referred to the Committee on Rules, to whom I propose to apply immediately for a hearing.

In conclusion, I desire to insert a very able editorial from the New York Globe of June 15, 1917:

THE AIR STAGE OF THE WAR.

First came the infantry phase of the war. Huge bodies of marching men, screened by cavalry, were hurled into France to smash their way by mass attack to Paris.

Next, after the stalemate of the trenches, was developed the idea that artillery, capable of pulverizing field defenses, gave the recipe for winning the war. The way the Russian lines along the Dunajec were pierced seemed to establish the thesis that superior weight of metal destroyed the advantages of defense. In the Champagne, at Verdun, in the Somme region, in front of Arras, and the Messines ridge the method has been used—is still being used.

Then Germany discovered that the submarine provided an answer to the great riddle. Ravaging undersea craft could and would break the sea communications of Great Britain and France and deliver them to her hand. German hope beat high when she unloosed her piratical craft and the sinkings became numerous. News came to Berlin that Great Britain was in semipanic.

Infantry, artillery, and submarines, while vital factors, have so far brought no decisive results. Mass attacks against prepared positions bristling with machine guns are now admitted to be futile. The artillery is able to provide openings through which an advance can be made, but the process is slow. The heavy guns are not easily moved. Ground gains come only by inching forward. Since the Dunajec surprise neither side has been able to break the line of its adversary over a front wide enough to permit a flanking army to pass through.

We approach a further phase of the war—the air stage; not a period of the lumbering Zeppelin, but of the airplane. The opinion is hardening into conviction that the set of belligerents that gains and holds a command of the air similar to the command of the seas possessed by the allies is to win a military victory.

At first the airplane was thought of merely as the eyes of an army. The machines were light, fast, and practically unprotected. They were merely to see and report. But the development of antiaircraft guns and of armored fighting machines capable of chasing away observers compelled the building of answering air fighters to protect the reconnoiters. The air service became specialized—some airplanes were only to see and others to make certain their chance to see.

A further differentiation occurred. The machine suitable for low observation was different in type from that suitable for reconnaissance far behind the lines. Then came the light and rapidly climbing airplanes to pester the heavy fighter. Finally, there is now the bomb carrier, in which everything is sacrificed to the ability to carry a weight of explosives to be dropped on railroads and depots and troop concentrations. Experience has shown that it takes eight hours to reopen an interrupted railroad, and one can imagine what a sufficient number of bomb carriers could do if able to wing their way unmolested to points above the German communications. Given airplanes enough of the several types and the army of the allies, with the artillery and their brave infantry, have victory in sight.

This is the doctrine now in vogue among the ally commanders. Not neglecting shells and other things, they are asking for a speeding up of airplane factories and a vast increase in the number of aviators. Great Britain proposes to spend a billion on her air service within a year. France is equally busy. Germany, not to be behind, is rushing construction and training with feverish speed.

And it is everywhere agreed that the direct aid that the United States can most rapidly give to her allies is by providing airplanes and aviators in great supply. It is perhaps not feasible for us to build fighting planes extensively, for the developments are rapid and the maker must be close to the firing line. Merely in transportation three months would be consumed to bring a model over and send a copy back. But training machines, reconnoiterers, and bomb carriers can be made here according to standardized models, and the factories of Great Britain and France be kept free for the construction of the fighters.

So far we have done little except to prepare to prepare. Only this week was the $60,000,000 carried by the appropriation approved in March made available. Before that no more than the $14,000,000 of last year's appropriation could be drawn on.

But the new appropriation does not begin to provide the financial foundation for what there is need to do. Without debate a credit comparable to that authorized by Great Britain should at once be voted. Long before our new army can be made ready a force of 100,000 American aviators can be intensively trained and dispatched abroad. Failure to do this means a prolongation of the war, and for every day of prolongation there will be a sacrifice of 5,000 Americans.

Germany can not hold her trench line if she is driven from the air and the communications of her armies are exposed to constant bombing attacks by airplanes flying low enough to be able to throw explosives to hit their marks. A force of 100,000 airplanes will have the military effectiveness, it is estimated, of 2,000,000 foot soldiers. We need to open our minds to the possibilities that offer, and if we do even a debating Congress will not care to take the responsibility of a neglect that means unnecessary sorrow to American households.

New York Harbor.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MURRAY HULBERT,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 16, 1917.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, when the rivers and harbors bill was taken up under the five-minute rule, at the suggestion of one of my colleagues I telegraphed to the mayor of the city of New York for specific information in regard to the improvements contemplated, and the approximate cost thereof, by the city of New York, if the pending bill should become a law.

Under leave granted me to extend my remarks I desire to put in the RECORD a telegram from Hon. R. A. C, Smith. dock commissioner, city of New York, which was not received in time to be read in connection with the consideration of the Hell Gate and other New York items:

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 15, 1917.

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT,
Committee on Rivers and Harbors, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Mayor Mitchel is absent from the city and his office has asked me to reply to your telegram. The city is now spending over five millions of dollars on Hudson River to meet obligation to Federal Government to avoid further encroachment on channel. Federal cooperation in Hudson River urgently needed to make improvements available. City is prepared to spend large sums in making the East River available for important commercial uses if Federal Government will begin improvement. Deepening and widening of Hell Gate are improvements of importance which can not be overestimated. Large areas of Brooklyn, Queens, and Bronx can not be developed until Federal aid is secured, and in order that the State Barge Canal may fulfill its great function as a water carrier in connection with deep-sea commerce.

R. A. C. SMITH, Dock Commissioner.

The Cement Trust.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. C. DYER,
OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 19, 1917.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, on May 4 last I introduced a resolution (H. Res. 74) asking that the Attorney General of the United States advise the Congress as to what he had done and was doing to bring the Cement Trust within the law and to punish those responsible for said trust. This resolution was sent to the Attorney General by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Hon. EDWIN Y. WEBB, and the Attorney General has reported that the department has been investigating the said trust, but he did not report any convictions for violation of the law with respect thereto. I also wrote a letter to the Attorney General regarding this resolution. The reply that I received is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1917.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The department has received your letter of the 28th ultimo, inclosing a copy of a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa relative to an alleged combination between the manufacturers of cement to increase and maintain prices, and inquiring whether this department has made any investigation of the subject.

The question whether the manufacturers of Portland cement have entered into any combination or agreement in violation of the Federal antitrust law is now under investigation and consideration by this department. Certain cement manufacturers on the Pacific coast have already been indicted, and some of them have entered pleas of guilty and the others are now on trial. A copy of the indictment in this case is inclosed for your information.

Consideration of the general subject has not yet been concluded, and therefore the department is not at this time prepared to state whether further prosecutions will be instituted.

Respectively, for the Attorney General,

G. CARROLL TODD,
Assistant to the Attorney General.

Recently I again wrote him and sent him information showing that there was in existence a Cement Trust in clear violation of the law. He again replied that the matter would be further investigated. I am not given to criticize the administration or the members of the various departments of the Government. I rather am inclined to believe that they are desirous of doing their best for the public and to have the antitrust laws fully enforced. Hence I do not at this time desire to call up this resolution and ask for its adoption by the House. I prefer to wait a reasonable time and see if we can get some results through the efforts of the Attorney General. There is hardly anything more important, so far as national defense is concerned, than cement. It is needed in many things as regards roads, fortifications, and so forth. It is the duty of the Attorney General to vigorously prosecute those guilty of forming this Cement Trust, and he should do it promptly. It is his duty to call the matter to the attention of the district attorneys of the United States and to ask their help in obtaining evidence to prosecute those guilty of violating the laws of the United States as regards this matter. As an evidence of the trust and the fixing of prices as regards cement, I beg to call attention to the following authentic quotations from manufacturers of cement, as follows:

FEBRUARY 8, 1917.

(Quotations are sent to contractors in the city of Chicago on plain stationery, in a plain envelope, and bear no signature.)

The various manufacturers of Portland cement who sell their products in the State of Michigan, as, for instance, the Universal Portland Cement Co., of 210 South La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill.; the Michigan Portland Cement Co., of Chelsea, Mich.; the Wyandotte Portland Cement Co., of 1525 Ford Building, Detroit, Mich.; and the Peninsula Portland Cement Co., of Jackson, Mich., quote prices for cement that are identical, and on terms that are the same.

On October 23, 1916, the Portland Cement Association entered into an agreement with the board of road commissioners of Washington County, Miss., to the effect that the association would guarantee to have a responsible contractor enter into and sign their usual form of contract for the construction of 141 miles of 9-foot concrete road, the same to be constructed under the standard specifications of the Portland Cement Association; the contractor to place also a 3-foot gravel shoulder 4 inches thick on each side of said road, all for a total sum not to exceed $830,000. The agreement was signed by the Portland Cement Association and per Guy F. Mills, then their local representative in that section. The proposition was accepted by the board of road commissioners. The association also agreed to enter into a contract for 100 miles or more of said road to cost in proportion as in the above agreement.

Some time in January Mr. Affleck, president of the Portland Cement Association, appeared in Washington County, Miss., and while there is understood to have made a proposition to furnish cement at a price that would enable the road commission to construct the mileage desired within the amount of the bond issue, regardless of the current price of cement. In other words, while a price of $1.40 per barrel delivered was guaranteed, if Washington County is unable to secure bids sufficiently low to permit of the construction of the mileage desired using cement at $1.40 per barrel, then the cement association would lower the price on cement sufficiently to make it possible to construct the desired mileage within the amount of the bond issue.

On April 12 the road commission received bids on the work described above, and the best bid received was approximately $500,000 more than the cement association had undertaken to have the work done for by contractors which it would furnish, with bond, to do the work. It was understood that the representative of the cement association appealed to the road commission to postpone the said road construction, which caused the commission to become suspicious of the cement association with respect to their intention to carry out their agreement. The association having failed to convince the road commission on this point, the commission entered suit against the cement association for approximately $600,000.

It is common knowledge throughout the country that there is a Cement Trust, and, as stated above, cement being so important in this war the Attorney General ought to give his best energy and efforts to prosecuting those guilty of violation of the law. The food question is hardly of more importance than that of cement. Cement is equally important so far as the war is concerned to that of fuel.

I insert the following editorial showing general knowledge of the fact that there is a Cement Trust:

[From the Fort Wayne Daily News, Thursday, May 17, 1917.]

THE CEMENT TRUST.

Never before in the history of the country have the people been so viciously exploited by predatory combinations as they are to-day. Practically every commodity that enters into our living is controlled by ruthless conspirators against the public pocketbook, and the brazen manner in which they conduct their illegal activities is at once a scandal and a reproach. The nefarious workings of the food speculators, the coal barons, and a few others are familiar to every citizen, for they directly affect all the people, yet there are other combinations in restraint of trade, fully as conscienceless as those mentioned, which by indirection attack the public interest in a manner no less vital.

For example, there is the cement manufacturers' trust, a hard and fast union of conspirators, that simply laughs the law to scorn and makes little or no attempt to conceal the fact that it regards piracy as its privilege and extortion as its God-given right. The average citizen of Fort Wayne no doubt gives little heed to this, for he reasons that inasmuch as he does not have to buy cement as he has to buy coal and bread, it is really no concern of his what price is exacted by its manufacturers. Yet it really is his concern, for this conspiracy is having the result to-day of holding up the erection of a number of important buildings here by making their construction so costly as to be impracticable. The Young Men's Christian Association Building, the Hope Hospital, and possibly the municipal assembly hall might all be built except for the unjust and unreasonable price asked for cement, for cement can be used as a very satisfactory substitute for structural steel.

The experience of Louis Fox suffices to illustrate the case. Mr. Fox is preparing to build at Calhoun and Washington Streets a large department-store building and is having a harrowing time of it. It being practically impossible to place an order for structural steel, Mr. Fox naturally turned to cement and immediately came in contact with the trust—violent contact with it. As his order was designed to be an unusually large one he sought bids from not only all of the local agencies but from a number of manufacturers having no representatives in Fort Wayne. And in due time he received quotations from all of them. Now, it might have been expected that for an order so large there would have been lively competition with a wide variance in the bids. But nothing of the sort! All the bids were identical—not the deviation of a hair's breadth or the advantage of a penny.

Uniformly the bids ran $2.29 a barrel for cement in cloth sacks and $2.04 for that in paper sacks. The terms were 30 days net, with a slight reduction for the return of the cloth sacks if shipped at purchaser's expense. Moreover, all the letters blandly announced that the price offered was one that was subject to change without notice, the gentle inference being that any change would be a change for the worse.

Now, the exercise of that judgment which God gave geese makes it perfectly clear that by no conceivable freak of coincidence could these bids have been identical without agreement among the manufacturers. These men have gotten together in magnificent defiance of the Federal law and are putting the thumbscrews on the public. They are demanding $2.29 a barrel for a product which they formerly were glad to sell for 85 cents a barrel—and they are getting the price. Certain work has to be done, and the cement men know it. They know that structural steel can not be secured, so they have commercialized necessity and are robbing those unfortunate enough to be obliged to buy their product. To be sure, the increased cost to the manufacturers of operation probably warrants an advance in their prices, but 15 cents a barrel would take care of this increase very handsomely. The charge of $2.29 agreed upon by them as probably "all the traffic will bear" is as predatory in its character as a midnight raid on a farmer's henroost.

It is said that the Government is too much engrossed by the war at present to take cognizance of such flouting of its authority, but it is difficult to see why this is so. Indeed, one might reasonably suppose that the prompt punishment of those so villianously interfering with business would be an important part of the successful conduct of the war. Moreover, it is exceedingly difficult to see just wherein our various district attorneys are burdened with the responsibilities incident to recruiting, arming, and moving soldiers or with raising the necessary funds

It should be their "bit" to see to it that the civil laws of the land are obeyed and that no obstacles are placed in the path of business by those whose unworthy ambition seems to be to get rich quick by methods which would have given Capt. Kidd shooting pains and caused Claude Duval and Dick Turpin to grow green with that jealousy which the amateur evinces in the presence of the master of the art.

I have many other evidences of the certain fact that there is a Cement Trust in this country, but I do not feel that more are necessary to call this important matter to the attention of the Congress and the country than what I have put in the RECORD as above. Within the next few weeks I hope to learn of definite and vigorous action by the Attorney General of the United States against those responsible for this outrageous violation of the law. If my anticipations in this regard are fulfilled, I will not have to trouble Congress further about the matter.

Hardwick Amendment to the Federal Reserve Act.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE P. DARROW,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 14, 1917.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, no one has ever contended that the Federal reserve act was perfect nor that it should be like the law of the Medes and Persians, unchangeable; but whatever changes are made should be in the interest of the general public and not for the benefit of the few, when by so doing it would place an unnecessary burden upon the business community.

The Federal Reserve System was organized with the idea that checks would be at par all over the United States irrespective of what banks they were drawn on, and the so-called Hardwick amendment, if adopted, would destroy this advantage and probably compel all banks and clearing houses to adopt a uniform charge for the collection of checks; and inasmuch as banks are very human, they would probably take advantage of the full exchange tariff allowed in the Hardwick amendment. Banks naturally and properly desire to increase their dividends, but if we legalize these exchange charges, it will put the check-collecting business of the country in a far worse position than before the passage of the Federal reserve act.

The collection of checks is chiefly a matter of bookkeeping, and while some argue that banks are put to considerable expense in paying express or transportation charges on currency to settle checks presented for collection, as a matter of fact the amount of currency so used is almost infinitesimal. It has been estimated that not more than one dollar in a million is so transferred. If this be true, that these exchange charges are needed for that purpose, it would mean that for every dollar so transported the banks would collect one thousand dollars from their depositors.

A charge of one-tenth of 1 per cent may seem small, but it is estimated that this amendment, if adopted, will cost the banks of my city $400,000 additional expense each year, which would be charged to the business houses, and be an additional tax on the business community. What is true for Philadelphia, is equally true in a greater or less degree of every town or city in the United States. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if the country banks be authorized to make this charge, the clearing houses in the different centers would be compelled to pass resolutions charging all depositors one dollar a thousand, and thereby defeat one of the main purposes of the Federal reserve act, namely, that checks would be at par all over the United States when collected through the Federal Reserve System.

Many years ago there was a man in Binghamton, N. Y., who secured the Democratic nomination for governor because he had a reputation of "paying the freight"—a remarkable qualification in those days for a Democratic governor. Jones had built up a splendid business because he dealt liberally with the people and paid the freight on the goods he sold, so his campaign slogan was, "Jones pays the freight." I now venture to say that it will be the same with the banks if they perform this small service of free collections at par. They will prosper more than they will if they exact a pound of flesh for every stroke of the pen.

Bank dividends are earned largely by loaning the depositors' money, and the collection of checks, which is a matter of transferring credit from one to another, is one of the principal returns the depositor receives for the use of his money.

For the reasons I have cited, and arguments advanced by other gentlemen on the floor of the House of Representatives, I voted against the motion made to instruct the House conferees to agree to the Hardwick amendment when this question was before us several weeks ago, and shall at every opportunity oppose an amendment permitting member or nonmember banks making a charge of 10 cents on $100 or fraction thereof for collection or payment of checks and drafts by exchange or otherwise through the Federal Reserve System.

"Hats Off."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GILBERT A. CURRIE,
OF MICHIGAN,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Friday, June 15, 1917.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to insert in the RECORD an editorial which recently appeared in the Midland Sun, published at Midland, Mich. My reason for incorporating this editorial in the RECORD is on account of its recital of a very commendable and patriotic sentiment prevailing among the young men of that city. In a total registration of 505 only 24 claimed exemption for any reason, notwithstanding the fact that over 75 per cent of these men are employed in a great chemical industry.

Michigan seems destined to exemplify, in this great conflict, its traditional virtues. The Wolverine State was among the very first in the Civil War to muster into Federal service its full quota of men, and no soldiers ever displayed greater courage or valor on the fields of battle than did the Michigan boys in that gigantic struggle for the preservation of the Union. Their fame and glory, so valiantly won by courage and bravery displayed upon a score of battle fields, is a matter of history and an inspiration to the younger generation to dedicate themselves to the glory of the Nation in this great crisis.

When the Nation was again plunged into war in 1898, battling for the rights of humanity and to free Cuba from tyranny and oppression, Michigan soldiery was again in the forefront. Now, seemingly in the face of the greatest war that has ever confronted mankind, Michigan, true to traditional spirit, loyalty, and bravery, comes forth to share its full responsibility in the battles "to make the world safe for democracy." While the census estimate for registration was 328,151, Michigan registered 372,872, or 113.6 per cent. These totals, according to information obtained from the War Department, places Michigan, with a single exception, in the lead of all the States of the Union, so far as reported, in respect to the percentage of men registered. Also in this connection I wish to have recorded the fact that Michigan has already mustered her full allotment into the Regular Service, and the full quota of National Guard is being rapidly attained.

[From the Midland Sun, June 7, 1917.]

Patriotism, what is it? Many and varied have been the answers given. The young men of Midland—God bless them—gave an answer Tuesday that will stand forever to their honor. Quietly, seriously, manfully they presented themselves in response to our President's call and registered. Five hundred and five in all, only 24 of whom claimed exemption from military service—nearly all for self-evident physical reasons.

One splendid type of manhood broke down and cried when refused registration—he was 32. "I wanted to go with my brother," he explained, "but I can volunteer." Minus the third finger of the right hand another, when asked if he claimed exemption replied, "No; I'm all right, it's not my shooting finger"; in this case there was also a wife and baby at home.

Manhood, patriotic manhood, is written large in the action of these, our fellow citizens, on this occasion which has tried men's souls, and we wish, in our humble way, to pay homage where it is due.

In many of the largest cities one-half of the registered claim exemption. Midland, with its great chemical industry, was an ideal place for such claims, but our boys would not take advantage of this situation.

Hats off to Old Glory and to every man willing to defend her!

"Origin of the Banner."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER W. GREGG,
OF TEXAS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, June 18, 1917.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a short poem, entitled "Origin of the Banner," written by Mrs. Rose C. Deming, of Palestine, Tex.

The poem is as follows:

ORIGIN OF THE BANNER.

[Written by Mrs. Rose C. Deming, of Palestine, Tex. Recited by Mrs. Ida Branagan at the presentation of a banner by the ladies of Palestine to the First Military Company, August, 1883.]

When the archangel Michael had marshaled his armies,
And the long ranks filed out to do combat for heaven,
The gate of the battlement standing half open
'Lowed a gleam of the light from within to be given.

It streamed o'er that army all azure and gold
And floated above it like pennons set free,
And the dark of the universe caught from its fold
The light that now 'lumines its uttermost sea.

The angels fought under this banner of brightness,
And routed night's host from the gateway above,
And forever was planted the thought of a banner,
An ensign, a standard, to reverence and love.

Earth gathers her armies to battle for honor
And floats o'er their columns the flag they're to save;
Each soldier walks under and swears to defend it,
Are wrapped in its folds to lie down in his grave.

It's no meaningless fancy, this flagstaff of nations—
'Tis the sign of a sentiment deep in each breast;
It means home and country, our altars and firesides,
Wives, mothers, children, whate'er we love best.

The heart of true manhood ever thrills to behold it,
The eye gleams with pride, the pulses beat high,
And cowards and cravens shrink back from its wavings
When the strong hands of patriots carry it by.

We bring you a standard all azure and starlight,
Unfurl o'er your heads our grand banner of state,
And bid you defend it from foe or dishonor,
To lead with its leading, its fate be your fate.

Like the ray that first gleamed from the portals of heaven,
May the light of its stars shine to guide you aright,
Its fold be a curtain between you and evil,
Its honor your glory, ever stainless and bright!

The Food-Control Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM W. HASTINGS,
OF OKLAHOMA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, June 18, 1917.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I herewith submit some observations sent me by Hon. F. M. Gault, president Oklahoma State Board of Agriculture, commenting upon the difference in market prices of certain products, particularly wheat, between what is received by the producer and what is paid by the consumer. They are as follows:

OBSERVATIONS BY F. M. GAULT, PRESIDENT OKLAHOMA STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE.

Never in the history of this country was there more urgent need of a strong Jacksonian policy than at this moment, when speculators are taking advantage of a national crisis to filch from the people unwarranted and exorbitant profits. The manner in which speculative sharks are capitalizing and commercializing the newspaper reports with reference to the grain on hand, for example, causes wonderment that the Government does not make use of its enlarged authority during a state of war to promptly and vigorously handle those fellows who have been and still are squeezing the people for profit when they should be participating in a patriotic effort to promote the people's welfare and assist in bringing our country to a state of military and industrial preparedness.

Personally I would rather see one of these profit sharks placed behind the bars of a military prison than to learn of the sinking of a German battleship. I think they are worse than an alien enemy who operates in the open, for these men are virtually shooting their brothers in the back. They are little better than those "human ghouls" described by Victor Hugo as going on the field of battle in the night and robbing the corpses of those slain in battle while fighting for the preservation of their country.

These sharks are constantly forcing upward the cost of living and bringing distress when naturally there is no occasion for it. They have actually decreased by 100 per cent the purchasing power of the dollar, and their nefarious work operates as a detriment to patriotism. Patriotism can not thrive on an empty stomach.

It is denied in some quarters that grain speculators are doing this, but let us look at some facts right here at home:

In 1916 Oklahoma produced 27,541,000 bushels of wheat. Prior to October 1, 73 per cent, or 20,105,000 bushels, were marketed at an average price of $1.05 per bushel. In October, 7 per cent, or 1,938,000 bushels, were marketed at $1.42 per bushel; in November, 6 per cent, or 1,653,000 bushels, were marketed at $1.71 per bushel; in December, 4 per cent, or 1,102,000 bushels, were marketed; in January, 3 per cent, or 826,000 bushels, were marketed at $1.56; in February, 2 per cent, or 551,000 bushels, were marketed at $1.75; in March, 2 per cent, or 551,000 bushels, were marketed at $1.68; in April, 2 per cent, or 551,000 bushels, were marketed at $1.87. Of the total wheat crop of the State of Oklahoma in 1916, 35 per cent was sold at an average price of 89 cents per bushel, 38 per cent of the total wheat crop was sold at an average price of $1.21 per bushel, and 27 per cent of the crop at an average price of $1.66 per bushel.

The average price the farmer obtained for the 1916 wheat crop was $1.22 per bushel. On the basis of to-day's market of $16 per barrel for flour, he pays the merchant $3.80 for the products obtained from the bushel of wheat, or $2.58 more than he received from the wheat originally. Of this amount 24 cents is the actual cost of manufacture, leaving a clear profit of $2.34 on a bushel of wheat, which is absorbed in its travel from the farmer's bin until it again reaches him in its manufactured stage.

The $2.34 profit derived after the deduction of the 24 cents for milling is double the amount that the producer actually received for the grain delivered to the elevator.

I have heard a great deal on the conservation of foodstuffs and that half of the world is on a starvation basis. If these conditions prevail in every other State, the United States and the whole world soon will be on a starvation basis, and it does not require the services of a Pinkerton detective to determine who is responsible. This applies not only to wheat production but to everything else produced and marketed to-day.

The ordinary pair of shoes worn by farmers and merchants costs $1.22 in the box. This shoe formerly sold for $4 per pair, but has been increased to $8 per pair, and the increased valuation of material and labor is actually only 9 per cent.

The price of cowhides, green, has increased 30 per cent. This applies to the ordinary shoe worn by farmers, laborers, and merchants. The stylish shoe has an added sale valuation of $1 an inch for each inch in excess of the ordinary height.

One good cowhide will furnish leather for a first-class set of harness. A cowhide costs from 17 cents to 19 cents per pound, green. When manufactured into leather it will make a set of harness. A set of harness to-day is valued at $70—$30 more than it sold for three years ago. The fixtures, such as hames, buckles, and other metal, will cost $5 to $6. Mr. Farmer, Merchant, and Conservist, please figure the amount derived from raw material from the time it leaves the producer until it returns to the producer in the form of a finished product.

The man who produces the foodstuffs and products that go to make up the manufactured article seems not to be considered, except as a patriot. It is extremely difficult to make the individual realize that it is his duty to protect his country during his country's need under conditions such as these profit takers have brought about by their unholy greed.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. WARD,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, June 18, 1917.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, having considered the same, recommended that the bill do pass. As one who voted in committee against the bill as it now stands, I feel it incumbent upon me to offer to the House some expression of my opinion and best judgment in regard thereto.

The bill in theory is the most sweeping and far-reaching piece of legislation of its kind that has seriously been considered by the official representatives of the people since the framing of the Constitution. Broadly speaking, the bill empowers the President to seize all food and fix prices on same, the price to be subject to review by the courts. It would authorize the establishment (sec. 3) of a governmental control of necessaries which would include the production and consumption of necessaries. This vital power, reaching, as it would be possible under such a law, to the very power of life or death over our people would, under the practical working out of the law (sec. 4) be in the hands of one person, a food controller, and neither the people nor their Representatives in Congress would have a voice in the choice of the man who under the law could exercise this arbitrary power that to my mind is abhorrent to the principles of free government.

If this bill should become a law, the 104,000,000 of our people will be subject to the rule of the food dictator; but he in turn is not responsible to them. Such a condition, so subversive to the meaning and sense of our Constitution, is, in my opinion, unnecessary, unwise, and unjustified even in the light of the needs and circumstances arising out of the present war. The bill is a war measure, and for that reason alone does it stand for argument at all. It is my opinion that no matter how much the concentration of power is conducive to efficiency, nevertheless the heavy demands upon us in this war can be met, as far as we have human ability to meet them, without the wanton surrender of the people's will executed through the ordinary constitutional channels—the legislative branch of their Federal Government. The great war in which we are now engaged is a conflict between democracy and autocracy. Democracy must be victorious, and I cherish the hope that in the fight it will hold true to its own character and not resort to attributes of its foe.

The bill carries on its face a declaration to the effect that, by reason of the existence of a state of war, the things required or forbidden are essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support of the Army and Navy, and—section 3—it declares that the processes, methods, and activities concerning necessaries are affected with a public interest. And the contention follows that the chief aims of the bill are—

> To eliminate waste, to conserve the supply of food, to stimulate production, to prevent hoarding, to restrain injurious speculation, to prevent corners and extortion, and to prevent deceptive practices and effect equitable distribution.

I do not deny the fact that the accomplishment of these aims is praiseworthy, is needful, and is entirely within the public policies of our Government. The common knowledge we all have of the subnormal supply of food and the abnormal demand by reason of the exertions of war prompts us to readily appreciate the accomplishment of the conservation, control, and increased production of foodstuffs. The accomplishment of these purposes, under existing conditions and future conditions which we may expect, is essential to the successful prosecution of the war. Food control, in view of this world emergency, is preeminently necessary in the way of stringent and unusual law. Hoarding, speculation, and all other similar practices so manifestly incompatible with the public interest must be dealt with rigorously and with dispatch; and, further than this, we need to stimulate production. But should the tremendous power of food control rest in the collective wisdom of Congress, or shall Congress evade its constitutional responsibility and delegate this vast power, the ultimate exercise of which, under this bill, would be in the whim or discretion of a food controller, as yet unnamed? Shall we legislate specifically, so that all men may know what the law is and adjust their businesses accordingly, or are we, as this bill proposes—section 5—to put power in one man to regulate or stop, as his own discretion prompts him, the business of any persons or all persons engaged in the importation, exportation, manufacture, storage, or distribution of any necessaries and to allow only those to continue in such business whom the dictator sees fit to issue a license to?

No one, so far as I know, contends that there is any question of famine restrictions on our part. Admittedly, America has an excess of food supply. Mr. Hoover states that, and he has expressly stated that the question is wholly one of cooperation with the allies. Our cooperation with our allies must be wholehearted, as all the world knows that it is; but in our characteristic eagerness to do our full share, and more if need be, in this great struggle, we can not afford to lose our balance. The American Congress can pass laws with "teeth" in them, and pass them quickly, to adequately meet demands without necessitating the casting aside the collective wisdom of the people's Representatives and the surrender of their power into the hands of some one food dictator.

Aside from the question of unwarranted concentration of power, that seems to me repugnant to our political institutions, there is a very serious question, in my mind, in respect to the broad scope of the legislation proposed. Admitting, for the purpose of argument, that the concentration of power as found in the bill is consistent with our form of government or that the war emergency makes it so, then we have to consider the question of the practicability of establishing an absolute dictatorship of food control in this country. If this bill as it now stands becomes a law, the lawmaking function of Congress in respect to "necessaries" will be transferred from the legislature to the Executive. The power under this bill is boundless. So sweeping and general are the terms of the bill and so vague are even its particulars that under it we know not where we go. The dictator who will be put into control by the President will be confronted with a superhuman task dealing with the complexities this practically unlimited law will lead to, a task which, in my opinion. can not, in principle or in wisdom, be put upon the shoulders of an individual. The extraordinary powers already possessed by the President in war time under the Constitution are ample; the powers which the President now possesses are hardly within the capabilities of mortal man to execute. To transfer to him in its entirely the proper function of Congress in dealing with the food situation is taking a step inconsistent with good judgment as regards the public welfare.

There must be found authority in the Constitution, either under the express or implied powers, to do what this bill proposes to do if this proposed legislation is constitutional. The Constitution gives power and restricts power in war time as well as it does in times of peace. A long line of Supreme Court decisions makes that statement uncontrovertible. This bill, in my opinion, in some of its provisions provides for power which are extraconstitutional. For instance, the fourth amendment to the Constitution provides that—the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or things to be seized.

And yet section 5 of this bill provides that—

* * * The President is authorized to prescribe such regulations governing the conduct of the business of licensees as may be essential to prevent uneconomical manufacture and inequitable distribution of necessaries and otherwise to carry out the purposes of this act. Such regulations may also include requirements for the issuance of licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees.

This section of the bill would authorize the present unknown agents of the President to come into any licensee's place of business at any time and demand an inspection of all of his books or accounts. The section is wholly inconsistent with both the letter and the spirit of the safeguards in the Constitution. The contention is made, in the memorandum on the constitutionality of the bill, that no machinery is provided for compelling a person to submit to such inspection, and that if his books would show him to be a violator of the law then he can refuse to show them, as then he would be protected by the constitutional guaranty in regard to not being compelled to produce incriminating evidence against himself. If the law does not mean what it says, then, in my opinion, it is unsound policy to put it before the people as a law. In many other particulars I believe the bill is contrary to the letter as well as to the spirit of the Constitution.

Besides the armies of our young men that will soon be on the battle fields of Europe, fighting as American soldiers have always fought, our country, by far the leading agricultural country of the world, is being depended upon to feed the armies of our allies in arms. We have not alone to consider the feeding of ourselves and our armies. But the task that is thrown upon the shoulders of the American farmer is to produce enough above the normal surplus of foodstuffs to make up for the shortage of our allies. That is the task that confronts the American farmer. I believe he will be equal to it as far as human endeavor can make him so. He is industrious, thrifty, and equipped for his great task. The eternal law of supply and demand will operate, no matter what laws we pass and the farmer will produce the maximum; further than this, the American farmer is a high-born patriot, and if treated fairly will exert himself to the utmost to do his great part in the war. Why burden him, as this bill would do, with an overlord or dictator, who will be vested with the arbitrary authority to requisition at any time at his discretion the products of the farm and pay the farmer a price which he, the dictator, may think reasonable. Notwithstanding a guaranteed price, that may be fixed—section 12—under given conditions for a certain time, this controlling power of production and consumption to be exercised at the discretion of one man will be resented by the farmer, who by right deserves an open and unmenacing road. The farmer stands ready to do his part; he is ready to do more. He can see men of other industries grow wealthy through excessive profits by reason of the war, and yet, knowing that his product is the most vitally needed of all, he is willing to sacrifice excessive profits and to submit to a regulation that will allow him only a fair return, and that will encompass his whole industry. He is willing to do this if it be necessary for the welfare of his country. He will welcome legislation that will give him a fair profit, that will kill speculation and evil practices of their kind, and that will assure a fair price to the consumer whether that consumer be domestic or foreign. But the farmer objects to seeing the absolute power over his industry put into the hands of some one who will be appointed a dictator. The farmer is opposed to the establishment of a dictatorshop in his industry while the power over every other industry is left remaining in its proper constitutional place.

"Riotous, Exorbitant Cost of Living."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY I. EMERSON,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 20, 1917.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following letter:

RIOTOUS, EXORBITANT COST OF LIVING—ELIMINATION OF ITS CHIEF CAUSE.

PHILADELPHIA, June 16, 1917.

Hon. HENRY I. EMERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The people of the United States are quite correctly considered the most lenient and patient, as well as the most intelligent in the world. As there is a reason for everything, so this leniency and patience is accounted for by the fact that the people, as a free people, had been so preoccupied with their personal, individual work in hand and had been so satisfied with its results that their attitude toward the various administrations lacked a certain amount of vigor. Under different conditions their attitude toward any administration will likewise differ.

It is not only in theory that we confront nowadays a crisis that is in reality a national peril, but we are face to face with it, and under those circumstances the President of the United States should have been voluntarily offered by both Houses of Congress means—that is, enactment of laws that would have given him full authority and power to protect the people at large, not only from the notorious infamous military autocrat of the world, the worst kind imaginable that ever existed, but also from the not less notorious infamous piratical speculators and gamblers of foodstuff, fuel, and kerosene oil in the country.

There is a well-grounded saying that misfortune never comes alone, and the greatest misfortune at the present time for the United States is that the country has to fight an external enemy and an internal one at the same time. The sooner the internal enemy is crushed, the better the Nation will be equipped from any point of view to crush the notorious infamous military autocratic enemy of the entire democratic world. Civilization itself is at stake.

There is no need to reiterate historic facts. Everyone knows that history is full of illustrations showing that there is a limit to tyrannical exaction from a people, be they ever so lenient and patient. You are receiving a comfortable compensation for your services. You enjoy an exalted position in the eyes of the people. You probably are satisfied and are pleased with such a position. But possibly you do not mingle with those who de facto have already been obliged to curtail their daily rations at breakfast, dinner, and supper; and the innocent little ones do not receive the usual essential quantity of unadulterated milk, bread, and other indispensable nourishment, and all this is being done for no other purpose than for the benefit of the pirates of the country to be duly considered as nothing but virtually the outlaws of the United States, irrespective of their overflowing coffers with wealth and castlelike mansions.

The very fact that individuals have been able to accumulate and to boast of their immense and fabulous fortunes, amounting not only to millions, but to billions, of dollars, shows that the existing laws for the protection of the welfare of the Nation at large are inadequate. The Nation is now taking the necessary preparatory steps to crush the Kaiser and kaiserism for the protection of this great democratic Republic, as well as all the other democratic Republics of America and of the rest of the world, but no effective preparations are being made to crush at once the piratical speculators and gamblers in foodstuff, fuel, and kerosene oil. These pirates virtually exact and levy taxation on the people without representation, and this is the reason that their coffers are so overflowing with wealth, while the rest of the people at such a time as this are compelled to deprive themselves of the very essentials in the maintenance of life itself, therefore, these pirates are not only robbers, but virtually murderers of the Nation itself.

After long suffering, the Russian people have rid themselves, by a revolution, of the Czar and czarism, and this episode seemingly had some effect upon the notorious, infamous military autocrat, so that, through his henchman—that is, his chancellor—he is attempting to fool the people by sweet but empty promises. Tactics of this kind, however, are as old as the hills, and it is only a question of time when the people must and will revolt with terrific effect.

There is a well-established saying that history repeats itself, and, therefore, kindly let me ask of you, as a Representative of the people and as a Member of the United States Congress, not to trifle and not to overestimate the leniency and patience of the American people. When the pressure fills the cup, the overflow will overthrow all those legislators whose woeful lack of active energy toward the enactment of a protective law against speculation and gambling in foodstuff, fuel, and kerosene oil would naturally enable those piratical kings of speculators and gamblers in foodstuff, fuel, and kerosene oil to continue their heretofore plunder and robbery of the people of the country.

You will serve the country in justice to yourself and to your constituents by being instrumental in seeing that a law be immediately passed that would punish speculators and gamblers in foodstuff, fuel, and kerosene oil just the same as burglars are being punished. This law is to be specific, declaring this crime a felony, and punishable by 25 years' imprisonment, no penalty being acceptable, no pardons to be granted, no delays in the prosecution of suits under this law to be tolerated. Just as no sane person will for a moment consider himself offended when entering into a bank or other office he is confronted by a safe, or when purchasing drafts, checks, etc., in a bank he is handed a paper with stenciled or other printed safeguards against embezzlement, so no one will consider himself insulted if on the statute books of the United States there will appear the proposed law that will surely crush forever even a possibility for the existence of such devilishly disposed people as the present kings of speculators and gamblers in foodstuff, fuel, and kerosene oil.

It requires no arguments to show that with such a law on the statute books the President of the United States, or his representative, the prospective food-supply administrator of the United States, will have no trouble whatsoever to administer his high office in this respect. It will further require no arguments to show that a law of this kind is just as essential in fighting the domestic infamous piratical speculators and gamblers in foodstuff, fuel, and kerosene oil as it is essential to have proper Navy and Army forces to crush the Kaiser and kaiserism. The domestic enemy—that is, the kings of manipulators, speculators, and gamblers of foodstuff, fuel, and kerosene oil—have prospered in this country for too long a time so far, but the prevailing appalling conditions resulting from their prosperity, by their so-called organizations "within the law," make it imperative that they be crushed by a new law to be enacted immediately. No farmer will for a moment undertake to raise successfully a crop of vegetables unless he scrupulously removes the weeds, and so no nation can care for the prosperity of the multitude at large without a law that would crush at once effectively the weeds in the case—that is, the kings of speculators and gamblers in foodstuff, fuel, and kerosene oil.

The enactment of the aforesaid antispeculation law in foodstuffs, fuel, and kerosene oil will necessarily manifestly also simplify the terms of any bill for the control of foodstuffs, fuel, etc., and there will be no necessity to bestow upon any man autocratic powers and also to limit the selection of such a man to one capable of rendering his services without compensation. There are a large number of able honest men in the country, and the country has enough money to pay for whatever services are rendered to it. Charitable services are not always desirable.

Nothing is so essential and so effective as publicity, and I believe that it will be worth your while to carefully consider whether or not another law should be enacted as a war measure which will prove beneficial for all time to come; that is, that a requisite appropriation be made at once to carry such a law into effect, and that the Secretary of Agriculture be directed that weekly statements covering the cost of production of foodstuffs, fuel, and kerosene oil, and the cost of their distribution, are to be furnished to the Associated Press, so that the readers of the newspapers may demand their publication at no cost to the Government. The consequent effect of the operation of such a law would be a twofold one. Every economic housewife and others will be posted on the intrinsic value of the commodities of the day which she is going to purchase intelligently, thus being able to decline to pay unnecessarily exorbitant prices on the one hand, and on the other it will give an opportunity to those inclined to look around and to search for similar business ventures to ascertain the margin of profits, and thus create healthy competition for the benefit of the public at large. At the present time information of this kind is not known to the public at large.

The President justly advocated and insisted upon the passage of the universal conscription law, therefore you as a Member of the legislative body of the United States ought to see that in the quickest manner possible the piratical kings of speculators and gamblers in foodstuffs, fuel, and kerosene oil shall likewise be required, by a so-to-speak conscription law, to quit their old-time virtual robbery of the people by hook and crook "within the law."

The science and art of medicine has advanced to such an extent that physicians of to-day rely not so much on the curative medicine as they do on the preventive measures; in other words, they have awakened to the truth of the saying, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." Therefore, may it not be expected that the Members of both Houses of Congress should likewise recognize this truth and at once go to work and pass laws of a preventive nature, declaring speculation and gambling in foodstuffs, fuel, and kerosene oil a felony punishable by 25 years' imprisonment, as aforesaid. The moment a law of this kind is enacted and is operative all the foodstuff speculators and gamblers will vanish as by a miracle, provided the law will leave no loophole by way of which they could rid themselves of the punishment prescribed by the law, and as a consequence the speculating in foodstuffs, etc., as well as its storing and hoarding will disappear, together with the artificial enhanced creation of demand that apparently justifies the present riotous exorbitant cost of living.

According to the Constitution of the United States, it is the duty of the President of the United States from time to time to report to the Members of both Houses of Congress regarding the condition of the welfare of the Nation, with such recommendations for action that may be deemed necessary by him. This provision, of course, does not deprive in any way whatsoever both Houses of Congress from initiating laws and regulations for the welfare of the Nation and to have such laws promulgated according to law.

Just as well, it is quite in order, if I follow the spirit of the Constitution, that it is the duty of each United States citizen to have the welfare of the Nation at his heart, for the simple reason that as a particle of the Nation, so to speak, it is not only his high privilege but it is virtually his duty as such a citizen, from time to time, to communicate with the Members of both House of Congress, and to call their kind and just attention to the actual state of affairs in the country, especially in such a crisis as the one we are now not only facing but living through; and, therefore, may I ask of you the favor, in behalf of the citizens of the United States, to look upon this my letter as inspired by the spirit of 1776 and true democracy, and that you treat it accordingly for the benefit, not only of the democracy of the United States but of the democracy of the entire world, because nothing would please the notorious, infamous military autocrat as much as to see a food or other riot or revolution in the United States, because this is just part of his game, according to his activity in other countries.

Instead of making use of the country's press I thought it best to have a heart-to-heart talk with every Member of the Senate and of the House on this most important subject. I for one fail to find an adequate word to express the degree of this importance. Historic facts prove that food riots at times spread to such an extent that the conflagration grows beyond control. When one uses the press agitation naturally follows, and it is not prudent to allow such an agitation at a time such as the present.

An early acknowledgment of this letter, together with an expression of your sentiments regarding the so necessary and suggested enactment of the new law in question, will be highly appreciated.

Awaiting your favor, I remain,

Yours, very truly, H. M. B. BART.

"Hymn of America's Sons."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK L. GREENE,

OF VERMONT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, June 18, 1917.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following poem, entitled "Hymn of America's Sons," written by Mr. John L. Southwick, editor of the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press, for Consecration Day, June 5, 1917, or the day appointed for registration under the selective-draft law for the raising of the citizen war army:

"HYMN OF AMERICA'S SONS."

Sons ten million strong are we
Of the New World's land and sea,
Soil our fathers fought to save
For the free, the true, the brave.

Mothers, wives, our country's pride,
From the vale, the mountain side,
Gave their prayers, their deeds, their tears,
Sacrifice for future years.

Sister, daughter, lover, child,
War's alarms and savage wild
Chilled to terror in the wake
Of long strife for Freedom's sake.

Independence, Union won;
Rio Grande, setting sun;
Boundaries, free Cuba's spires,
Mark the altars of our sires.

Ours the hard-earned heritage,
Centuries have given our age;
Liberty, self-rule, free thought,
Priceless boons brave blood has bought.

Hark! from Europe voices ring,
Prussian "kultur," kaiser, king,
Continents have set on fire,
Burning paths to world empire.

Church, cathedral, home, and art
Stand not from black fields apart;
"Kultur" knows not sex or age,
Spreads all on one bloody page.

Mothers, children, cast afloat,
Victims of the fiend U-boat,
Cry to us from out the deep
Ere they sink in final sleep.

Human rights now to us call
Lest democracy shall fall
A barbaric despot's prey,
To world tyrant rule give sway.

We'll respond to freedom's plight,
Lead Columbia's sons aright.
Stand for "world democracy,"
Battle for humanity.

We will keep Old Glory bright,
Emblem of eternal right.
God of ages, guard our land,
Put we guidance in Thy hand.

L'Envoi.

Consecrate we life and steel,
Dedicate to human weal.
Duty shouts, "Across the sea!"
Speed the chorus, "Here are we."

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. B. WALTON

OF NEW MEXICO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 21, 1917.

Mr. WALTON. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the bill now pending. In fact, I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, next to the declaration of war with Germany, it is the most important and vitally necessary piece of legislation that has been presented to this Congress at the present session. Radical as its provisions may appear to Americans unaccustomed to laws of this sort, nothing has been more clearly demonstrated than that such legislation as this is absolutely demanded if we are to triumph in the war.

If the times were normal, Mr. Speaker, there might be force to the arguments advanced by the opponents of this bill. But the times are abnormal. Unusual and extreme measures are just as essential to protect the Nation from hunger and famine as to protect it from the direct agencies of war. The food speculator and the food waster constitute just as serious a menace to the safety of American citizens as the armed attacks of our enemy. Both call for emergency legislation—for prompt, vigorous, and patriotic action by this Congress.

Some time ago, Mr. Speaker, when the resolution recognizing the existence of a state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government was under discussion by this House, I endeavored to make clear the position of the people of New Mexico regarding the general subject of war, stating that while they abhor war, they hate dishonor more, and predicting that when the call to arms should come there would be no readier or more effective response from any section of the country than from the State which I here have the honor to represent. Already that prediction has been more than verified. On the fateful day of registration under the selective-draft law, the day that marked an epoch in the history of this country, when the old order changed and the manhood of the Nation was called to enroll for the upholding of American traditions and American honor, New Mexico's voice rang clear and strong. The full quota of her contribution was registered. No riots or conspiracies to defeat the law marred the day within her borders. No slackers skulked away to shirk the burdens and responsibilities of citizenship. Her young men wore proudly the badge of their patriotism as they placed their names on the honor roll. The record of New Mexico on this 5th day of June is one of which her people have every right to feel forever proud.

New Mexico was not less generous with her money than with her men. When the call came for funds with which to wage the war for democracy no lazy dollars remained hidden in chimney corners. A golden stream poured out to bear the State's part in financing the greatest conflict in all history. Bankers, merchants, shopkeepers, clerks, laborers—all classes of her thrifty citizenship dug deep into their savings and gave according to their respective means, and one pathetic incident has been related to me of a life prisoner in the State penitentiary who invested $800, the savings of four years of penal servitude, in liberty bonds.

There are no slackers in New Mexico. No slackers in fighting men, no slackers in moneyed men, and there will be no slackers among those who are to furnish the food. At this time the people of New Mexico are as well organized for the mobilization of the food resources of the State as any in the Union. Immediately upon the appeal of the President for the conservation of food supplies and the stimulation of food production the people there began to put their forces in motion to respond. Men and women in every walk of life, without flurry or excitement, without the blare of trumpets or the flaunting of banners, set to work to "do their bit" and to see to it that New Mexico should do her full part—should contribute her full share.

How well their work has been done may be gathered from a few figures that I ask your indulgence to give you. New Mexico has not been able in the past to take the high rank as an agricultural State which her wonderful resources merit. This has been due to several causes, which time will not permit me to discuss at present. Government parsimony is one. But she is now going forward in strides of agricultural development that will one day cause the Nation to rub its eyes and wonder that such things can be done. Her people are now going ahead on their own initiative and responsibility and are reclaiming the waste places and making them to blossom as the rose.

When I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that in the present year the State of New Mexico, stirred by the impulse of patriotism, will increase her agricultural acreage more than 25 per cent, some idea may be gained of what I mean. Last year New Mexico produced, in round numbers, 22,500,000 pounds of beans. This year she will more than double that production. And, by the way, the New Mexico bean is an article of diet that is just now beginning to come into its own. New Mexico will raise 15 per cent more wheat this year than last, 20 per cent more oats, 25 per cent more barley, and 40 per cent more alfalfa—all of them in the fullest sense of the term war crops. The State is going in for farming more enthusiastically and more intelligently than ever before in her history. Her agricultural college, one of the best in the United States, is doing a wonderful work through the county agriculturists and through extension methods of the most improved sort, and better farmers and better farming are found on every hand than have ever been known before.

Mr. Speaker, the men and women who are doing this work demand the passage of this bill. Speaking for my own constituency, I say to you that the people are asking that the business of producing and conserving food be placed on a sound economic basis. They ask that steps be taken at once to reduce the cost of living, and keep it reduced, to the point where the wage earner of moderate means may at least be enabled to exist according to American standards. They are unwilling to see the patriotic work of their hands and brains nullified by the continuance of a slipshod and unscientific method of food distribution, to say nothing of the selfish and unpatriotic manipulation of prices by food speculators. They are not afraid that the powers granted to the President of the United States by this bill will be abused. The prospect of a food "dictatorship" strikes no terror to their hearts, nor do they anticipate a paralysis of business when this bill shall become law. They know that this legislation is necessary at this time—necessary for the protection and welfare of the people at home as well as for the success of the soldiers who will soon be fighting our battles in the trenches in France—and if we will heed their voice and do the will of the people who sent us here we will speedily enact this bill into law.

The Federal Reserve Banking Amendments.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD WAYNE PARKER,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 15, 1917.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the Federal reserve banking law of 1914 made tremendous changes in our national banking system, and the new system has not yet been tested by hard times.

It shattered our tried system of independent banks and established a mighty engine for good or ill. Twelve Federal reserve banks are financed by enforced stock subscriptions by the national banks, of 6 per cent of their $1,700,000,000 capital and surplus, and 5 to 12 per cent of their deposits of $7,000,000,000, amounting to from $500,000,000 to $800,000,000 in all. Of this sum 65 per cent can be used by the Federal reserve banks, who can also issue United States notes to the member banks in payment for commercial paper, and the banks can use 60 per cent of these notes in their business.

National banks were authorized to lend on land, stock, and farm produce, do savings bank business, and accept time deposits against which the reserve is almost nominal. The Federal reserve directors are elected by the banks according to their number, and not their capital. The question then and now was, to what extent and how wisely this asset currency would be issued and called in? There is no automatic check on the issue of the new greenbacks called Federal reserve notes, such as was contained in the Vreeland Act. Under this new system the country must trust to the good sense of the directors of the Federal reserve banks and to the control of the Federal Reserve Board, watching lest we go wrong, and waiting for experience to teach us. On January 25, 1914, I published my views as to the new system in more detail in the Newark Sunday Call, as follows:

The tariff act was expected. The new banking and currency law is a bolt from the blue. It shatters our tried system of independent banks and establishes a new and mighty engine for good or ill.

Eight or twelve enormous reserve banks are to be financed by enforced contributions from the present banks, and will be managed by directors that may be chosen by a small fraction of the capital involved. The final control is in a central Federal Reserve Board who will be appointed by the President. The reserve banks will have large capital and deposits in cash. But if cash run short, new greenbacks can be issued for their use.

To be a little more particular, 8 to 12 banking districts are to be formed, and all national banks must become members of the Federal reserve bank of the district or go out of business. Each national bank must invest 6 per cent of its capital and surplus in the purchase of stock in the reserve bank. The capital of the national banks, by the printed report of the Comptroller of the Currency in 1912, was a little over a thousand millions and their surplus over seven hundred millions; so that the stock subscriptions by the national banks alone will be over one hundred millions, without counting stock taken by other banks that may come in. After three years between 5 and 7 per cent of all bank deposits must be deposited by the member banks in the reserve bank, and 3 to 5 per cent more will be put there at low interest or lie idle in their own vaults.

The national bank deposits in 1912 were about seven thousand millions, of which $400,000,000 must thus by law be deposited in the reserve banks and three hundred millions more are likely to be so deposited. The reserve banks can use all these deposits except 35 per cent (less than two hundred and fifty millions), and are thus put in absolute control of $550,000,000 coming from the national banks alone.

The reserve banks can do a regular banking business. They can also take up the discounts of such banks as they may please out of this money, or if that money is insufficient, they can, with the leave of a central board, issue unlimited United States notes (greenbacks) for that purpose, of which all but 40 per cent can be paid out by the banks who receive them.

The issue of these United States notes is not expected to be kept for times of emergency, but to be an ordinary thing whenever money is wanted for discount of commercial paper. These notes are expected to be retired as fast as that paper is paid. If it is not paid, but extended, the new greenback will stay in circulation, and expand the currency.

National banks are given wider liberty. They may hereafter lend part of their capital on land. They may lend on live stock and agricultural products. They may do a savings bank business, and accept deposits payable only after a notice of over 30 days, in which case they need keep only a nominal reserve of 5 per cent, of which about 2 per cent will be in their vaults and 3 per cent with the reserve bank. Perhaps speculative banks may find it profitable to make their deposits in form subject to notice, while really they will be expected to pay on demand. In practice no savings bank dares to enforce the rule as to notice.

The great question is that of who will run the reserve banks and how they will be managed. It is beyond question that with conservative management they will be a great power for good, and their capital and deposits can be used in any part of the whole country where there is a temporary stringency; but the reserve banks, like other banks, will have to make money and pay dividends.

It will not be for the good of the country if they should try to make money out of the issue of greenbacks and find themselves in the possession of a lot of promissory notes that can not be collected while the country is flooded with paper money for which those promissory notes are the only security. It will not be for good if credits be extended so that on a call for payments to cancel the new greenbacks there will go up a cry that the stock of money is being diminished so that debts can not be paid.

It is the history of all elastic currency that it makes money tight to call it in. It was notably so with colonial bills of credit issued on mortgage security and canceled when the mortgages were paid. It will be so with this new asset currency unless the new greenbacks are only issued to cover a temporary tightness of money and recalled whenever that is past.

This would probably be done if financial leaders are to control such issue, as they do in all other countries. But the new law is careful to prevent this. The election of directors of the reserve banks is not put in the hands of their stockholders in proportion to their stock, so that the member banks should vote according to the amount of their stock and deposits, in which case they might be expected to be careful of their own funds as well as of the credit of the country.

Instead of doing this, the new law orders that one-third of the directors shall be appointed by the political administration that is in power, and the other two-thirds are to be elected by the member banks—not according to their stock in the reserve bank, but by allowing each bank a single vote.

In 1912 (by the same report of the comptroller, on page 194) there were 7,397 United States national banks, of which 2,591 had a capital of $858,641,315 and 4,796 had a capital of only $187,871,265, these last being banks whose capital was $100,000 or less.

It is probable, therefore, that in each district member banks holding less than one-fifth of the stock and deposits of the reserve banks will be able, if they so choose, to cast an overwhelming vote in the election of directors of the reserve bank, and that they could, if they pleased, deprive the great majority in interest of all power.

It is a fair question whether it is safe to make it possible for a majority representing a small interest to use the funds of those holding a large interest as well as to control the issue of new greenbacks. If that majority at any time should find that they have made loans that can not be called, the temptation to use the enormous capital and powers of the reserve banks for their own relief will certainly be great.

The country's credit has often depended on the wisdom of the wealthy banks whose capital is at risk. They have in times past come to the relief of their weaker brethren. This law gives the weaker brethren the right to take control of the strong if they see fit.

National banks by the law must come into this scheme or they cease to be national banks, and will be forced to sell their 2 per cent United States bonds at perhaps a loss of one-third.

It is a leap in the dark. The banks and the country are meeting the issue bravely, with "hopes and fears that kindle hope, an undistinguishable throng." They hope that the flood gates of fiat money will and can be kept in wise control, so as to maintain the equal level of our currency. They hope that wise and conservative men will always be on the central board, and that the same class will be elected to the directorate of the reserve banks. They hope that the reduction of reserves and the introduction of an asset currency that is not limited by law will not foster rash ventures and inflated business. Many would like some scheme to make sure that the new issues of United States notes would automatically be returned and redeemed, promptly, such as a high rate of interest on such notes. All that we can do is to try the law, watching the working of the new machinery, and ready to add safeguards where we may, or to meet disaster bravely if this scheme meet the fate of other fiat currencies that have been issued on commercial values. Automatic safeguards are wanting. We must trust the good sense of the Federal Reserve Board, of the directors of the reserve banks, and in the last resort of the people after the scheme has been tried thoroughly.

This paper does not go into the details of the law. It is intended only as a brief statement of its general principles as well as of the money and other powers that it creates, of the methods by which persons will be selected to wield those powers, and of the dangers incident to such a scheme.

Until this present session the amendments in the law have not been very important. On August 15, 1914, a larger proportion of the reserves of member banks was ordered to be carried in the Federal reserve banks. In the act of March 3, 1915, the limit upon transactions based upon importation and exportation, which had been 50 per cent of the assets, was enlarged so that the Federal Reserve Board might increase this limit to 100 per cent of the bank's assets. By the act of September 7, 1916, the Federal Reserve Board might allow all reserves to be deposited in the Federal reserve bank. Banks were allowed to act as insurance agents and real-estate agents and to accept foreign drafts and bills of exchange, to open accounts with foreign correspondents, and to loan money on improved city real estate, as well as on farm lands; and the power to establish branch banks was revised and enlarged.

Under this system the control of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks over the member banks is very great, and bank officers have been chary of criticism or comment upon the working of the general system. The experience of some bank officials who have come in conflict with central powers have perhaps not been favorable to such discussion. Financial journals have been more outspoken, and there was comment during many months upon a seeming endeavor of the Federal Reserve Board to draw the gold of the country into the hands of the Federal reserve agents although there was no apparent object or financial benefit to anyone in such policy. The method by which this result was obtained was somewhat curious.

The act provides that Federal reserve notes shall be issued to member banks in exchange for commercial paper and for no other purpose. These notes could then be issued by the bank and put out into circulation, and when the bank deposited an amount of gold equal to these notes with its Federal reserve agent on special deposit for the purpose of paying these notes, the Federal Reserve Board would return to the member bank its commercial paper, and the bank thereupon, of course, would not have to hold any further reserve against the Federal reserve notes because their payment had been provided for by this deposit. All this was strictly in accordance with the law.

The complaint made in the financial journals was that in practice the reserve agent did not redeem the Federal reserve notes, but held the gold, leaving the notes in circulation, while the same commercial paper or renewals was again used to obtain Federal reserve notes, and so on, and this practice seemed to have been repeated so many times that the amount of commercial paper held by the Federal reserve bank was only a very small fraction of the amount of Federal reserve notes which had been issued and the amount of gold which was held by the Federal reserve agent in special deposit for the payment of these notes.

In other words, the amount of United States notes or greenbacks in circulation and the amount of gold supposed to be in the hands of the Federal reserve agent were growing out of all proportion to the commercial paper for which alone these Government notes were supposed to be temporarily issued.

The result seems to be that the Federal reserve note, the new greenback, was being converted into a permanent currency instead of being issued temporarily to meet temporary commercial needs. This subject created a discussion in which members of the Federal Reserve Board insisted that it was a good thing that the gold should be deposited where it could be located, although they admitted that it was upon special deposit so that it could not be used except to pay the Federal reserve notes.

I dwell upon this discussion because under section 7 of the new act of 1917, a Senate amendment just reported from the conference committee and about to be adopted, these special deposits of gold may be turned over or credited to the reserve banks, who are likewise authorized to issue Federal reserve notes for gold, of which they need hold only 40 per cent in reserve and may use 60 per cent in banking operations. Opponents of this conference report insist that this power would enable the Federal reserve banks to acquire all the gold in the United States Treasury by the issue of their notes and to use the major part of that gold in loans, thus enlarging and expanding credits to the danger of the business of this country, while those who favor this enlargement of the credit powers of the Federal reserve bank justify it as a war measure and to assist the country during the present stress, all admit and insist that most careful limitation of this power should be made by the Federal Reserve Board, if not also by further statutes.

This section was not in the House bill; it was a Senate amendment, adopted by the conferees, and it is so certain that this provision would be adopted if the bill went back to conference that I have concluded to vote for the conference report. I am of opinion that this act should be soon amended so that some automatic check should be placed upon the issue of Federal reserve notes by requiring the payment of interest thereon with increased rates according to the amount of notes issued, the time they remain out, or otherwise.

The new act proposed by the conference report also includes quite a number of subsidiary matters:

First. Management of branch banks.

Second. Providing for assistant Federal reserve agents.

Third. Encouraging the admission to membership of State banks, and exempting all member banks from the United States penalties for usurious interest, as well as from the penalties for lending too much money to any one person, lending on their own stock or falsely certified checks, prescribed in Revised Statutes 5198, 5200, 5201, and 5208.

State banks are exempted from national-bank examinations if they make three reports a year, but must submit to any examination ordered by the Federal Reserve Board or the Federal reserve bank, and may get out of the system by surrendering their stock and paying its indebtedness.

Fourth. Allowing nonmember bank to clear in the Federal reserve banks.

The Hardwick amendment to this section provided that banks might charge up to one-tenth of 1 per cent for collecting checks. One merit of this Federal Reserve System was in uniting the banking system of the country so that no such charge should be made. The amendment made in conference giving the control of the reasonableness of such charge to the Federal Reserve Board has made the section practical so that it could be accepted.

Fifth. Allowing shipping business on six months' time up to 100 per cent of assets under permission of the Federal Reserve Board.

Sixth. Allowing the foreign agents of banks, by permission of the Federal Reserve Board, to be the agents of other banks.

Seventh. Federal reserve notes may be secured by gold or gold certificates as well as commercial paper, and gold in the hands of the Federal reserve agent shall be counted as part of the gold reserve which the bank must maintain. Assets in the hands of the Federal reserve agent may be held by him and the Federal reserve bank or by the Federal Reserve Board or by the United States Treasury. The changes made in this section are shown in detail in the reprint in Senator OWEN'S report upon Senate bill No. 1796, dated April 17, 1917. And in support of them the report, pages 12 and 13, makes the following observations:

This very important provision is intended to permit the Federal reserve banks to exchange Federal reserve notes in lieu of gold, and in this way drift into the banks the idle gold which citizens now carry in their pockets with indifference and without national use.

It is estimated that under this item probably two or three hundred millions of gold will be acquired by the Federal reserve banks, and the reserve-bank system will be strengthened to this extent.

While this gold occupies the position of trust gold in the same manner that the gold held for the payment of gold certificates does, the effect of the proposed amendment is to permit the Federal reserve banks, if the occasion should ever rise, to issue to the limited extent that it has received gold in lieu of Federal reserve notes—to that extent, and to that extent only—Federal reserve notes against 100 per cent of qualified commercial bills of short maturities underwritten by member banks as required by statute.

At present the reserve bank must have against its loan of Federal reserve notes 100 per cent of qualified commercial bills indorsed by member banks, plus 40 per cent gold, but under the proposed amendment, if a bank should have a million dollars of gold deposited against a million dollars of outstanding Federal reserve notes, such bank would be permitted to issue a million dollars of reserve notes against a million dollars of qualified commercial bills of short maturities indorsed by member banks. This is in effect the German system, which permits the Imperial Bank of Germany to issue legal-tender notes against commercial bills of a qualified class at par subject to an interest charge to the Government.

It has been urged that giving this additional power to the banks would mean inflation. It does not mean inflation, because the reserve system is adequately protected against inflation by the control of the Federal Reserve Board, by the right to charge interest on the reserve notes, by the entire power being in the hands of the National Government to prevent anything of the kind.

It does give a larger power of credits for our commerce if our national interest should require it, and this power could only be exercised with the approval of the National Government.

It gives additional power to the National Government, and such issues of Federal reserve notes to a Federal reserve bank is safeguarded up to 100 per cent of such notes by the following line of credits:

First. The short-time credit of the individual borrower engaged in commercial business against an actual commercial transaction, the borrower's credit being regarded as perfectly good by a local member bank to the point that the bank is willing to indorse his paper and to advance him money on it on the bank's own account.

Second. This issue is secured by the indorsement of a member bank on a short-time maturing commercial bill.

Third. It is secured by the reserve of such member bank in the Federal reserve bank.

Fourth. It is secured by the stock held in the Federal reserve bank by the member bank indorsing the paper.

Fifth. It is secured also by the double liability of the stockholders of the member bank which has indorsed the paper used as a basis of issue.

Sixth. It is further secured by all of the assets of the Federal reserve bank and the double liability of stockholders of every one of the member banks.

Seventh. Finally, it is secured by the taxing power of the people of the United States.

There is no danger whatever in such credits. To call it inflation is not argument; it is abuse and is a slur entirely unjustified by the facts.

In Europe the most strenuous efforts are made by the various Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Austria, and Russia to concentrate in the Government banks every ounce of gold available, as gold is the final basis of credit throughout the world. The United States has made no adequate effort to do this, and there are several hundred millions which could be concentrated in these banks under this system if adopted.

This is an emergency matter which the exigencies of war require, should not be overlooked or slighted, and must not be misunderstood. The several smaller amendments are inserted to provide and recognize the fact that when a reserve note is covered by gold up to 100 per cent no further security is needed for the reserve note outstanding.

I certainly do not agree with this reasoning, except so far as these temporary powers are justified by the necessity of the war.

Eighth. Allows the Secretary of the Treasury to receive gold from Federal Reserve Board or Federal reserve agents, which may be counted as reserve.

Ninth. Reduces the reserve held against demand deposits from 12 per cent to 7 per cent in the case of an ordinary bank, from 15 per cent to 10 per cent for banks in reserve cities, and from 18 per cent to 13 per cent for banks in central reserve cities, while the reserve for time deposits is reduced in all banks from 5 per cent to 3 per cent.

Tenth. Allows directors, officers, and so forth, to take interest on deposits and to have their notes discounted by a majority of the directors.

I have thought it a duty to explain the provisions of this bill as well as I can, and perhaps the more willingly because I am not a banker, and therefore may perhaps indicate the general character of this legislation and explain it in some degree to those whom, like myself, do not claim to be financial experts.

This particular act now reported is simply an outgrowth of the tendency contained in the original Federal reserve banking law, which was intended to destroy the old national banking system and substitute a currency of United States notes, based upon commercial paper and other assets of that sort, and to put all the banks of the country in almost absolute control of a board appointed by the President.

I am not satisfied that these changes are for the public benefit. I am a member of a minority. The conference report is more conservative than the Senate bill, and I vote for it as the best that can be obtained.

An Address to the Congress of the United States, by Hannis Taylor.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. MASON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 20, 1917.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, in my extension of remarks to-day I desire to correct the statement as to Mr. Hannis Taylor, whom I said was a New York lawyer. Mr. Taylor resides in Washington. He is the author of the leading American textbook on the origin and growth of the English Constitution, which is an accepted authority and has been indorsed by the jurists of this country, including Thomas M. Cooley, author of Constitutional Limitations. Mr. Taylor is also the author of The Origin and Growth of the American Constitution, which is also regarded as a leading authority upon that subject. By reason of this work Mr. Taylor has been given the honorary degree of LL. D. by the Universities of Edinburgh and Dublin.

I insert his address to Congress under the permission given by unanimous consent, as follows:

AN ADDRESS TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES INVOLVING A GRAVE QUESTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, WHICH DEEPLY CONCERNS NOT ONLY THE TREASURY AND PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES BUT ALSO OUR ALLIES IN THE PREEMINENTLY RIGHTEOUS WAR NOW IN PROGRESS AGAINST THE CENTRAL EMPIRES.

Gentlemen, at this critical juncture it is the patriotic duty of every American citizen to do all in his power to promote the success of the registration to take place on June 5, 1917, under the provisions of the wise and constitutional act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

Despite the fact that that act—whose avowed purpose is "to draft into the military service of the United States, organize, and officer" the "unorganized militia" of the United States—was passed under that provision of section 8, Article I, of the Constitution which declares that "the Congress shall have power * * * to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," certain ill-informed and ill-disposed persons are circulating the report that the National Militia when so organized for national defense is to be sent out of the country for service abroad, in defiance to the express mandate of the Constitution to the contrary. That report, to which the terms of the act in question give neither color nor countenance, is creating an alarm that will surely reduce the registration unless the erroneous impression is corrected in advance of it. On the other hand, such false impression is doing a great injustice to our allies, who are looking for military aid to a source from which it can not possibly come under our Constitution as it now stands.

Certainly every citizen of this country should know, first, that under our Constitution no American soldiers can be sent abroad, even by the authority of Congress, except those composing the "Regular Army"; second, that the ranks of the "Regular Army" can only be swelled "by voluntary enlistment." As I have devoted the best years of my life to the study of such questions I deem it my duty to restate, in a narrow compass and in an humble spirit, the basic constitutional principles underlying our system of military organization as those principles have been settled for at least 90 years.

ENGLISH MILITARY SYSTEM REPRODUCED BY THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787.

That convention did all in its power to incorporate into our Federal Constitution the English military system, which in 1787 consisted, first, of a regular or "nonconstitutional force," made up of a standing army and navy; second, of an emergency or "constitutional force" called the militia, a force for national defense that had existed for a thousand years. In the words of the Encyclopedia Britannia (9th ed.): "The militia of the United Kingdom consists of a number of officers and men maintained for the purpose of augmenting the military strength of the country in case of imminent national danger or great emergency. In such a contingency the whole or any part of the militia is liable, by proclamation of the sovereign, to be embodied—that is to say, placed in active service within the confines of the United Kingdom." The county military system, known as the militia, survived the Norman conquest unimpaired. (Stubbs, Select Charters, pp. 153–154.) By the great statute of Edward I, Edward III, chapter 5, it was provided that the militia should only be used at home for national defense, "as has been used in times past for the defense of the realm." In 1786, the year before the Federal Convention met, was passed the statute of 26 George III, chapter 107, section 95, concerning the militia, in which it was specially provided that "neither the whole or any part shall be ordered out of Great Britain. Mr. Dicey, one of the most eminent of modern English commentators, says: "The militia is the constitutional force existing under the law of the land for the defense of the country. * * * Embodiment indeed converts the militia for the time being into a regular army, though an army which can not be required to serve abroad." (The Law of the Constitution, pp. 287–288.)

REGULAR OR STANDING ARMIES IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

England never had a military force that could be sent abroad until William the Conqueror brought such a force with him in the feudal host of professional soldiers who accompanied him. It was the duty of that host, which simply supplemented the ancient constitutional force known as the militia, "to attend the King in war, within and without the realm, mounted and armed, during the regular term of service." But as that regular term of service only lasted for 40 days, it led to the device of shield money, which produced a fund with which the Crown could employ mercenary and professional soldiers who could be kept abroad so long as needed. Out of that purely voluntary system of paid military service was evolved the standing army of England as it existed at the date of the American Revolution; and upon the same general basis rested the standing and professional naval force of England at that time. In order to enable this Republic to maintain a standing army and navy like that of England, the convention of 1787, after giving to Congress the power "to declare war," provided that "the Congress shall have power * * * to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years; to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Those three provisions, grouped together as a connected whole, relate solely and exclusively to one subject matter—the creation, maintenance, and government of the regular Army and Navy of the United States, which has always been maintained "by voluntary enlistment."

THE NATIONAL MILITIA AS DEFINED BY CONGRESS AND THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

It is simply impossible to confuse "the Regular Army of the United States with that force called by the Supreme Court "the reserved military force or reserve militia of the United States." Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S., 252. In order to enable Congress to create such a force for national purposes it was provided that "the Congress shall have power * * * to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." Article II of the amendments provides: "A well-regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." These three closely interlinked clauses, all relating to a single subject matter, have been luminously expounded by the Supreme Court in United States v. Bevans (3 Wheat., 336); Houston v. Moore (5 Wheat., 1); Martin v. Mott (12 Wheat., 19); Luther v. Borden (7 How., 1); Dynes v. Hoover (20 How., 65); Crandall v. Nevada (6 Wall., 35); Texas v. White (7 Wall., 700); Presser v. Illinois (151 U. S., 162).

The term "militia," a technical term, a term of art with a history is used four times in the Constitution and always in the same sense. When in the trial of Burr it became necessary for Chief Justice Marshall to define the meaning of the term "levying war," as used in Article III, section 3, he said: "But the term is not for the first time applied to treason by the Constitution of the United States. It is a technical term. It is used in a very old statute of that country whose language is our language and whose laws form the substratum of our laws. It is scarcely conceivable that the term was not employed by the framers of our Constitution in the sense which had been affixed to it by those from whom we borrowed it." See to the same effect Rhode Island v. Massachusetts (12 Pet., 657), Income Tax cases (157 U. S., 429); United States v. Wong Kim Ark (169 U. S. 279). Therefore when the framers took from the English Constitution the technical term, the term of art—"militia"—they took it with its thousand years of history behind it, attesting the fact that it is a force for national defense that can never be "taken out of the realm" for service in a foreign country. In that sense the term "militia," four times repeated, was embodied in our Federal Constitution. And in order to put it forever beyond the power of Congress to impair the ancient constitutional exemption from service abroad the convention, employing the masterful pen of Gouverneur Morris, provided that the new government, with strictly limited powers, could only organize the national militia for three purposes—"to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." By those limitations all other uses were expressly excluded with all the force that language can impart. The moment the exemption of the militia from service abroad was thus embodied in the Constitution Congress was forever deprived of all power over the subject. It is hardly necessary to add here that the fact that the omnipotent Parliament of Great Britain, which changes her constitution every time it passes an act, can take away such an exemption from the militia in that country, has no relevancy whatever to conditions in our own.

In Presser v. Illinois (116 U. S., 252) the court went to the heart of the whole matter when, in defining "the reserved military force or reserve militia of the United States," it said: "It is undoubtedly true that all citizens capable of bearing arms constitute the reserved military force or reserve militia of the United States as well as of the States; and in view of this prerogative of the General Government, as well as of its general powers, the States can not, even laying the constitutional provision in question out of view, prohibit the people from keeping and bearings arms, so as to deprive the United States of their rightful resources for maintaining the public security and disabled the people from performing their duty to the General Government." Thus it has been settled by the Supreme Court that under the clause in question the "General Government" of the United States possesses, entirely apart from the States, "the reserved military force or reserve militia of the United States," consisting of "all citizens capable of bearing arms," whose right to bear arms can not be impaired by any law of any State.

The definition of the national militia given in Presser v. Illinois is closely followed in the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, whose section 57 reads as follows: "Composition of the militia: The militia of the United States shall consist of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States and all other able-bodied males who have or shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, who shall be more than 18 years of age and, except as hereinafter provided, not more than 45 years of age, and said militia shall be divided into three classes—the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and the unorganized militia."

The act of May 18, 1917, which is simply a supplement or extension of the act of June 3, 1916, amplifies in its section 2 the foregoing definition of the national militia in this form: "Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act. Quotas from the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who were in the military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since said date entered the military service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision, either as members of the Regular Army or the National Guard." The act of May 18, 1917, takes all possible pains to proclaim, first, that all soldiers drafted and organized under it are absolutely separate and distinct from "the Regular Army" of the United States; that they are in the strictest sense of the term national militia raised in an emergency for national defense.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO DRAFT OR CONSCRIPT THE NATIONAL MILITIA FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE.

When in the great case of Martin v. Mott (12 Wheat., 19) a unanimous court, speaking through Mr. Justice Story, was called upon to construe the act of 1795, which first organized the national militia for national defense, it was said: "For the more clear and exact consideration of the subject it may be necessary to refer to the Constitution of the United States, and some of the provisions of the act of 1795. The Constitution declares that Congress shall have power 'to provide for calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions'; and also 'to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States.' In pursuance of this authority the act of 1795 has provided 'that whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger, or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his order for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper.' And like provisions are made for the other cases stated in the Constitution." After giving in that way all possible emphasis to the fact that the national militia can never be used except for the specific purposes stated in the Constitution, the court said that "the power to provide for repelling invasions includes the power to provide against the attempt and danger of invasion as the necessary and proper means to effectuate that object. One of the best means to repel invasion is to provide the requisite force for action before the invader himself has reached the soil." When near the close of the War of 1812 the Secretary of War proposed to compel the service of the national militia by conscription, there was a strong protest from certain quarters upon the ground that such a procedure would be unconstitutional. See Dwight's History of the Hartford Convention, page 359. But when during the Civil War such a measure was again proposed it was acted on and the result accepted, without protest, as constitutional, as it undoubtedly was.

EXEMPTION OF NATIONAL MILITIA FROM SERVICE ABROAD ABSOLUTE AND INCONTESTABLE.

From what has now been said it clearly appears that the reserved force of the United States, four times described in the Constitution as the "militia," can be called forth and organized by Congress either upon the volunteer plan or by forcible conscription. But it is equally clear that when so called forth and organized the militia can only be used for one of the three purposes rigidly defined by the Constitution, to wit, "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." Its application to any other purpose—notably service abroad—would be too obviously unconstitutional to justify discussion. The exemption of the national militia to be drafted under the act in question from service abroad is self-evident and undebatable. If either the President or Congress, one or both, should attempt to ignore such constitutional exemption, any member of the militia threatened with transportation abroad could be immediately discharged from such service by any judge on habeas corpus. And more, any executive magistrate who might dare to ignore the constitutional exemption in question would be quickly admonished by the House of Representatives that it is ready with that "two-handed engine at the door that smites once and smites no more."

SHALL OUR HANDFUL IN FRANCE FROM THE "REGULAR ARMY" BE ABANDONED OR STRENGTHENED?

This is not the time for self-deception. We have no right to mislead either our allies or ourselves. The incontestable facts staring us in the face are these: First, that only the "Regular Army" can be sent abroad; second, that the "Regular Army" can be augmented only "by voluntary enlistment." The only possible chance of obtaining additional soldiers for service abroad under the draft act of May 18, 1917, is through that part of it which provides that "the President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize, and equip not to exceed four infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army: And provided further, That there shall be no enlistments in said force of men under 25 years of age at the time of enlisting: And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division."

With all possible respect I earnestly contend that the Congress should not commit that grave subject to the Executive. It is the constitutional function of Congress not only "to declare war" but to direct and control all of its graver operations. No part even of the "Regular Army" should ever be sent abroad except by its mandate. The Congress should assume the entire responsibility and determine whether the handful of Regular troops now on the way to France should be augmented or practically abandoned? That is the question of questions that should not be delayed for a moment longer. It involves no less than the moral dignity, the good faith of this Nation.

With profound respect, your humble servant,

HANNIS TAYLOR.

Transportation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. C. DYER,
OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 19, 1917.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I wish to include an article on transportation. The article I insert is by Mr. Wilson L. Rogers, of St. Louis, Mo. It is an able contribution to the importance of this great subject, transportation, which is one of the greatest problems of the present day.

Manufacturers of foodstuffs, fuel, cement, and other necessary articles of commerce claim that the high prices are in a great measure due to the improper facilities of transportation. The article is as follows:

TRANSPORTATION.

The great demand to-day is for efficiency in all private and corporate enterprises. It should be equally the prime demand of all public enterprise, especially in this day of great crisis when our Nation is called upon to put every resource and every power where it will do most to help preserve the system of democracy to the world, and insure to our own country adequate defense.

At one point in our economic system there is need, especially of efficiency at a time like this and that is in our transportation affairs. The national defense calls for the greatest facility in the transportation of men, munitions, and supplies. The prompt delivery of supplies is most important as a matter of national defense. It is most important, then, that our transportation means be put on the very highest basis of efficiency. And right here is where the matter of efficiency has been most neglected. No effort has been made to systematize our transportation facilities into one great unit.

Not only the present crisis demands systematizing of so important a factor in national life as transportation, but the normal growth of the country demands it. There is much more consumption of foodstuffs, clothing, etc., in proportion to the population than there was 50 years ago on account of the higher standards of living and the energy put into advertising, salesmanship, etc. There will be a great increase of the population of the country in the next 20 years and a greater increase in the consumption of her products. The production to meet this consumption must show its increase in the Middle West and in some parts of the Northwest, because not much increase of production is possible in the East or in the sections depending upon mineral resources. To meet this increased production there should be such developments in river traffic, railway traffic, and in good roads and auto-truck traffic that they will work together in one efficient and harmonious system. This can only be brought about by such Government regulation and control of transportation as will insure stability for the investments needed.

The time is ripe for Government action for two reasons: First, the need is immediate because the country needs the most efficient transportation possible in time of war. Such efficiency has been one of the greatest resources of the Prussian military power in the present war. Second, there is an awakening to the need among the people as there has never been before. Men are recognizing the need of the development of our river-transportation resources, of better system in railroad operations, etc., and they are beginning to get the vision of a unified transportation system that shall make the most efficient use of all our transportation facilities rather than better railways or better river transportation, independent of each other. The Republican Party in their national platform of 1916 said:

"Interstate and intrastate transportation have become so interwoven that the attempt to apply two and often several sets of laws to its regulation has produced conflicts of authority, embarrassment in operation, and inconvenience and expense to the public.

"The entire transportation system of the country has become essentially national. We therefore favor such action by legislation or, if necessary, through amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will place it under exclusive Federal control."

Former United States Senator Beveridge recently said:

"Our railways in their management and service are national. They are the highways of the Republic as a whole. The well-being of the entire American people depends upon the service they render, and the solvency of the railroads depends upon the common prosperity of the Nation. Yet American railways, unlike those of every other country, are under control of 48 local sovereignties, as well as that of the General Government. Hundreds of conflicting State regulations and an army of State officials complicate their operation.

"The plain remedy is to place the railways of the Nation under the exclusive control of the National Government.

"That is, the National Government should have exclusive supervision and regulation of railroads, and not the sovereign States.

"They are vital to the national defense. It is useless to train men unless they can be transported quickly and in immense numbers. In the confusion caused by our multiple and discordant control of railways we could not promptly transport so small an army as half a million men. Under national control American railways could be coordinated and systematized. This is only a logical step in the practical development of that nationalism required by the needs of the people."

If the foregoing be true of railways, it is more true of river transportation, and applies with still more logic to all our transportation methods as a unit.

It is perfectly just that all transportation means be treated as belonging to one system and under one Government head, because every mile of railroad, navigable water, or other means of transportation of freight and the necessities of life, however remotely located, becomes a part of the general system leading to all parts of the country. The expense of hauling over any mile contributes to the cost of some of the necessaries of life in the markets of the Nation. A 10-mile railway or the smallest branch stream used for carrying purposes, be it located in the mountains of Kentucky or Montana, or in other place more remote, may have a bearing on the cost of some commodity in Washington or New York, or in any other section in which any of the products of the territory reached by such railroad or stream may be used. So the cost of transportation on every mile of freight-hauling service of any kind is a matter of concern to the people at large.

The need is that every method available shall be used to the best advantage to make the transportation of the Nation's products cheapest and most efficient. Shall not some part of our governmental organization be working to the end that all unnecessary expense in our transportation be eliminated? Then, when the farmer or miner exchanges products with the manufacturer, each will get more, because not so much will be absorbed in hauling the farmer's or miner's produce one way and the manufacturer's the other.

There is another reason why the time is ripe for systematizing transportation. There is a general movement for reviving river traffic. Cities like St. Louis, New Orleans, Memphis, and Kansas City are providing better terminals, new transportation companies are being organized for trade on the Mississippi, and trade bodies from the cities along the river systems are getting together in the interest of river-traffic development. According to the report of the collector of customs of the city of St. Louis, there has been a steady increase in the number of vessels and the tonnage registered as making that port regularly during the past five years. In 1912 there were 121 steam vessels with a total tonnage of 18,033 tons, and in 1916 there were 336 steam vessels with a total tonnage of 28,790 tons registered. This growth is pitifully small, but would become epoch making if properly encouraged.

The lack of attention to this subject by the Government is shown by the fact that in books published by the Government on the organization, duties of officials, and functions of the various departments of the Government (the Congressional Directory, for instance), the subject of transportation is not even indexed. Mining, agriculture, etc., find their place, but not transportation. In a recently published book by Frederick J. Haskin, containing 386 pages on "The American Government," no mention is made of the general subject of transportation.

The Federal Government does touch transportation problems at points here and there, but not the transportation problem as a correlated whole. The War Department has its Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors which looks after navigation aids, regulates the size of rafts, protects channels from the encroachment of bridges that would obstruct navigation, etc., and the Army engineers look after military roads. The Post Office Department makes some regulations for post roads. The Department of the Interior, through the General Land Office Bureau of Railway Grants and through the Geological Survey in the Water Resources and Utilization Division, just touches some phases of transportation. The office of public roads of the Department of Agriculture studies systems of road building, details engineers to assist in local efforts in road building, etc. In the Department of Commerce and Labor the Bureau of Corporations has compiled the most comprehensive statistics on water transportation in all its phases.

The Bureau of Lighthouses, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Bureau of Navigation, of this department, touch some matters of transportation such as licenses, inspections, sailing charts, and other functions indicated by the bureau names. International commissions look after waterways on the boundaries. The Interstate Commerce Commission, besides regulating freight rates so that they may be as nearly just as possible under existing transportation conditions, has charge of many details such as locomotive-boiler inspection, safety appliances, hours of labor, transportation of explosives, etc. But there is no coordination in the Government activities along this line. Each activity is independent of all the others.

Not until there be one department of the Government devoted to the subject of transportation as a unit will there be any great progress in bringing our transportation developments up to the developments in manufacturing and other lines. And that department should have the cooperation of the States and localities to make its work thorough.

Former Secretary Richard A. Ballinger said in one of his official reports that the Department of the Interior ought to be consolidated with the Department of Agriculture. He thought the supervision of the Capitol Building and Grounds should be transferred to the Supervising Architect of the Treasury; that the Patent Office should go to the Department of Commerce and Labor and the Pension Office to the War Department. If it would be wise to scatter these "unrelated bureaus," as he called them, to the departments to which they are most closely related, would it not be equally wise to bring together under one head, so far as practicable, all the governmental activities that relate to the one important subject of transportation?

No consideration of these problems can to advantage disassociate water traffic from the different forms of traffic on land. Railroads are most useful when they may be best reached by wagon roads, and to the best advantage handle combined rail and water shipments. Water-shipping facilities to be most useful must be easily accessible for short hauls by rail and by wagon or auto trucks from the territory commercially tributary to their shore lines. The most useful wagon roads are those that connect producing territory with rail or waterway outlets. We are just entering upon a new era in the importance of good roads, because of the coming use of autotrucks as feeders for rail and water lines. The autotruck has already revolutionized city deliveries. It is quite probable that it will eventually put every farmer who lives within 50, or even 100 miles, of railway or navigable water "close to market." Gen. Harrison Gray Otis, in an editorial discussion of the proposed ocean to ocean highway, said:

"This unique highway when completed will be of value not alone to motorists. Settlers and farmers, merchants, traders, and freighters will also be immensely benefited, for statistics show that under our present system of roads it costs the American farmer 23 cents per ton to haul his goods 1 mile. In Europe, where the system of roads is much better because of steady improvements for centuries, it costs the farmer but 7 cents per ton to haul his goods 1 mile."

Besides the part that gasoline will play with the development of traffic on land, it is quite sure to bring about greater traffic on smaller streams through small gasoline-driven boats that will make these smaller streams feeders for the larger streams, as a kind Providence has provided that they might be.

Transportation should be treated as one great institution of the country just as the friction load of a factory is treated as a problem by itself. We as a people have no master mechanic to look after the smooth running of our transportation machinery. It is allowed to run haphazard. Not only in the waterway system has there been a "lack of uniformity" and a "lack of comprehensive plan," as reported by the Bureau of Corporations, but in the entire transportation system are these lacks especially manifest.

One of the most striking results of this lack of plan is the decline in the use of our inland waterways. That there is great economy in the use of water for transportation is generally admitted. In an address before the Royal Geographical Society in 1907, George J. Chisholm said:

"On an ordinary good wagon road one horsepower will transport 3,000 pounds 2 miles per hour; on a railway, 30,000 pounds per hour; by water, 200,000 pounds per hour.

A ton of coal can be shipped from Buffalo to Duluth by water for the cost of shoveling it from the sidewalk to the cellar. The Great Britain Board of Trade, in making a study of the cost of living in American cities in 1909, found that the laboring man paid for his coal in ton lots in several of these cities as follows: Pittsburgh, $3 to $3.47; Cleveland, $3.90 to $4.50; Duluth, $4.96; St. Paul and Minneapolis, $5.81. Thus it will be seen that the price increased for the overland haul from Pittsburgh to Cleveland and from Duluth to Minneapolis as much as it did for the water haul from Cleveland to Duluth, six to ten times as far. Would not the same business sense that prompts the use of the most improved and economically operated transmission machinery in a modern factory call for the fullest possible use of all available waterways for transportation purposes?

We are not using the natural means an all-wise Creator has laid at our feet to keep our transportation costs down. If we look at the map we will see that the United States is wonderfully favored by a kind providence in the matter of natural waterways reaching out, like arteries, into the great productive sections of the country.

The Great Lakes have 4,326 miles of shore line with the indentations, while over 290 navigable streams of the United States have a mileage of 26,400, in addition to which there have been built 4,500 miles of canals, of which about 2,000 miles are in operation. Of the rivers over one-half, or about 14,000 miles, are in one great, connected system, spreading out like the veins of a leaf through the great productive Mississippi Valley. These figures include only those streams that are practically navigable, besides which there are other thousands of miles of streams that might be made navigable were the need shown and sufficient guarantees of continued favorable conditions given by the Government to warrant the necessary investments. But under present conditions this traffic has been shrinking instead of improving. The proportion of the water traffic of the country on the different systems for the years 1889 and 1906, respectively, were as follows:

	Per cent.	Per cent.
Atlantic and Gulf coasts	40.6	52.9
Pacific coast	8.7	6.6
Great Lakes	19.5	28.5
Mississippi River system	22.6	10.5
All other rivers	8.6	1.5

In 1890 the shipments of flour by river to St. Louis were 18.8 per cent of the total shipments of flour to that port, and the receipts of flour nearly 5¼ per cent. In 1906 the shipments were only two-thirds of 1 per cent and the receipts less than one-half of 1 per cent. In other words, the river traffic in flour at the one port dropped from 611,779 barrels in 1890 to 29,160 barrels in 1906, while the rail traffic in flour for the same period increased from 3,498,520 barrels to 5,053,530 barrels. The Mississippi and its tributaries, reaching out into the grain States with over six times the shore line of the Lakes, carried in 1907 about one-tenth as much grain and very little flour. The same system handled about one-eighth as much lumber and less than two-thirds as much coal. The river systems reach the greatest grain, coal, lumber, cotton, and tobacco regions of the country. They can not become the factor in the development of these sections that nature so generously designed them to be without some permanence of Government policy that will be a guaranty of stability for the investments that will be necessary to make improvements.

Just now car shortages, terminal congestion, etc., are menacing the country and will seriously handicap the Government in military operations if not relieved, as well as add to the distress of the people. The National City Bank of New York in a recent financial letter says:

"Something must be done about the future, for the business of the country has outgrown transportation facilities. The recent congestion illustrates this. It can not be chargeable, as was the previous one, to shortage of ships, for ships were held under demurrage charges. The congestion was not primarily due to shortage of cars, but to lack of facilities for moving cars. Terminals must be improved and there must be vast outlays for other betterments."

From figures at hand we note that 53,000,000 tons of freight were moved eastward on the Great Lakes in 1907. It would have required a great investment in tracks and rolling stock on the part of the railroads had they been obliged to carry this vast amount in addition to their regular traffic all the way from Duluth and the other western ports to points near the Lake Erie ports to which most of it went. The Lake boats served as feeders for the roads connecting Lake Erie ports with the coal fields and steel mills in southeastern Ohio and western Pennsylvania. In a like manner, a great deal of car shortage could be prevented by the rivers carrying millions of tons of bulky freight from the West to the East and the North to the South.

It is one of the conditions of lake and ocean coastwise traffic that nearly all the boat lines are controlled by railway companies, while there is no such control on the rivers.

The Mississippi River system has its special fields to serve in the matter of providing cheap transportation as well as the Lakes. The great coal fields of Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Illinois; the cotton, tobacco, and sugar producing South; the lumber districts of the North and South; and the manufacturing districts of the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys and the great grain-producing area through which the system radiates should be able to look to these rivers as the factor in helping them to reach with the least expense the great markets toward which these rivers lead.

The greatest encouragement along this line comes from the coal movement, which constitutes over half of all the vessel traffic over all the Mississippi River system, though it is limited to downstream traffic from the Pittsburgh district to Ohio and Mississippi River points. Two sentences in the report of the Bureau of Corporations on "Waterborne traffic" cover the ground very completely, and should be burned into the minds of everyone who is interested in the development of our river traffic. They are as follows:

"It is sufficient to say now that rail competition is the most important factor in water traffic and that some cooperation between railways and waterways seems absolutely necessary to insure reasonable use of our rivers. It is a public evil that our entire transportation system should be, as now, at odds with itself, wasting its strength in destructive internal warfare while the transportation needs of the public suffer. * * * One of the most practical methods of improving waterways, and especially terminals, is to secure for them a fair amount of business, thus insuring their higher development by private interests."

These conclusions are the only logical ones that can be reached by anyone who gives extended study to matters of transportation with the general good in view.

In submitting a report on "water terminals" the Bureau of Corporations says:

"Probably the greatest single deterrent to water terminal advance is the present adverse attitude of all rail lines toward independent water traffic, in their exclusive control of frontage, in refusal or neglect to coordinate with general water traffic, and in refusal to prorate generally with water lines in through movement of traffic."

The tendency of the railways to oppose the use of the rivers may be natural and in the interest of the people back of railway stocks, but it is not in the interest of society. The best authorities agree that the cooperation of the railways with the waterways in the interest of society would not be a bad thing for the railways eventually. The railways are not equal to the movement of all freight at times, and should they try to keep up with the growth of the country must make greatly increased investments in new lines and increased terminal and rolling equipment. If the growth in traffic can be absorbed in a measure by increasing use of the waterways the railways can continue to have their volume of business with a growth from the feeding of the waterways without being required to make so much additional investment. The public has to pay eventually for all these unnecessary investments, but can not bring about any system or efficient plan in transportation development unless there be a head to our united transportation factors such as only can be provided by Federal control. Three years ago one of the St. Louis papers, under the heading "A traffic crisis," said editorially:

"Here in the United States we are confronted with an emergency of the first magnitude. Our railroads have well-nigh ceased extending. If you doubt it, get the annual statistics of railroad extension for the past 30 years. At present the railroads are frozen up. The reasons are not far to seek. The railways have been unable to secure the necessary capital to develop at the rate which is normal in view of the growth of the country. * * * Now, in this situation happy are the communities so situated as to be able to make up for the defects in rail transportation by the development of internal water routes, for water transportation can be developed to imposing proportions without any such initial investment as the building of a railroad requires."

But there must be a guarantee of stability of conditions, which only Federal control can give before capital will risk these internal water route developments.

The combined use of the rivers and railways in the handling of freight is not only theoretically economical but is in practical operation. The Illinois Central and Central of Georgia Railways, operating the Ocean Steamship Co. of Savannah, get into New York for freight traffic much more cheaply than they could by building railways and terminals to that city. Wheat and flour are being shipped by Missouri River from Kansas City to St. Louis, and thence via Chicago, Buffalo, and New York by rail and lake to Europe, or were being so shipped before the war. If these things can be done profitably, it seems clear we should be using our entire Mississippi River and other internal systems in the interest of cheaper transportation and relieving traffic congestion.

The necessity for cooperation between the various divisions of Government now working independently in transportation matters is well set forth by the following two paragraphs from reports of the Bureau of Corporations:

"The Government's enormous expenditures on channels are in many cases largely neutralized by the action or nonaction of the local authorities on terminals. There has been, indeed, some excellent local cooperation in channel work at Portland, Oreg., Seattle, Cleveland, and Buffalo, but the far greater need is for local cooperation in terminals. Localities should be required, as a rule, to furnish and keep open adequate terminals as a condition precedent to channel improvement by the Federal Government. It is their fair share of the work, and they alone can do it effectively."

"In the development of our waterway system, while undertaken in part by the State and later and more extensively by Federal power, there has been very little of that cooperation between central and local authorities that appears in the best of the European systems. The United States, the States, the counties, levee districts, and municipalities have all spent large sums of money on waterway improvement, but for the most part separately. There has been thus waste, lack of uniformity, lack of comprehensive plan, and especially a lack of any proportionate contribution from the localities peculiarly benefited."

There can be no comprehensive plan, uniformity, or proportionate distribution of costs or benefits without all transportation being brought under a unit system with a unit head. Not only is cooperation between the central government and localities necessary, but it will readily be seen that that coordination of all the activities for the protection and upbuilding of transportation, both by water and land, should replace the present spasmodic and disconnected efforts.

The establishing of a transportation department is necessary to conserve the appropriations for river improvement; to encourage the development of improved methods of handling freight so that the cost of transshipping between boats and railways and between small boats on smaller streams and bigger boats on the trunk rivers may be reduced to a nominal sum; to do away with the so-called "pork-barrel" legislation, and especially to provide general transportation efficiency in time of military need.

There is a movement on foot to change the entire system of handling freight by using unit containers, about 5 to 20 to a car, instead of the old system of bags, barrels, etc., in cars. Great advances have been made in almost every field of endeavor, but there has been no change in the method of handling freight since the advent of the railway, enlarging cars being the only change noticeable. Such changes are hard to work into a system that has "no comprehensive plan," but efficiency in transportation demands progress and improved methods in handling freight, so there shall be less waste in time and labor of transshipping, loading, and packing, just as there has been progress and improved methods in handling passengers, building skyscrapers, making war enginery, munitions, etc.

No matter how much we appropriate for river improvement, no matter how much we regulate railroads, no matter how much localities build river terminals, no efficient results will be obtained without all these transportation facilities being brought into one "comprehensive plan." The great investments and organizations that will be necessary to provide for such changes in transportation apparatus and commercial practices as must take place can only be induced by a guaranty of permanent and stable conditions. These permanent and stable conditions can only be assured by a comprehensive Federal organization and direction of all the factors that would make one great transportation unit of all our transportation facilities and opportunities. Therefore the Government should establish a department of transportation, with the most comprehensive powers, both for economic and military reasons.

War-Time Prohibition.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HATTON W. SUMNERS,
OF TEXAS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 22, 1917.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Prof. Irving Fisher, printed in the New York Times of May 27, 1917.

The article is as follows:

WAR-TIME PROHIBITION—PROF. FISHER REPLIES TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE MODEL LICENSE LEAGUE ON THE LOSS OF 11,000,000 LOAVES OF BREAD A DAY.

[By Prof. Irving Fisher.]

YALE UNIVERSITY, May 23, 1917.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

May I add a word to my article on "War-time prohibition" in your issue of May 13, as rejoinder to the reply made by T. M. Gilmore, president of the National Model License League?

Mr. Gilmore alleges inaccuracy in some of my statements. I should be very glad to make correction were such inaccuracy shown.

This is a campaign which must be based on facts. At the outset, let me emphasize as one pertinent fact that, so far as I can discover, the opposition to war-time prohibition comes almost solely from those who are financially interested in the liquor traffic. Although "leagues" and "workingmen's petitions" are making their appearance against prohibition, they are in most cases, so far as I have been able to reach them, mere expressions of the financial interests concerned. Mr. Gilmore, for instance, is the editor of a journal devoted to the liquor interests, and the Model License League, of which he is President, is a league of those interests. He and his associates have as good a right as I or anyone else to express themselves and attempt to influence public opinion, but the public has a right to know of their special interest in the matter.

Mr. Gilmore states:

"Prof. Fisher also make the statement that the food waste in the manufacture of distilled and fermented liquors is sufficient, if conserved, to supply a pound loaf of bread every day to 11,000,000 men.

"Now, if Prof. Fisher will take the trouble to inquire as to the food value of the grain after the alcohol has been extracted, and as to the tremendous importance of distillers' and brewers' grain in the fattening of cattle and in the production of milk, he would unhesitatingly apologize for his statement and regret its appearance in cold print."

The truth is I have taken much pains to inquire into the food value of distillers' grains and brewers' grains. If used "in the fattening of cattle," the amount of food value in the form of protein which is recovered in meat is very small, not usually over some 2 or 3 per cent. In terms of calories it is even less. When these grains are used in the production of milk, the recovery possible is about 25 per cent. In the case of beer, this 25 per cent is to be reckoned only after deducting the protein in the beer, which is 15 per cent of the original. Against such saving must be set the fact that when grain is used for bread there is also a saving, for the millers' waste can also be fed to animals and made to yield milk in addition to the bread. This addition in protein is about 10 per cent.

When, therefore, the wastes are used for meat production, the net food loss caused by brewing and distilling remains the equivalent of about 11,000,000 loaves.

When milk is the product sought, the net loss is equivalent to nearly 10,000,000 loaves.

Even if we were to count the protein in the beer itself, the net loss would be nearly 8,000,000 loaves. But the beer protein can not be used without at the same time using alcohol, which is a narcotic poison. Beer protein is therefore not the physiological equivalent, properly speaking, of protein dissociated from alcohol such as that in ordinary foods.

From the standpoint of saving grain for export, the statement that 11,000,000 loaves of bread a day, or a pound loaf for every English and French soldier, is substantially correct.

I may take this opportunity to answer the attempt in the double full page advertisements referred to, of the liquor interests, to belittle 11,000,000 loaves of bread a day, or their own calculation of the grain used up in the manufacture of liquor. These advertisements point out that the grain or bread so wasted is less than 1 per cent of the total grain crop of the country. What they fail to point out is that the total grain crop of the country includes many times as much grain as is used as human food, for it includes the oats and corn fed to horses, cattle, and swine, as well as grain for other uses.

The truth is that 11,000,000 loaves of bread is 5½ per cent of the total food values consumed by human beings in the United States, over 10 per cent of the total consumption of breadstuffs in the United States, 13 per cent of the wheat consumed in the United States, 25 per cent of the wheat exported from the United States in 1916.

The rest of Mr. Gilmore's strictures are rather trivial as, for instance, that I called the District of Columbia "dry" when "the individual can have liquor shipped in for personal use from Baltimore and other nearby cities." It would seem to me fair to say that the District of Columbia has gone "dry," though not "bone dry."

Mr. Gilmore states that "to convert a brewery or ordinary distillery into an alcohol plant means tearing out all of its present apparatus, throwing it in the junk heap, and then putting in totally different equipment."

It is, however, a fact that distilleries are being used in Canada, and are offering to be used in this country, for producing industrial alcohol; and a few days ago I received a letter from a chemical engineer, who says:

"I have three clients who own moderate-sized breweries and who are preparing to convert their plants into other lines of industry. Two of these are being converted into factories which will produce foodstuffs. At least 80 per cent of the machinery in storage in the breweries is available for purposes of manufacturing. The business promises fair returns in normal times upon the total investments of the plants, while at the present time, with the high prices of foods, the profits promise to be greater even than for favorable years in the brewing business. The line which I have selected is quite outside of suggestions heretofore made by the Government or by the brewing and distilling interests."

I do not mean to assert that either the distillers or the brewers would be advantaged by prohibition. I am even one of those who believe that after prohibition has been adopted a Government commission should be appointed to investigate and report on any real damage done to those who have put their lives and capital into these lines, with the view to having any unreasonable losses reimbursed, if possible, out of public funds. We could afford to do this from the added national income which would come, as it has always come, from the cessation of alcoholic poisoning.

I do not bear Mr. Gilmore or his associates any ill will, although I regret that they do not see their way clear to offer, in the interests of national efficiency, to make the above-named transformation during the period of the war, expecting fair treatment in return.

IRVING FISHER.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FREDERICK C. HICKS,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 20, 1917.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the privilege granted me by the House of publishing an article on aeronautics, I submit an article which appeared in this morning's issue of the New York Times. It is a most timely editorial and conveys a message that should be heeded.

GIVE US AIRPLANES AND AIRMEN.

Admiral Peary put a plain and vital question to the Members of the Senate's Military Committee on Monday. "Why be pushed," he asked, "into every movement for national preparedness?" Pushing alone has carried us as far as we have gone. The people had to be pushed, the administration had to be pushed, and Congress had to be pushed, and that was the hardest part of the job. We have done very well so far, considering that we had done next to nothing before we went into the war, nine weeks or so ago; but we can do much better. Early adoption of the plan to form a mighty air force will soon make us formidable in the conflict. We now have a new and approved American motor engine for airplanes which can be quickly built in large numbers. The work of standardizing the machinery to build the engines is under way. There are many thousands of alert young Americans ready to train for military aviation. We have aviation fields in readiness, and others can soon be made ready. Secretary Baker, the chief signal officer, and the Council of National Defense, are all urging the plan on Congress.

We can do more effective work toward bringing the war to a victorious conclusion by upbuilding an air service, by making American military aviation the best in the world, than in any other way. There is plenty of money to draw upon. Congress is asked to appropriate $600,000,000 at once to supply the American Army with airplanes and trained aviators.

"Why not take the initiative and lead?" cries Peary. Why not, indeed! The development of aviation here, where it has been neglected more than in France, England or Germany, will serve to do more than to end the war. It will vastly increase our usefulness in peace. The aviator is destined to play a great part hereafter in the world's affairs. We shall need thousands of flying machines in the development of trade. The time is not far distant when airplanes will cross the Atlantic in a single flight. The immediate demand for airplanes, however, is military. We are at war, but not yet in the war. Let us go in with thousands of scouting and battle machines and help our allies to win the fight.

History of the Flag.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FREDERICK C. HICKS,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 21, 1917.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the courtesy granted me by the House of extending my remarks, I desire to set forth extracts relating to the history of the flag.

They are disconnected paragraphs which I had intended placing in my address of June 14.

DRAGON IN ENGLISH HISTORY.

Richard Cœur de Lion in 1190 adopted the legend and name of St. George and the dragon to typify his exploits. Henry III, in 1264, at the battle of Lewes, fought under the dragon; and Edward III, at the battle of Cressy in 1346, displayed a standard "with a dragon of red silk adorned and beaten with fair lilies of gold."

* * * * * * *

ENSIGN OR ANCIENT.

In old English writings the word "ancient" is frequently used to denote a flag or emblem. In Othello, Cassio, in speaking of Iago, says:

The lieutenant is to be saved before the ancient.

* * * * * * *

RATTLESNAKE FLAG.

The Rattlesnake flag was also called the Gadsden flag and in this connection the following reference is of interest:

IN CONGRESS, February 9, 1776.

Col. Gadsden presented to the Congress an elegant standard, such as is to be used by the commander in chief of the American Navy, being a yellow field with a lively representation of a rattlesnake in the middle, in the attitude of going to strike, and the words underneath "Don't tread on me."

Ordered, That the said standard be carefully preserved and suspended in the Congress room.

* * * * * * *

THE CONCORD FLAG.

I feel we can safely assume that it was this flag, "the most precious memorial of its kind of which we have any knowledge," that waved over the "embattled farmers" at Concord, April 19, 1775, when they "fired the shot heard round the world."

* * * * * * *

BUNKER HILL FLAG.

Mr. Botla, in his History of the Revolution, claims that Gen. Warren, in endeavoring to rally his men, reminded them of the motto inscribed on their ensigns, "An appeal to heaven."

* * * * * * *

THE MOULTRIE FLAG.

This was the flag of Sgt. Jasper rescued so gallantly when the fort of palmetto logs on Sullivan's Island was attacked by the British on June 28, 1776. It was under this flag that the Declaration of Independence was read to the citizens of Charleston on August 8, 1776. The word "Liberty" was frequently inscribed upon it. When South Carolina officially adopted a State flag they took this famous blue banner, with its white crescent, and in recognition of the services rendered by the palmetto logs placed in the center of the field the figure of a palmetto tree.

* * * * * * *

FLAG OF PROCTOR'S BRIGADE.

The flag of Proctor's brigade, of Westmoreland, Pa., should also be mentioned. It is a crimson flag, cantoned with the British union jack. In the center of the field a coiled rattlesnake with 13 rattles is represented, with the familiar words, "Don't tread on me." It is claimed that this flag was carried in the battle of Trenton.

At the battle of Long Island, August 26, 1776, the Americans fought under a banner made of red damask with the word "Liberty" inscribed upon it.

* * * * * * *

FIRST FLAG DISPLAY.

As there has been much controversy over the first display of the flag from a warship, it is of interest to note the several claims that have been advanced for this honor. In Griffin's History of Commodore Barry there is this reference to the new flag:

Under this flag Hopkins was the first to get to sea, and Barry's Lexington, bearing it, was the first to cause the British flag to surrender to the flag of Washington.

And again:

His cruiser, the Lexington, was the first Union flag to make the first capture that was first reported to the Marine Committee of Congress.

John Fiske, in speaking of the Lexington's capture of the British vessel Edward on April 7, 1776, says:

This was the first capture of a British warship by an American.

As this exploit occurred over a year before the stars and stripes were established the flag borne by Barry was not the national ensign. The "Union" flag referred to by Griffin was undoubtedly the Cambridge standard, and other accounts bear out the assumption that Barry's flag on the Lexington was the Union flag which Washington unfurled at Cambridge. This is further confirmed by Preble in his history when he says:

The Lexington was the first vessel that bore the Continental flag to victory on the ocean.

Capt. Manly's name has also been mentioned for the honor, and while it is true that his ship, the Lee, captured the British vessel Nancy in October or November, 1775, the flag that waived from the peak of the Lee was the famous "Pine Tree" emblem. John Paul Jones claimed that "My hand first hoisted the American flag," and this claim is substantiated by evidence which shows that during the winter of 1775–76, while the Alfred was lying at anchor at Philadelphia, Commander Hopkins put off to the newly commissioned ship. When he reached the deck of the Alfred, Jones, then a lieutenant, raised the flag in honor of the commander. But this American flag hoisted by Jones, and which the patriots of Philadelphia cheered on that wintry day, was none other than the Rattlesnake flag designed by Col. Gadsden, and which was frequently used on ships of war. It was this flag, with the addition of a pine tree, which an English writer of the period referred to in the following words:

A strange flag latterly appeared in our seas bearing a pine tree with the portraiture of a rattlesnake coiled up at its root, with the daring words, "Don't tread on me." We learned yesterday that the vessels bearing this flag have a sort of a commission from a society of people in Philadelphia calling themselves the Continental Congress."

* * * * * * *

JOHN PAUL JONES.

In De Kovens Life and Letters of John Paul Jones doubt is expressed about the claim made by Buele for Jones in connection with the raising of the flag on the Ranger in July, 1777. He says:

But the honor of first unfurling the Stars and Stripes from a ship of war, which has been claimed for Jones, is not supported by historical evidence. If he had been lucky enough to have had the opportunity of first unfurling the new national banner from the Ranger, it is not to be believed that he would have omitted to mention the fact.

The confusion incident to the first flag raised is due largely to the uncertainty of the interpretation of the phrase "American flag." Some writers speak of the Cambridge banner as the American flag, while others refer to the Pine Tree or Rattlesnake emblems as the national flag. To make the definition clear and positive, the national ensign, the flag of the United States is the Stars and Stripes, adopted June 14, 1777.

There does not seem to be any doubt but what Jones received the first salute ever given the Stars and Stripes by a foreign vessel.

OLD GLORY.

In 1837 the captain removed to Nashville, Tenn., taking with him Old Glory, which he afterwards displayed on all public occasions. His pronounced Union sentiments frequently led him into trouble with his southern neighbors, and during the war he was obliged to conceal the flag in the coverlet of his bed. In 1862 when a detachment of Buell's army occupied the city, Capt. Driver, with his own hands, hoisted Old Glory over the capitol building. The history of the flag from this time seems clouded in uncertainty, and I will refer briefly to three statements that have been made in regard to it. The Rev. Henry N. Couden, Chaplain of the House, a veteran of the Sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, feels confident that the Old Glory flag no longer exists. The respect and veneration in which Dr. Couden is held by every Member of Congress entitles his contribution to the history of this famous flag, to be accepted as evidence that the flag was accidentally destroyed. He states that in February, 1862, his regiment had been ordered to relieve Grant at Donelson, but while on the transports, word came that the fort had surrendered. They were then ordered to Nashville, where, on February 25, they took part in the ceremonies incident to the raising of the Stars and Stripes over the capitol. The next day Capt. Driver asked Col. Anderson permission to hoist Old Glory to the mast, and a squad of soldiers were detached to procure the flag, which the captain with his own hands raised over the building.

Next morning the captain presented the flag to the Sixth Ohio, and this regiment fought under Old Glory at Shiloh and Stone River. In keeping it aloft in the Battle of Stone River six were shot down, but the Old Flag was kept waving and did not touch the ground. For about a year Old Glory, the name by then having been adopted by other regiments, was the regimental flag of the Sixth Ohio. For safekeeping the flag after sunset each day was deposited in one of the quartermaster's wagons, but one night some of the animals broke loose in their browsings and destroyed the flag. Dr. Couden's statement is amply verified, if any verification was necessary, by the following paragraph taken from Hannaford's History of the Sixth Ohio Regiment:

The flag with whose history so many interesting associations were connected was presented to the Sixth Ohio, by which it was regarded as a most precious souvenir. It passed safely through all the campaigns of the regiment, until October, 1863, when Fred Schuell's mules discovered it one night, where it was stowed away in the headquarters' wagon, and before morning had eaten Old Glory up, leaving only a few shreds to tell the sacrilegious tale.

In order to make the record complete I insert extracts from a letter sent me by the Essex Institute, which gives their version of the flag's history. The secretary states that the original Old Glory was presented to the institute by a niece of Capt. Driver, who sent with the flag the following letter written by the captain himself:

NASHVILLE, TENN., September 25, 1880.

MY DEAR NIECE: I send you this my oldest flag. It has been everywhere, my companion around the world, waved at Pitcairn, and among the icebergs of Cape Horn. This is my Old Glory, like me neglected and worked out, but there is no stain upon it. I kept it for my winding sheet, a sailor's whim, and now feeling like old Mordecai at the gate, I give it to you as a proof of the kindness and reward a patriot receives at the hand of a soon-to-be-broken-up Government.

The secretary of the institute then closes his letter with this statement:

The traditionary story in relation to the flag eaten by the mule has also come down to us, but is said to refer to another flag. Let me say this also in this connection, that a descendant of Capt. Driver, living in the far West, I think Nevada, also has a flag of Capt. Driver's, which she claims to be the original. But in view of the evidence of this letter, which came to us with our flag, there can be no doubt as to the facts in the case.

Mrs. Mary Roland, of Nevada, a daughter of Capt. Driver, under date of August 15, 1913, stated that:

The original flag Old Glory has never been out of the possession of our family. This flag, my father named Old Glory, he gave me in July, 1873, and it has remained in my possession ever since.

Mrs. Roland claims that when her father, in 1880, asked her to send him Old Glory she sent him, without his knowledge, another flag, and that it was this substitute flag and not Old Glory which was deposited by his niece in the Essex Institute shortly after the captain's death.

* * * * * * *

In July, 1905, Scribner's Magazine published the "Narrative of John Kilby," quarter gunner of the Richard. In this narrative, written in 1810, the sinking of the Richard is described as follows:

O Heavens! It was enough to bring tears from the most unthinking man. She went down head foremost with all sails set—studding sails, top-gallant sails, royals, skyscrapers, and every sail that could be put on a ship—jack, pennant, and that beautiful ensign that she so gallantly wore while in action and when she conquered.

The Liquor Traffic.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 21, 1917.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, during the past 10 days especially my desk has been deluged with liquor literature, typewritten. printed, and mailed by liquor interests, arguing the ridiculous and absurd proposition that distilleries and breweries conserve rather than destroy food supplies. Until this war emergency arose the liquor interests in whole-page advertisements year after year have bragged about the millions of bushels of various kinds of grain they have annually consumed, and what great benefactors they were to the farming industries of the country by thus creating a demand for and increasing the market price of farm products. But lately they have turned a complete somersault by now contending in double-page advertisements that the amount of grain consumed by them is infinitesimal and insignificant.

I desire to call attention to the editorial from the New York Il Cittadino, received in this morning's mail, which has in it, typical of the liquor interests and its precepts, the following expressions:

To the Latin mind the word prohibition is atrociously insolent.

Prohibition is a similar morbid form of organized autocracy against the sacred natural rights of mankind to govern its own habits—

And so forth.

If drunkards were dealt with less leniently by judges and were given, for example, jail sentences or hard work instead of simple laughable fines their number would greatly diminish. They should be made a target of derision instead of compassion.

Just as the bartender furnishes to his victim brain-destroying liquor over the counter as long as his money lasts and then heartlessly kicks him out into the gutter, just so would this cold-blooded liquor traffic deliberately create a drunkard and then sentence him to jail or the rock pile for life.

This same propaganda would condemn Mr. Baker for his excellent regulations which he has placed around our Army to safeguard the morals, health, and efficiency of our splendid young American manhood. Every mother in America will thank Mr. Baker from the depths of her heart.

Under the unanimous leave extended me to thus extend my remarks, I desire to print in the RECORD, as an answer to the above, just a few samples of hundreds of petitions I have received from my constituents and other American citizens demanding of this Congress a war-emergency nation-wide prohibition law, to wit:

SIR: We, the undersigned citizens of Anson, Jones County, Tex., hereby respectfully request that you support any measure that may come before Congress looking in any way toward the curtailment of the liquor traffic, and especially such as may tend to prevent any grain being used or consumed in the manufacture of any whisky or other spirituous or malt liquors during the war.

Knowing your views upon this line and appreciating the fact that your efforts in this direction will result in much good, we respectfully ask that you use all energy that you possess in this direction.

MORO, TEX., April 17, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We live in a community ill conveniently situated as to United States mail service. We must go 4 miles over the mountain in one direction to Moro, or 5 miles in another to Shep, or 6 miles in another to the Bradshaw and Wingate star route. We have made two attempts to secure a rural route, but each time our efforts have been thwarted. Recently we secured the required number of petitioners for a route out from Guion, having secured 103 heads of families. People who were interested in keeping the office at Moro circulated another petition and secured about 83 signers that the route should not be granted; but we personally know that there was not in excess of 15 heads of families on their petition, the rest being children, many of them very small children. The result was that the Post Office Department refused the route without inspection. No one would be injured by the proposed route and so many would be benefited. We, the people who signed the petition for the route, feel that in justice we are entitled to it and at least that it should not be turned down on the strength of the petition against it. We are anxious that investigation be made to determine which of those petitions were signed by bona fide heads of families, and justice given accordingly. If you can aid us in securing the route, or advise us as to how we should proceed further, it will be highly appreciated.

Hoping to hear from you real soon, we are,

Yours, very truly,

W. R. GRIFFITH.

NEW YORK, June 19, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
The House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to the President's call I have organized facilities for the financing and harvesting of 800 acres of food crops, all of which are under way and progressing well. This effort on the part of so many is useless if the brewers and distillers are going to be permitted to continue the consumption of food products.

I am not an abstainer, but I recognize we are at war.

"A bushel saved is a bushel raised."

Faithfully, yours,

R. J. CALDWELL.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., April 17, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON:

In compliance with your request for an expression of my personal opinion as to the necessity for a nation-wide bone-dry prohibition law to be immediately declared and fully executed throughout the United States during the present great war crisis I would state that, coming from the Germanized city of Milwaukee and having intimately known the conditions prevailing in that city from the days when my grandfather came there as the first settler on the south side of that city, I feel satisfied that even in that large beer-consumptive center the very great majority of American citizens there agree with me that the exactions of modern times allow no time or room for even the comparatively harmless use of the milder intoxicants.

Milwaukee has always been known as a city of sobriety and consequent progress in spite of its large local consumption of beer. It is an industrial city, and as recently as 1914, when I completed the extensive upbuilding of Linebarger's subdivision, it was a permissible practice generally indulged in by all the members of the building craft to allow the consumption by each workman of from a pint to a quart of beer, or more if he wished, taken from the neighboring saloon and eaten with a lunch about 10 o'clock each morning, and then followed up without lunch a couple of times in the afternoon.

I employed a very large number of men, representing nearly all the building trades and crafts, and although I was from the outstart of my building experience aware of the fact that with the first onslaught of the morning beer the efficiency of the men diminished, I tolerated the practice because it was general in Milwaukee and condoned as a German custom.

Conditions are such now in Milwaukee that with the higher wages paid more efficiency is required of the men, and the morning "rushing of the can" is prohibited, and, in fact, no longer demanded by the men, with a marked increase in their efficiency, which more than compensates to capital the added increase of wages. The advance in wages has given the craftsmen more self-respect and more ambition in domestic life. The corner saloon, which formerly was crowded until late hours of the night, is now being more and more abandoned, and saloon keepers are looking for an opportunity to rid themselves of their unpopular investments. And all this has been done by reason of the feeling of suffrage States. Men whom I have known to be almost besotted with drink are boasting of the length of time they have been on the water wagon and take more pride in the refusal of even a small beer than three years ago I could have believed. We are verily in a period of self-restraint, in which the cry of the weak-natured alcoholic is "deliver me from booze."

Therefore I am confident from my actual acquaintance with the revulsion of feeling among the beer drinkers of Milwaukee that a nation-wide bone-dry prohibition bill would be welcomed by the citizens of that city.

If we want to hold our brow high in the tragedy of this terrible drama and play the part assigned us, our eyes must be free from the misty feeling of alcohol. There is no room for it in civil life and in the Army it will prove the best ally of our enemies.

Yours for "Old Glory" and for booze abolition, I am,

PAUL LINEBARGER.

CLINTON, MO., April 13, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Resolution adopted by Sedalia (Mo.) Presbytery in session at Bunceton, Mo., April 11, 1917:

"Resolved, That Sedalia Presbytery of the Presbyterian Church, United States of America, does hereby respectfully and earnestly petition Congress to speedily pass such legislation as may be necessary to abolish the manufacture of and traffic in intoxicating liquors, as a most important measure of preparedness for the war into which we are just entering, and thus encourage our new and great sister Republic Russia in her stand on this question, as well as the rest of the nations of the earth to do likewise."

The above resolution was unanimously passed by said Presbytery, representing about 36 Presbyterian churches in central Missouri.

Respectfully,

H. P. FARIS.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. DEWALT,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 21, 1917,

On the bill (H. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, it has been so often said in this debate that the proposed legislation is momentus and important that I need not dwell upon that phase of this question. Whilst it is momentous and important it is equally true that we are facing the most startling and critical period in the history of this Nation since the days of the Civil War. It therefore behooves every Member of this House to consider this legislation in the light of the circumstances which now surround us.

What would be proper legislation in times of peace would not be suitable legislation at this time, and laws that are now enacted by reason of the necessities that now confront us, are not to be judged, or should not be judged, by the strict rules that might be applied if the country was not facing a peril, and if we were not engaged in this war.

The country can not afford to wait for a lengthy discussion of the problems presented, however learned and however interesting it may be. It is not a theory but a condition that confronts us, and all the finespun theories and arguments amount to nothing in the face of the condition which now exists.

FOOD CONSERVATION IMPERATIVE.

There is not a Member of this House who is aware of this condition who will not concur in saying that there is a necessity for legislation of this sort. He may not agree with the terms of this bill; he may not accept some and perhaps many of its provisions, but if he is honest to himself and to the people whom he represents as a whole, and if he is observant of the prevailing sentiment, he must admit that the evil, caused by the lack of the conservation and control of the necessities of life, exists and that an immediate remedy is demanded. If he starts out with these premises, then he must inevitably come to the conclusion that he favors some legislation of this sort, and as yet I have not heard any of those who object to this proposed bill offer any substitute which is as good or better.

Almost every gentleman who has addressed the House admits the evil and recognizes the necessity of controlling and reforming of the same, and yet many are strenuously opposing this legislation without offering any substitute which will correct or control that which they admit should be corrected and controlled. In other words, or in homely phrase, they say "the patient is sick and the physician has prescribed the remedy," but they do not agree with the prescription, whilst they admit they have none which is as suitable or better.

It is far easier to tear down a building which has been erected than to construct one, and so it is far easier in this instance to criticize and condemn the present bill than to draft one which meets with the demands of the occasion. If the progress of the world depended upon critics and obstructionists, we would still be in the "stone age." The present bill is not without fault. I do not believe that its proponents claim that it is perfect, but it is the best that has yet been offered, and while it may be subject to amendment, and no doubt will in some measure be amended, it represents, in my judgment, the best thought of those who have given the subject the most careful study.

THE COURT OF LAST RESORT.

There are four points of view from which this bill can be considered. There may be others, but these occur to me. It has been said and claimed by quite a number of able Senators in the other branch of the Legislature, and very vociferously proclaimed here, that legislation of this sort is wholly unconstitutional. This bill contains a provision that if any portion thereof be found unconstitutional by the court of last resort the balance of the bill will be held valid. Under existing circumstances, and by reason of the dire necessity of this time, I am willing, as a legislator to take my chance in the court of last resort. It may be with truth admitted, and should be admitted, that a very able and potent argument can be made against the constitutionality of this measure. Its validity must rest upon the war powers of Congress. If it has no standing there, then, in my judgment, as a lawyer, it has no standing at all.

A very voluminous brief was lately filed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I have with some care examined the same. Most of the cases and precedents therein cited relate to the police powers of the Nation and to interstate and foreign commerce. Therefore, in my judgment it is not applicable to the proposed measure. In that brief there is an attempt to show that this act is constitutional under the commerce clause, and it is not in a spirit of contention that I refer to this brief, but in the honest sentiment that if this bill is to be sustained it must be held valid under the war clause of the Constitution.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS.

Congress has the sole power of declaring war, and it also possesses the power, under the Constitution, of enacting such laws as are necessary and proper to enforce the provisions of the Constitution. By that same Constitution the President is designated as the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy.

Congress must maintain and support the Army and Navy, which by its power it has the right and duty to create. It is claimed by some, and not without reason, that this legislation delegates to the President the powers which are inherent in Congress and which it can not divest itself of. I take it that this contention is not a good one.

When Congress has declared war, and when it has created an Army and a Navy, and when the President, by his inherent power, is Commander of that Army and that Navy, and when it is the duty of the Congress to maintain and support that Army and that Navy in time of peace, and especially in time of war, and when, under the general clause of the Constitution, Congress has the right to pass such legislation as is necessary to enforce the provisions of the Constitution, then I take it that it may delegate to such Commander in Chief extraordinary power on extraordinary occasions and necessary powers occasioned by the necessity of the time. I know full well that there are many who will say that the war clause of the Constitution to which I have referred must be specifically applied, and that it is not a blanket clause which would warrant this legislation. The plea of the delegation of power has been made against almost every measure which has been proposed for the present necessity.

KNOTS AND THEORIES DISPLACED.

We can not stop at this time to untie knots and spin fine theories. The time is now here for action, and if in the future, by reason of inaction and delay and party contention and a superabundance of so-called technical wisdom, we meet with disaster because of unpreparedness in this field of legislation the blame will rest with those who are not willing to take the risk and who are sticklers for legal technicalities.

No man reveres the Constitution more than I, but lawyers and legislators can safely rely upon the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States can be relied upon to determine what is constitutional, and at this time we can not afford to sit as a supreme court; we must legislate; we must act. And therefore, with these views, I leave the constitutionality of this question and proceed to the next point of view.

This may be called a political point. Is it good politics to advocate or oppose this bill? I have heard it said that the bill is discriminatory because it affects only the farming industry and the mining industry and those engaged in fuel supply. If this bill is enacted, it will affect every man, woman, and child in this country not directly but indirectly. But it is folly to say that because it speaks of food conservation and proposed food and fuel control, and selects these as the objects of legislation, that it affects only these industries and the people engaged in them.

PATRIOTISM, NOT POLITICS.

The body politic is so closely knit that if one of the members thereof is affected all the nerves feel the sensation and in some measure are likewise affected. But even if the argument was good that it affects only the farmers and those engaged in fuel supply, the reply to that is that we must begin somewhere, and these are the necessities of life and these are the objects which are now, in part, controlled by those who are manipulating prices by speculating in products, and by controlling those supplies and attempting to controvert and abuse and divert the natural law of supply and demand.

It may be good politics to cry out from the house tops that the farmer and the laboring man must be protected, but to me the more potent cry and the better political slogan is that the Nation must be protected, freedom must be maintained, every phase of our institutions must be protected; and it strikes me, as a thoughtful man, that if we do not pass some legislation of this kind we fail to protect the last-mentioned subjects, and in that event the farmer and the laboring man, with all the rest, would be without protection. The class legislator or local legislator may think that he is politically wise, and every man naturally seeks to support legislation beneficial to the locality in which he lives and to his constituents. But this is not a local matter; this affects not only one congressional district or one State; it affects the whole Nation; it affects the whole world.

And it is the height of folly to be bound by party lines and by local subdivisions in a matter of this importance. In other words, I think it is bad politics to oppose this legislation.

HUMANITARIAN POINT OF VIEW.

The third point of view is the humanitarian point. Every one of the legislators knows that the people are now paying from 60 to 100 per cent more for the necessities of life than they did two years ago, and he must know, if he knows anything, that the prices have been enhanced and advanced by cornering, by speculating, and by unlawful manipulation; and then, at the same time, he must be aware of the fact that hungry mouths are crying against these exorbitant prices.

It seems to me there is but one conclusion as to the humanitarian side of this issue, and that is this: There is likelihood of great suffering by reason of these high prices; it may be by reason of the shortage in foodstuffs, certainly not in fuel. And this legislation seeks in part to prevent and control these exorbitant prices and to conserve so that if there is a shortage we will have at least enough to feed our people and help others who are engaged in the same cause for which we are fighting.

It is easy to say that there is no shortage, and I hope, and we all are of the same mind, that there will be an abundance of foodstuffs. We trust that prices may be lower, but we do know now that whilst there is an apparent shortage the demand for food is far greater than it was. I need not refer to the reasons. A simple statement of the fact that half of the world is at war and not producing makes the proposition self-evident. With these conditions we must prepare for the possibilities. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

PREPARE FOR THE STORMS.

It is bad to go away from home when one sees a storm approaching, without an umbrella, or at least a raincoat. We see this storm approaching, and have seen it for quite a time. In fact, we are now in the very center of the storm, and it is likely to be a continued stress of bad weather. We must get ready, and the only way to get ready is to do something and not talk about it. We must help those who can not, at this time, help themselves, because they are fighting with us for the liberty of the world; and we must, at the same time, protect our own people against the extortionate demands of those who are speculating in all the commodities which are necessary for the proper maintenance of our Army and our Navy and our people at large.

One might talk here about the possibilities of starving children in the future; he might speak of the hardships which might come to the general populace; he might refer to the distressed conditions in portions of France and in Belgium, and hold up that picture as a warning to us. I anticipate no such disasters here, but as before said we had better prepare ourselves for a long stress of bad weather, and this is the proper humanitarian view. It is not sentimental; it is severely practical.

There is another point of view, and then I have concluded. This is the patriotic view. I would not presume to criticize or condemn any Member of this House who opposes this legislation. I am always willing, and have been willing, to give to others credit for the same patriotism and loyalty that I profess and maintain. Men necessarily differ upon great questions like this, but they sometimes do not get the proper focus by reason of their honesty of difference, and at the same time they are equally honest and conscientious.

MAINTENANCE OF HUMAN LIBERTY.

But this we all know, that the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, the President of this people, has said, and all members of the Cabinet say, that this legislation is absolutely necessary at this time. The great Agricultural Committee, with a few exceptions, voices that opinion, and it was with great pleasure that I listened to the able chairman of that committee in his presentation of this bill.

The people of this country are demanding this legislation. They know the evil, the have felt the evil. Dire necessity has taught them what oppression and high prices caused by manipulation and speculation mean. They are willing to bear the burdens justly thrust upon them. They are willing to fight, and if necessary they are willing to die for their country's cause, for its honor, and for the liberty of the human race. And, whilst they are willing to do that, they want equal patriotism in the legislature.

They will not submit to any class legislation; nor will they submit to any laws which seek to protect one class of citizens as against another. At the same time they will not approve of any legislation which is unduly oppressive.

What they demand, and what it is our duty to give them, is simply this—our best thought, embodied in legislation, which will quickest lead to the desired results. These results are the winning of this war, the subjugation of German autocracy, the establishment of principles of free government in all the nations of the world, the releasing from the yoke of tyranny the weaker nations, the freedom of commerce; in other words, the maintenance of human liberties. These are the results desired, and, in my humble judgment, this legislation is one of the steps which leads to that fruition.

Earlier Career of Herbert C. Hoover.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY Z. OSBORNE,
OF CALIFORNIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 21, 1917.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the privilege given by the unanimous consent of the House, I reproduce from the Los Angeles Examiner of June 10, 1917, a free newspaper sketch of the earlier life of Mr. Herbert C. Hoover. Mr. Hoover never having taken part in politics or in public life, his personal history is not so well known to the general public as it is to the people of California, who have followed his career with great interest from his boyhood at Stanford University, his rapid progress from a position of a struggling student, like that of thousands of our young men in colleges and universities, to a most remarkable success in his profession, and his development of great ability in connection with the supplying of food to the starving people of Belgium during the present war. So little has been printed about Mr. Hoover personally that I believe it would be interesting to the Members of this House to read such a personal sketch.

[San Francisco correspondence of Los Angeles Examiner—by Denis Donahoe.]

WHO IS HERBERT CLARK HOOVER?

H. C. HOOVER MILLIONAIRE AT 27 YEARS—INTIMATE STORY OF STANFORD GRADUATE WHO FED BELGIUM, AND NOW UNITED STATES FOOD DIRECTOR—FIRST WHITE MAN TO EXPLORE INTERIOR CHINA; FINDS RICH MINES THERE; FIGHTS BOXER REBELS.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 9.

If an intelligent foreigner anywhere on earth were asked to-day to name the three most famous living Americans, it is a perfectly safe conjecture that he would include among them Herbert Clark Hoover. Yet Hoover less than three years ago was practically unknown, save among engineers and mining men and to an ever widening circle of loyal friends.

The consideration of this extraordinary fact challenges the inquiry, Who is Herbert Clark Hoover?

Herbert Clark Hoover was born in West Branch, Iowa, in 1874. He was graduated from Leland Stanford Junior University, in 1895, and is by profession an engineer. He is the managing director of many mining companies, widely scattered in many countries. He is married and is a member of many learned societies and several London clubs, and, merely inferentially, he has been very successful in his calling and is presumably wealthy. The skeleton is here, truly; but the pulsing flesh is not.

BELOVED OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Fortunately for the inquirer, California was the State in which Hoover made his flying start for fame and fortune, and here in San Francisco may be numbered, literally by scores, men who were his fellow students or classmates in Stanford and who, because of the compelling charm of his personality and his unsullied warm-heartedness, have been knitted to him by the strongest bonds of friendship as the years sped on. Moreover, although his principal place of residence in later years has been London, his heart has always turned to California as home. It was here in 1899 that he married the charming and brilliant woman who has shared with him many strange adventures in the out of the way corners of the world whither his profession called him—rifle in hand, she fought shoulder to shoulder with her husband at the defense of Tientsin in the Boxer rebellion—and when jaded by intense physical and mental toil, time and time again Hoover has returned to California, as a sick child to a gentle mother, for rest and kindly care. To these old college mates of Hoover's here in San Francisco it needed not the direful plight of Belgium to reveal to them that their friend was truly one of the great men of the world; that his heart was ever attuned to heed instantly the cry of affliction; that although his wealth to-day must amount to at least $5,000,000, he had never made wealth getting an aim, and cared little or nothing about money.

ALWAYS DOING BIG THINGS.

Belgium's sore distress commanded Hoover's sympathy and service, and sympathy and service, so his friends declare, have characterized the aims and aspirations of this able, warm-hearted, quiet, modest, somewhat silent man of 43 all his life long.

"We always knew he had it in him," is the way one distinguished San Franciscan who has known Hoover ever since 1891 phrased it when discussing the relief in Belgium.

Another old friend bore this testimony: "Money with Hoover was always a secondary consideration. He made it—stacks of it—simply because he was so clever and efficient that he couldn't escape it, when he was doing big things. I will tell you something that the public knows nothing about. Hoover was in this city when the various enterprises of the Sloss family went on the rocks. He dropped everything else to devote himself to the Sloss situation, because the Slosses were his friends, and friendship means far more to Hoover than to most men. Almost every day brought to him frantic telegrams from his London office: 'Come home at once. Such and such a company wants you to expert this or that property. Fee $100,000 or $250,000, or so much and an interest.' as the case might be. He threw the messages, one and all, into the waste-paper basket, and went on with his self-appointed task. Not until he had organized the local bankers, through his personal solicitation, into a committee to take hold of the Sloss affairs and straighten them out, did he leave for London. I saw him daily while he was here and when he was leaving I said to him: 'This Sloss matter must have cost you half a million at least.'

THE GOSPEL OF HOOVER.

"'That is nothing,' he answered, 'what's a friend for if he will not help out in an emergency?' That is and always has been Hoover's gospel."

From such friends as these have been gleaned the following details of Hoover's early struggles and later great successes—great whether measured by the world's yardstick, money, or by that nobler scale of work well done—together with a unanimous tribute to the innate nobility of his character, his unswerving integrity, his lofty ideals, his keen sympathy with distress, his well-nigh superhuman capacity for hard work, and the marvelous breadths of his mental vision.

Stanford University first opened its doors in 1891, and among the swarm of students attracted from all parts of the Union and several foreign countries, was Herbert Clark Hoover, aged 16, a native of Iowa. His father and mother were dead, and such estate as they had left had been lost through unfortunate investments, with the result that young Hoover had been supporting himself from early boyhood. He came to Stanford directly from Oregon, where he had been working for a year, and he brought sufficient money with him to see him through his first semester. It is interesting to learn that although Hoover succeeded in passing the entrance examination, he was conditioned in one subject and had to make it up during his freshman term.

EARNS HIS OWN WAY.

During the whole four years' course this man who was destined to accumulate a comfortable fortune before he was 24 and to become a millionaire at 27 paid all his living and college expenses out of his own earnings without financial assistance from anyone. He acted as agent for a laundry and did odd jobs for Prof. Branner in the geological laboratory, such as grinding slides for microscopic studies of the constituent minerals in rocks. Later he became Branner's regular laboratory assistant, and in the summers he served on several geological surveys, including work in the Sierra Nevada with the United States Geological Survey.

All this time he was making many warm friends, but general recognition of his ability by his fellows did not come to him until his last year in college, when he was elected treasurer of the student body, managing all athletic affairs. In this post he showed remarkable business ability for a lad of 20, according to the unanimous testimony of his classmates. At Stanford, by the by, he first met his future wife, Lou Henry, daughter of a Monterey banker. Miss Henry entered Stanford as a student of geology at the beginning of Hoover's senior year.

He was graduated in 1895. After working for a short time in a mine in New Mexico he obtained the position of assistant manager of the Morning Star mine in Grass Valley.

Louis Janin, famous California engineer, the man who first correctly worked out the very complex geology of the Anaconda, happened at this time to be looking around for an office assistant, and he selected young Hoover. This was in 1896. The regular pay for this job was pitifully small—only $50 a month—but this was supplemented by occasional commissions from clients of Janin's to sample mines or make minor examinations—for which young Hoover was allowed to charge moderately.

Now, it is thoroughly characteristic of the man who but the other day saved the Belgians from starvation, that no sooner did Herbert Hoover get this poorly paid but, as he supposed, permanent employment, than he scraped up every meager dollar at his disposal and sent East for his younger brother, Theodore (now a distinguished engineer), his sister, and a girl cousin, who was in poor circumstances. The united family lived in a house in Oakland rented by Hoover—and there one of his college friends, now the head of a great mining company—found him.

Let this friend tell the story:

"I arrived in San Francisco flat broke and ran into Hoover. He promptly urged me to make my home with him until I got on my feet again. I knew his generosity, and cross-questioned him. I succeeded in worming it out of him that he was in truth desperately hard up, and I then told him positively that I could not consent to add to his burdens. He was very much hurt; but I was obdurate. After I had rustled a job I used to see a great deal of him. While with Janin, the examinations which he made of mining properties began to attract attention among men of standing, and gradually his earnings increased. It was in 1897, his second year in Janin's office, that the golden door of opportunity opened wide to this young engineer, who never shirked an obligation and fairly reveled in hard work."

Louis Janin was importuned by a big firm of London mining operators, Bewick, Moreing & Co., to select some young California engineer to act as their field geologist in Western Australia. Janin, some five years before, had recommended an engineer named Goldstone to this company, and he had made good. Janin offered the place, which carried with it a salary of $6,000 a year, to Hoover, and pleased him mightily by telling him that, in his judgment, he was entirely competent to fill it.

FEARED HOOVER'S YOUTH.

But there was an obstacle, which a friend relates, as follows:

"Although Hoover was then just entering his twenty-fourth year, he did not look a day over eighteen. In fact, he looked a perfect kid. I had just been admitted to the bar, and he hunted me up to ask my advice. The English firm had wired Janin to tell Hoover to report in London and Hoover was afraid that when they saw him they would turn him down because of his youth. At my suggestion he cabled them direct and obtained by wire from them a ratification of the contract. It took every dollar that we could scrape together to get him to London. Bewick, Moreing & Co. were game. They stood by the terms of the contract with regard to pay, but they must have thought him very young for they wired secret instructions to their agent in Australia to put Hoover in as manager of one of their smaller mines and not let him act as field geologist in the selection of other mines for investment until he was a bit older."

When the Bewick-Moreing agent at Perth, West Australia, broke the news as gently as he could to the young American that he was to draw his $6,000 a year for work involving less responsibility than he had supposed what do you think Herbert Hoover did? He promptly resigned.

To be sure, as he stood there, jingling in an almost empty pocket the few remaining shillings left from his passage money, he was 15,000 miles from home, in debt to his employers, friendless, and a stranger, and yet those who know him best say that he did not falter. Six thousand a year and the simple duties of an unexacting berth were a combination well calculated to appeal irresistibly to an ordinary youth of 24; but Hoover was no ordinary youth! He was a predestined leader of men, and one can picture him towering to his full height of 5 feet 10½ inches in the counting room of that greatly perturbed agent—smug representative of British commercialdom—when he delivered himself of his ultimatum This was the crucial moment in Hoover's whole career. It was then and there that this juvenile Pizarro drew a line on the sand with his sword's point—behind it lay Panama and obscurity—$6,000 a year in a small West Australian mining camp—before it, the incalculable wealth of the Incas—an unexplored land and the golden possibilities of a young engineer's day dreams.

Well, the Bewick firm hastened to back track when they heard from their agent, and Hoover was given both the management of the mine and his legitimate work of a field geologist.

FORTUNE KIND TO HIM.

Fortune favored the young adventurer from the start. The very year he reached West Australia, 1897, and on his very first trip, investigating mining possibilities, he ran across a prospect called the "Sons of Gwalia." The people who were working it only faintly realized how promising it was. Hoover examined it; took a short-time option on it; and cabled his principals to send another engineer to confirm his examination. The Bewick-Moreing firm did not even answer his cablegram; so he cabled again, more urgently. No answer; but a third cablegram brought a reply bidding him to look it over again carefully and report. He reported by cable, as the option was about to expire, and it cost the firm $1,500 for the message, but they bought the property for a trifle on his report. He took charge at once as manager and in a few months the development work, done under his direction, revealed large bodies of rich ore. The firm sold the property at a profit of half a million dollars, and Hoover, then aged 24 years, was given $33,000, it is said, as his share of the profits. Better still, his salary was increased to $15,000 a year, with a percentage of the future profits from such properties as he experted and the firm bought. The general management of the extensive mining interests of the firm in West Australia was placed with Hoover. This included such mines as the East Murchison. Nothing more was said about his youth. He had made good.

A HOOVER CHARACTERISTIC.

His friends say that it is thoroughly characteristic of Hoover—a man who never forgets a friend—that as soon as he was in full charge of the firm's many mines in West Australia he engaged a number of his old cronies of the Stanford engineering course to join him as his assistants. Among those who went to West Australia in 1898 and 1899 at Hoover's solicitation were Dean P. Mitchell, now of London; Frank Dennis, now deceased; W. P. Prichard; and George Wilson.

In 1899 Hoover, run down in health through overwork, but possessing an international reputation as an engineer, came to California for a rest, and while here he married. Two splendid boys, Herbert and Allan, have blessed this union.

Later in the same year he took his bride to China, where he had been appointed chief engineer of the Imperial Bureau of Mines, at the instance of the minister of mines of the Province of Yunnan. Yunnan is one of the most remote Provinces of China, jammed up against Tibet, and ever since Marco Polo's day, and even before it, it has been a large producer of gold and other metals, albeit the mining and metallurgical processes have been of the most primitive description. Hoover headed an expedition that explored and prospected vast tracts in the interior of China that had never before been visited by white men. He negotiated a loan in London of $3,000,000 for the Yunnan official and started the development of a number of Chinese mines, which are now controlled by the Chinese Engineering & Mining Co., which was organized by Hoover in 1901, and of which he is now managing director.

HOOVER'S FIRST MILLION.

The episode of the Boxer uprising in 1900 has already been touched upon. The next year, 1901, when Hoover was just 27, he made his first million.

The Chinese Imperial Government had granted a number of concessions for the construction of railroads and the development of coal mines to Russian and other corporations, and regretted the act ere the ink was dry. They had reason to regret it, for Russia, simultaneously with beginning work, moved a body of troops onto the right of way, and where Russia sets her foot in Asia there she stays. Fortunately for many a peacock feather and yellow jacket of Chinese officialdom the contracts contained a clause that they might be canceled by China on payment of a certain indemnity, plus the expenses with interest, etc. The amount needed was $8,000,000, and, as usual, the imperial treasury was empty.

In its terror the Chinese Government appealed to Hoover and offered him a full partnership with China in all the railroads and mines if he would raise the necessary money. He went to London, returned with $8,000,000, and his company acquired a half interest, with the Chinese Government, in properties of incalculable value. The Russians fumed and stormed, but had to surrender, albeit with a very bad grace.

It was the year following this coup that Bewick, Moreing & Co. offered to take Hoover into partnership. He accepted, and accordingly he moved to London in 1902.

Space is lacking to relate here his extraordinary achievements in mining while a partner in this old-established firm. One episode, however, must be related, as it displays that sterling integrity of character which has proved the principal formative factor in Hoover's success. Shortly before he allied himself with this firm he discovered that owing to the dishonesty of a subordinate there had been an overissue of the capital stock of one of the most successful mines managed by the firm. Exactly how many shares had been overissued and sold he did not know, but it afterwards transpired that $50,000 would have covered fully any legal or moral claim that could have been brought against Hoover, as one of the partners, since his connection as such was recent. But Hoover did not stand on any such technicality. He was a full partner of the firm; its honor, he felt, was his personal honor, and he insisted on paying his full quota. It cost him more than $500,000, which put an obvious crimp in his newly-made million; but it settled once and forever what sort of a man was the new junior partner of Bewick, Moreing & Co. He subsequently sold out his interest in this firm and is now managing from offices in London, New York, and San Francisco scores of mines in many countries. From his office in this city he operates the Oroville Dredging (Ltd.), the Pato Mines, a gold-dredging enterprise in Colombia, and the Babilonia Gold Mines, and Central American Mines (Ltd.)—all rich producers.

125,000 MEN EMPLOYED.

A faint idea of the magnitude of his mining operations may be deduced from the statement that he now has 125,000 men working for him.

One more extraordinary story about the mining activities of this engineering wonder worker. Among the companies controlled by Herbert Clark Hoover one finds an entry of the Burma Corporation. The name tells little, yet the story concealed by the name is one of the most extraordinary in the annals of mining.

During the middle ages and from time immemorial Chinese had worked a group of amazingly rich silver-lead-zinc mines in Upper Burma, on the Siamese frontier. Even to-day the Chinese is the only oriental race, except the Japanese, which possesses even a rudimentary knowledge of metallurgical processes. At some uncertain epoch in the fifteenth or sixteenth centuries Mohammedans drove the Chinese out and they never came back. Then for a century or two the Burmese worked the mines, losing most of the values, but saving enough of the silver to content them. Then came wars and revolutions in Burma. The mines and primitive smelting works were never reopened, and the very site was forgotten by the inhabitants. The virgin forests spread over the huge slag piles and engulfed them in tropical greenery. Not a trace, not a vestige remained of the labor of centuries, for man's puny handiwork was smothered in verdure, and the panther stalked the deer where whole generations of patient Chinese had toiled.

FIND VAST FORTUNE.

One day a mining engineer leading an exploring party stumbled on this unknown nook, and his curiosity was kindled when he surveyed the curious conical hills, some of them hundreds of feet high, that studded the forest. So he had his men dig into them; and his wonder grew when he recognized the stuff thrown up by the spade as slag, and was dumbfounded to note the result—60 per cent in lead and zinc sulphides, with a little silver and now and then a trace of copper. As there were hundreds of these great mounds, the nameless engineer realized instantly that his fortune was made. He communicated with Hoover, and Hoover went himself and examined the marvel. What is more, Hoover, with his wonderful technical skill and mining intuition, actually discovered the original mine—one of the richest silver mines in the world. The slag heaps alone, however, represent more than $500,000,000.

If space permitted, it would be a genuine pleasure to tell how Hoover and his clever wife translated into flowing English the "De Re Metallica" of George Agricola, a medieval metallurgist—no easy task, as Agricola's Latin is exceptionally crabbed, and he coined 1,500 words not to be found in any Latin dictionary.

Certain it is that whether his task is translating for recreation a medieval textbook, or developing a mine, or feeding and clothing the starved of Belgium, Herbert C. Hoover always "makes good."

Addresses of Hon. Champ Clark and Gov. Martin G. Brumbaugh at the Dedication of the Washington Memorial Arch at Valley Forge.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY W. WATSON,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 20, 1917.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a speech of Hon. CHAMP CLARK at the dedication of the United States Washington Memorial Arch at Valley Forge yesterday and a speech of Hon. Martin B. Brumbaugh on the same occasion. The speeches are as follows:

ADDRESS OF SPEAKER CHAMP CLARK IN PRESENTING THE WASHINGTON MEMORIAL ARCH AT VALLEY FORGE TO THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA ON TUESDAY, JUNE 19, 1917.

We stand to-day on ground hallowed by the unspeakable sufferings of as true a band of patriots as ever lived. We are assembled here to pay a tardy tribute to the deeds of a portion of the brave men who made us free. The story of Valley Forge is one of the most heroic and beyond all question the most pathetic chapter in the history of American armies. It required more courage and fortitude to freeze and starve in the cantonments here during the awful winter of 1777–78 than it did to charge the British Regulars in the open field or to assault them in the redoubts at Yorktown. Here in the winter of discontent our fortunes sank to the lowest point, but from this place Washington went forth conquering and to conquer and to become the foremost man of all the world.

By one of those strange accidents which puzzle even the philosophers, one of the best and most appreciative histories of the American Revolution ever written is by Sir George Otto Trevelyan, an Englishman, the nephew and biographer of Lord Macaulay. Describing Washington's encampment here, he says:

That little village (Valley Forge), clustered at the bottom of a deep ravine, gave a name to what, as time goes on, bids fair to be the most celebrated encampment in the world's history.

His prophecy has come true. It is the most famous encampment on the surface of the globe.

His account of that dreadful winter at Valley Forge is as graphic a piece of historical writing as can be found in the libraries of the world. It is too long, however, to be quoted here in full. One brief excerpt must suffice.

Speaking most feelingly of the foul slanders circulated about Washington while amid unparalleled horrors he was trying to secure for his ragged and hungry soldiers here the clothing, the food, and the medicine absolutely necessary to keep soul and body together, he says:

Depressed and anxious, he was not perturbed out of measure, inasmuch as he believed himself to be in direct relations with an authority which was superior to Congress. The old ironmaster of Valley Forge, with whom he lodged used to relate that one day, while strolling up the creek, he found the general's horse fastened to a sapling. Searching around he saw Washington in a thicket by the roadside on his knees in prayer, with tears running down his cheeks. The honest man, who was a Quaker preacher, "felt that he was upon holy ground, and withdrew unobserved." On returning home he told his wife that the Nation would surely survive its troubles, because if there was anyone on earth that the Lord would listen to it was George Washington."

Abraham Lincoln once said:

I should be the most presumptuous blockhead upon this footstool if I for one day thought I could discharge the duties which have come upon me since I came into this place without the aid and enlightenment of One who is wiser and stronger than all others. I have always taken counsel of the Almighty, and referred to him my plans, and have never adopted a course without being assured of his approbation.

And who will have the temerity to say that Washington's prayers were not answered? I have always thought that "The Father of His Country" kneeling in the snowy woods of Valley Forge praying for the health and lives of his famishing little band of heroes and for the freedom of his country deserves to be placed on immortal canvas by a master hand.

So far as I know, the piety of Alfred Lord Tennyson has never been exploited by his biographers among his claims to our regards. Nevertheless he wrote these beautiful lines:

More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore, let thy voice
Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
For what are men better than sheep or goats
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer
Both for themselves and those who call them friend?
For so the whole round world is every way
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.

The Constitutional Convention was the wisest set of men that ever met under one roof. The most sensible thing they did was to divide the governmental machinery of this country into three separate departments. The next wisest thing was to divide the Congress into two branches. Some lady asked George Washington at a great dinner what the Senate was created for and why they had two legislative branches instead of only one. He said that the Senate would perform the same function for legislation that a saucer did for tea; that they pour the hot tea of the House into the saucer of the Senate to cool off. Evidently Gen. Washington was not up to date in pink-tea etiquette or he would not have said anything about pouring tea into a saucer. I have sometimes thought that in these latter days it is the hot Senate tea that needs cooling off.

George Washington's name is inseparably connected in the most intimate way with Valley Forge. Highly as we esteem him, I do not believe that we appreciate him adequately even yet. Valuable and momentous as was his conduct as Commander in Chief of our Revolutionary Armies and President of the United States, in my judgment he rendered more service to his country and the cause of human liberty as President of the Constitutional Convention than he did as soldier or President. If it had not been for his commanding influence, the chances are that no Constitution would have been agreed upon, and if it had not been an absolute certainty that he would be the first President, the Constitution would never have been ratified. His name liveth evermore and his fame will increase as the years steal into the centuries. I think that perhaps the most magnificent eulogy ever pronounced upon him is in one stanza of Lord Byron's Ode to Napoleon:

Where may the wearied eye repose,
When gazing on the great;
Where neither guilty glory glows,
Nor despicable state?
Yes; one—the first—the last—the best—
The Cincinnatus of the West,
Whom envy dared not hate,
Bequeath'd the name of Washington,
To make man blush there was but one.

This Republic is the first really great Republic that ever existed on the face of the earth. We talk about the Republics of Greece and Rome, and the rest of them. They were simply aristocratic oligarchies. The intricate, delicate, and elaborate scheme of checks and balances in our system of government is what has preserved it to the present day, and what will preserve it, let us hope, for all time to come.

The idea of free government is not new. We did not originate it. We have developed it and put it into practice. It has been the dream of men from a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Whoever wrote the Shakespeare plays put these words into the mouth of Brutus in his speech defending himself for the assassination of Cæsar:

Here comes his body, mourned by Mark Antony; who, though he had no hand in his death, shall receive the benefit of his dying, a place in the Commonwealth; as which of you shall not?

There is the case in a nutshell, the essence of representative government—"a place in the Commonwealth."

The legislative body in every free country is the most important of the three branches—legislative, judicial, and executive. We come from the people, we represent the people, and we reflect the will of the people. I undertake to say without fear of successful contradiction that when the American people make up their minds that they want a thing the Congress will grant it to them as soon as it finds out that the people desire it. The Congress of the United States is the greatest legislative body in all history, and I take pride in that fact. Yet every evil-disposed person in the land can find some slander to utter about the American Congress. If the House takes time enough to discuss an important measure, these slanderers savagely assail it for being too slow. If the House puts in overtime and hurries a bill through, these same malignants fiercely denounce it for sending half-baked measures to the Senate. They revel in such foul work. For instance, the House was abused and denounced because we discussed for two days instead of one a bill providing for the issue of $7,000,000,000 in bonds—far and away the biggest money bill ever passed since the dawn of creation. Think of that—in two days! And then remember that all the property in America—real, personal, and mixed—was estimated at only $16,000,000,000 in 1861. I hope and pray that these impatient and palpitating superpatriots who belabored us for consuming two whole days in providing for seven billions of bonds will be equally impatient and anxious to get an opportunity to help pay them when due. It puzzled me a long time to find out why certain people who could pass a great tariff bill overnight or enact any other great measure while you wait did not get into Congress and do those things. Finally one of them came into my room one day and was intimating that we were a lot of chuckleheads, and I said to him, "It has always surprised me that men like you, who know everything, who can do everything without any consideration or deliberation, do not break into Congress and do it." He said, "Well, everybody does not want to come to Congress." I replied, "There are not 5,000 men in America who would not come to one House or the other of Congress if they could get here. I will tell you why you do not come into Congress. You do not come down here because you can not get votes enough."

No right-thinking man objects to fair, honest, intelligent criticism. That is wholesome and altogether proper, but abuse, ridicule, and slander are very different things from criticism and do immense damage, because they have a tendency to bring our whole system of representative government into disrepute, thereby sapping its very foundations.

At this very moment when the country is engaged in the most stupendous war in all the bloody annals of mankind the Congress is doing its duty—its whole duty—manfully, industriously, and patriotically to bring it to a speedy and triumphant conclusion—as all good citizens hope most fervently that it may be brought. Representatives and Senators not only vote unheard-of sums of money for the prosecution of the war, but to the limit of their financial ability they contribute to the cause by purchasing bonds to foot the bills. Representatives and Senators not only voted other men's sons into the Army, but they send their own sons to fight—perchance to die—for the starry banner of the Republic.

There is not even a shadow of doubt that the Congress will vote every man and every dollar needed in this titanic world struggle into which we have entered, for we have solemnly pledged all the immense and various resources of this puissant Nation in that behalf.

This is a fitting occasion to discuss fundamental principles briefly. How many new propositions do you suppose our system of Government rests on? Only three. There are two of them in the Declaration of Independence and one in the Constitution. "All men are created equal." That is one of them. "All governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." That is two, and they form the basis of republican institutions. The third one is—hardly anybody ever reads it, more's the pity—the preamble to the Constitution, one of the finest sentences ever written, and one of the most comprehensive:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

There it all is. That is our chart and our creed. What courtship is to marriage, what the flower is to the fruit, what youth is to manhood, what hope is to fruition, that is what the Declaration of Independence is to the Constitution of the United States. Since Washington on Yorktown's blood-stained heights made good Jefferson's declaration thrones have been crumbling, crowns have been tumbling, and dynasties have been fleeing for their lives.

When our fathers proclaimed this Republic at Philadelphia on the 4th day of July, 1776, there was only one other Republic in the wide, wide world—Switzerland—and the fathers were not certain that this one would live until Christmas. It was an even break whether it would or not. Now, thanks be to Almighty God, there are 27 Republics in this world. In a very large sense we made them, every one. Mark Twain, the greatest Missourian that ever lived and the greatest literary American that ever lived, once said: "Blessed be the man who bloweth his own horn, lest it be not blown."

That dictum of the great Missouri philosopher—for he was more philosopher than humorist—applies to nations as well as to individuals. We did it—not by the mailed hand, not by conquering armies. We did it by the wholesomeness of our example, by teaching all creation the glorious truth that men can govern themselves. Why, before that it was supposed that power descended from on high and lighted on the heads of a few tall men, and then a little of it trickled down to the great body of the people below. We reversed all that. We make it begin at the bottom and like the sap in the trees in the springtime go up, and it will go up forever.

Not a single one of these South American or Central American Republics could have existed six months if it had not been for us. Some of them can walk alone now, but in their infancy we protected them while they were learning to walk. We gave them a breathing spell in which to wax strong. We gave them a chance to live and to work out their own destiny. What did it? The Monroe doctrine. What is it? The simplest proposition ever put into print—that we would regard the establishment of its system of government by any European nation in this hemisphere as an unfriendly act. That was a modest declaration. We were a modest people then. We have outgrown our modesty, and the Monroe doctrine has grown with our growth and strengthened with our strength, until to-day it is this: That for political purposes we hereby take the entire Western Hemisphere under the shadow of our wing. That is the Monroe doctrine. We do not covet their territory or their land or anything else that is theirs. We propose that they shall be free, because we intend to remain free ourselves; and we bid them a hearty Godspeed in developing themselves into puissant republics.

Certain dilettante writers and speakers who say the Monroe doctrine is played out are mistaken. They do not know what they are talking about. We will strengthen it and preserve it. It is the political life preserver of the Western World. I like to say a good thing about a Republican when I can find one who deserves it. I love to think about what one Republican Secretary of State did under the Monroe doctrine, William H. Seward, a great man, governor of New York, Senator of the United States, and Secretary of State under Lincoln and Johnson, who came very near being President in 1860.

During our Civil War we did not have time to attend to anybody else's business. We had hardly enough to attend to our own.

Louis Napoleon, the nephew of his uncle, the Emperor of the French, the mightiest monarch then on earth, with his arms glittering from China to Peru, concluded it was a good time to smash the Monroe doctrine, sent over the Archduke Maximilian, set him up on a tinsel imperial throne, clapped a tinsel imperial crown on his head, and backed him up with 80,000 French bayonets under Marshal Bazaine. They were getting along tiptop until we made peace among ourselves. Immediately William H. Seward, Secretary of State, sent word to Louis Napoleon that it was high time to get out of Mexico, and not to stand on the order of his going—and he went like satan was after him.

That is what a Republican Secretary of State did. Nobody ever tried to violate the Monroe doctrine after that until Great Britain undertook to steal a piece of Venezuela, and Grover Cleveland shook his fist in the face of the British lion and forbade him to put his paw on Venezuela, and he kept it off. That is what a Democratic President did. From that day to this nobody has ever tried to infringe on the Monroe doctrine. Those are two of the proudest chapters in our history—one written by a Republican Secretary of State, the other by a Democratic President.

A great many people make a mistake as to where the line of demarcation is between a free country and a despotism. It is as plain as the nose on your face when once correctly stated. Most people think if there is a hereditary head to the government, it is necessarily a despotism; if there is an elective head, it is necessarily free. That has nothing in the world to do with it—not a thing. A country can be just as free with a hereditary head as it can be with an elective president, provided it has the right sort of constitution. I will tell you where the line of demarcation is. Any country that has a legislative body which controls the purse strings thereof is free, and if it has not it is not free. Out West where I live—I do not know whether it has percolated to the East or not—there is a homely saying that "Money makes the mare go."

Money also makes the Government go, and if the Congress should refuse to appropriate the money to run this Government it would stand stock-still at midnight on the 30th day of next June. Patriots would not run it, most of them, without pay. It makes no difference what we call it. We denominate our legislative body the Congress. When people get mad at the Congress and can not find anything else mean to say, they say we talk too much. Well, I used to be rather inclined to think sometimes that the Senate does talk too much, but I have somewhat changed my notion about that. There should be some place in this Government where a thing can be really and thoroughly and minutely discussed. Of course discussion and debate should not be extended so as to obstruct meritorious legislation which the people want. Those who growl about the Congress talking too much had better get out their dictionary and study it a little. What do you suppose the word "parliament" means in the dictionary sense? Whether we are enamored of the English or not, that is the oldest legislative body in the world. It literally means "a talking body." Bless your souls, that is what it was elected for—to talk; not to indulge in foolish talk, but to talk about the principles of government, the business of the country, and things like that. In France it is called the Assembly, in Germany the Reichstag, in Scandinavia the Storthing, and down in Bulgaria it is the Sobranje. In Russia, which is an inchoate Republic, they call it the Duma. The idea of representative government will grow and spread like the mustard tree of the Bible, until there will not be a monarch in any civilized country in God's footstool.

What a fine thing it is to be an American—how glorious, how inspiring!

Those of you who read the Holy Scriptures—and I hope you all do—remember that after Paul had been bound the chief captain ordered the centurion to take him away and scourge him. Paul executed a skillful flank move on him. Of course I am giving a free translation. I have always believed that Paul would have made one of the most masterful politicians and lawyers that ever lived. Paul said to the centurion who was about to scourge him, "Is it lawful to scourge a Roman citizen?" That question scared the centurion half to death. He rushed off to the chief captain as hard as he could clatter, and said, "You had better be careful; that man is a Roman citizen," which startled the chief captain greatly—startled him so that Paul was not scourged.

When that transaction took place Rome was mistress of the civilized world.

The power and dignity inherent in Roman citizenship were demonstrated by the terror which seized those who intended to scourge him before he invoked the protection of that citizenship.

It was a great boon to be a Roman citizen when Rome was in the plentitude of imperial power, but it is a far greater boon to be a plain American citizen, heir of all the ages.

Our mission in the world has been to vindicate by our practice and achievements our theory of "government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

On divers questions we are "distinct as the billows, yet we are one as the sea" when the honor, the safety, the prosperity, and the glory of the Republic are at stake.

We divide into parties on domestic issues, which is well, but our political contentions cease absolutely at low-water mark. Beyond that we are one people, with one heart, one soul, one hope, one country, one flag—ready, if needs be, to face a world in arms.

It is said that republics are ungrateful; but by erecting this magnificent memorial arch to Washington and his soldiers the Congress demonstrates to all the world that we hold in most grateful recollection the men who suffered and died here 139 years ago in order that our feeble infant Republic might live. How amazingly she has grown. God be praised! Grown from a narrow strip along the Atlantic to continental proportions. Grown from being the weakest among the nations into the richest and most powerful! The free institutions which have enabled us to grow into what we are we owe to Washington and the patriots of seventy-six. The spirit which animated them animates their descendants to-day, wherever Old Glory floats. They created this mighty Republic. Our most solemn duty, our profoundest pleasure, our highest ambition is to serve it faithfully and to transmit it unimpaired to our children and our children's children to the remotest generation.

And now, Gov. Brumbaugh, on behalf of the Government of the United States, I present through you as the chief magistrate of Pennsylvania to the old Keystone State this splendid memorial arch in honor of Washington and the men who made Valley Forge another shrine for freedom. May it, defying the corroding tooth of time, stand as a sign and token of our love and gratitude so long as the Schuylkill seeks the sea.

May the God of our fathers, the God who sustained Washington and his brave followers on a hundred fields of carnage and amid the horrors of Valley Forge, crowning them with complete victory at last, the God who guided the pen of Jefferson when writing the Declaration, the God who has showered his blessings upon us without stint, may He lead our feet in the paths of righteousness for the healing of the nations and the freedom of mankind even unto the uttermost ends of the earth.

ADDRESS OF GOV. MARTIN G. BRUMBAUGH AT NATIONAL ARCH PRESENTATION AT VALLEY FORGE, JUNE 19, 1917.

Ladies and gentlemen, in accepting for our great Commonwealth this national memorial, now formally transferred to our care and keeping by an eloquent and distinguished representative of our National Government, it is fitting that we should for a few moments consider the meaning of the action now taken and the significance of the purpose that has called us here.

One hundred and thirty-nine years ago, under the immortal Washington, there marched from this camp at Valley Forge not only an army that thereafter never knew defeat but also an ideal in government that is now about to become universal—the ideal that free men, enlightened and politically equal, shall determine their own destiny and not have it determined for them by others. Here huddled in cabins and lacking in every comfort that men cherish, naked, bleeding, and hungry, our forefathers displayed a fortitude unequaled and cherished an ideal which, under God, has found welcome in human hearts and in patriotic spirits in every clime and in every country.

The spirit of Valley Forge increasingly becomes the spirit of the human race. No ideal in government has had such speedy and widespread acceptance. No other spirit can now, in the dark days of the nations, be approvingly entertained by any nation. The spirit of Valley Force is with the allies in the western line; it is the breathing hope in Russia. It has asserted itself in Greece. It is brooding over China and has already quickened Japan and animates the peoples of the islands of the sea. It has remade South America and is the only hope of the central powers of Europe.

Pennsylvania early sensed the world meaning of Valley Forge and has taken adequate steps to preserve its soil and its meaning for all time. This arch is recognition of the Nation's concern that the world shall never forget what Valley Forge was, is, and forever shall be.

The fragmentary groups of Colonials that gathered here in 1777 had been defeated, disorganized, but not discouraged. They knew that life and liberty and the pursuit in peace of happy careers could be theirs only if successful. They willingly staked on the issue their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, and under effective leadership they were here molded into an efficient army and into a national spirit. The Constitution of the Union was born in the huts of Valley Forge.

Here America learned how sublime a thing it is to suffer and be strong. In the darkest hours of distress and disaster our forefathers endured Spartan like the rigors of an excessively severe winter and the daily menace of an arrogant, city-intrenched foe. They came from this winter of discontent a disciplined and hearted people, united in ideals, held together by common sacrifices, and bound by a common experience into a people of strength, courage, and resourcefulness.

Here America learned the generous good of sacrifice. When in the First Continental Congress news of the occupancy of Boston by the British forces was announced, one man embodying the very spirit of American liberty arose and modestly said:

I propose to equip at my own expense a regiment of troops and march at their head for the relief of Boston.

The speaker was the commander of this camp, George Washington. There is nowhere in the annals of men a finer expression of America's spirit of sacrifice. This country won the Revolutionary struggle and triumphed in 1812, 1847, 1862, 1898, and will again triumph because this is the spirit of Valley Forge, the national ideal.

When our citizens were menaced on the high seas by an arrogant monarchy and the property and lives of American citizens in defiance of all humanitarian codes were ruthlessly sacrificed the hurt was felt in the heart of every American. We have answered by declaring war against this ruthless despoiler. We have registered upward of 10,000,000 of men, ready to make the Washingtonian sacrifice to defend our national honor and to keep our spotless record unsullied. We have given by law $7,000,000,000 of our money and have overoffered in cash $2,000,000,000 of it that this wrong may be righted and that the spirit of Valley Forge may be vindicated on the battle plains of the world. We are now giving gladly $100,000,000 to the American National Red Cross as an added earnest of our high purpose. We have fed the hungry. We have ministered to the suffering. We have financed the needy. We have counseled the courageous. We have aided the oppressed, and we are opposing the oppressor and our lives, our property, and our sacred honor are again freely given that the spirit of Valley Forge may be not only our animating spirit but the accepted guidance and inspiration of all men in all countries from this time on.

We have learned the value of federated democracy and of a united and inseparable Nation. When a Pennsylvanian, in 1754, called the delegates of the English Colonies to Albany for federation and for peace treaties with the Indians, he planted the seeds of American union. When, as a result, these same Colonies by duly designated delegates met in Carpenter's Hall, and subsequently in Independence Hall, this national ideal began to mature. When Washington at Valley Forge molded the unrelated groups of colonial troops into one great national body, the Constitution was determined, and the Union of States established forever. Valley Forge was the crowning event in these marvelously interesting and significant steps by which this Nation emerged into the light, set up regulated liberty under democracy as the guide and goal of mankind, and moved triumphantly forward as the color bearer of all oppressed and discouraged peoples.

Into this great Republic have come from all the world those that hungered to eat of the bread of true national life, and that thirsted to drink of the fountains of liberty and equality. We have welcomed them and given them home and haven. We ask only that they behave themselves seemly and give, as did those of Valley Forge, unstinted and unflinching fealty to our flag and our fortunes. To do less is traitorous; to do more is impossible; to do as much is just and proper. We ask our people, native born and foreign born, to follow the example of the Constitutional Army that 139 years ago marched from the hills of Valley Forge to a destiny immortal.

This enduring arch is not as enduring as the spirit of Valley Forge, but while it lasts, under the care and keeping of this great Commonwealth, we shall cherish it, guard it, honor it, as fitting emblem of this vastly more enduring arch of human liberty whose foundations are set in the soil of suffering at Valley Forge and whose summit crowns the hills of Valley Forge.

This is Pennsylvania. She has ever led in all that national enterprise commands, and she to-day accepts this memorial as a new pledge of national fealty and world-wide democracy. Where stand Valley Forge and Pennsylvania, there stand the hopes, the aspirations, the glories of the humankind.

National Association of Owners of Railroad Securities.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM SCHLEY HOWARD,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 20, 1917.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave so generously granted me by the House, I desire to call the attention of my colleagues and the country to the argument of Hon. S. Davies Warfield, of Baltimore, recently made before the Interstate Commerce Commission in behalf of the National Association of Owners of Railroad Securities.

I feel sure that this argument presents an entirely new phase to the question of rate making by our great railroad corporations, and will prove illuminating to those of us who have but little time to devote to such a complex question.

ARGUMENT BY S. DAVIES WARFIELD.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the commission, I am here to plead the cause of 50,000,000 of the people of the country, eight-tenths of whom are not yet fully aroused to their large proportionate ownership in the railroads of the country. Thirty-three million owners of life insurance policies alone are greatly concerned in your decision of the questions now before you, and to the extent that an adverse decision will affect the provision they have made for those who are to come after them, in many cases their all, and available only when those making such provision shall have passed away.

Never before in the 29 years which mark the life of your honorable commission, and this will be recalled by one of your body who, during all these years, has honorably sat as a commissioner, has this great ownership—this great silent power—come before you collectively to plead for protection at your hands. They have no voice in the management of the railroads of which they are part owners, such as stockholders have through their directors—they have never had a voice. They represent three-fifths, nearly eleven billions of the seventeen billions of capital of the railroads, and which up to Friday last had never been heard. They are therefore peculiarly dependent upon you, gentlemen of the commission, as their only protection. During all these years while the demagogue has made frequent appearance throughout the country or before you, claiming to represent the people, they have patiently and silently waited, until now, brought face to face with a crisis, they have become aware of the strength of their position and resolved to organize for mutual protection. I have therefore hurriedly come before you, our counsel, Mr. Hagerman, being compelled to leave the city, to represent these people and I feel keenly the responsibility of this action, fearing I may overstep the bounds of legal propriety upon such an occasion, for I am not a lawyer, and until Friday last had never appeared before your honorable body. My good faith in this movement having been then apparently questioned by one of the counsel of opposing interests, and not having opportunity to make as full an argument as was necessary to state my position, which is the position of those composing the association of which I am president, in defense of that position, I determined to appear here to-day.

You have heard the testimony of Mr. Kingsley, filed with you, giving the conditions surrounding the investments of life insurance companies in the bonds of the carriers, amounting to $1,461,000,000, and owned by 33,000,000 people; you have heard the testimony of Mr. Schenck, filed with you, giving the conditions surrounding the investments of savings banks in the bonds of the carriers amounting to $847,000,000, owned by 10,000,000 depositors; you have heard the testimony of Mr. Maddox and Mr. Oldham, filed with you, representing 6,000,000 people additional owning directly or indirectly $865,000,000, and $350,000,000 belonging to charitable and benevolent institutions, schools, and colleges, invested in the securities of the carriers; by private investors and trustees of estates, amounting to $10,000,000,000; by fire, marine, and surety companies, $649,000,000; you also have filed with you what the gentlemen appearing before you testified as their belief to be the margin of safety and regarded as a dead line beyond which trustees handling large sums of money do not consider it safe for them to continue to invest the funds they represent in the bonds and other securities of the railroads.

This margin of safety, it has been shown is largely regulated by legal requirements in the several States. In Massachusetts a savings bank is not permitted by statute to buy the bonds of railroads which have not declared and paid dividends on their stock for 10 years prior to such purchase, and in New York this provision requires that dividends shall have been paid 5 years before such bonds can be purchased by savings banks.

You have also filed with you the evidence that these great sources of money supply to the railroads have been shut off from the purchase of the junior securities of the carriers. You know too well the great necessity of carriers being able to finance themselves, or partly finance themselves, on junior securities and thus limit their fixed charges so that a safe margin can be maintained in years of low net earnings such as the year 1917–18 has been here represented will produce if no relief is given. A carrier not only, therefore, requires that a margin of safety in net earnings must be established if the bonds issued under mortgages on property are to be so established as will enable life insurance companies and savings banks, especially, to continue to hold them as investments for their policyholders and depositors; but if these two great classes of mutual institutions, owned not by stockholders but by the policyholders themselves and by the depositors themselves (43,000,000 people less 2,000,000 depositors in nonmutual banks) bound together for mutual protection, are to continue to invest in the bonds of the carriers of the country, this margin must be provided. But aside from the statutory requirement as to the bonds, what chance has a carrier to ever sell junior securities such as second-mortgage bonds or preferred or common stock, so necessary, as already stated, if protection is not given net earnings in such margin of safety as will, at least, in normal years be some guaranty of interest or dividends on such issues of junior securities?

Has your honorable commission considered the saving which would result and which in time would be reflected in lower rates by the carriers if their securities were once stabilized and put on so firm a basis that they would be generally recognized as a permanently safe investment? The carriers would then secure money for their legitimate purposes at lower interest rates, with lower freight rates incident thereto. So that if the carriers are permitted to raise their rates at this period, when shippers are securing more in the aggregate for their products (unregulated as to prices) than ever before, this indication alone of your desire to cooperate with the real owners of these carriers, whom I represent before you, would contribute greatly to a feeling of security on their part incalculable in effect. Consider what this means in the establishment of the credit of the carriers and its consequent reflection in the credit of every business enterprise. The good would permeate through every sphere of business activity. You have within your power the greatest and most far-reaching element of strength lying in the grasp of any agency of Government and capable of being exercised at this time of our country's stress, and when patriotism is fastening itself amongst us as never before in our history. Your decision now will have a most important bearing on the ability of our people to subscribe to the liberty loans of our Government, not only the present loan but those to come. Indeed, it becomes a serious problem—the placing of future Government loans—if the credit structure of the country is seriously disturbed, as I believe will result if the relief such a great number of our people now pray at your hands should be denied them.

The credit of the carriers of the country, representing the greatest total aggregation of capital of any enterprise in the world, once shaken at a period of unrest like this time of war, when all the foreign governments have found it necessary to stabilize credit, the British Government going to the extent of actually guaranteeing the earnings of its railroads to be equal to those of the year just prior to the war, must necessarily seriously threaten the credit structure of the entire country.

And what is the relief which I understand to be now asked of your honorable commission? An amount which in the aggregate is represented to be less than will be required to be paid out in their operations by all the carriers for equipment, fuel, materials, supplies, and for labor this year by reason of the increased prices alone over those paid last year. This would seem to be a reasonable request, the permission of the exercise of the inherent right of self-preservation—to get back when the margin of safety is already slim, from those who conduct their own affairs without regulation and are controlled only by the law of supply and demand, 75 or 80 per cent of every additional dollar required to be paid out under conditions for which the carriers are in no way responsible. The woeful lack of facilities and equipment on the part of the carriers and the effect of these conditions on business is a well-established fact. Certainly it must be to the interest of all business enterprise to permit this to be corrected. Business is affected adversely in proportion as the carriers of the country are prevented from effectively conducting their operations. Agricultural development and the development and opening up of our millions of acres of unused lands, particularly in our great southern country, so necessary to feed our allies and ourselves, can not be advanced when the growth of the carriers is prohibited. We would not be here did the seriousness of the outlook not justify it. Present conditions threaten us. And before it would be possible to again appear before your honorable commission, before the machinery could be put in motion under the law and the rules, before hearings before you could be completed and your decision reached, the carriers will have further passed into the period of extraordinary and unprecedented expenditures, and which has been represented here, and the credit structure will have been shaken. It is this which has prompted us to come together that we may collectively appeal to you.

That the great channels of money supply, upon which the carriers must so largely depend, already doubtful of the stability of the securities of the carriers, may not be closed or partly closed, which affects not only the securities of carriers now outstanding but the free use of such channels in the future, we ask that due consideration be given the position of those I represent in arriving at the decision you will reach in the present crisis.

Herbert C. Hoover.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JEFF: McLEMORE,
OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 21, 1917.

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a copy of a letter I have received from the Merchants' Association of New York, with offices at 233 Broadway, Woolworth Building, stating who and what Mr. Herbert C. Hoover is. The letter is in reply to one I wrote the association after I had received from the association a set of resolutions, adopted at one of its meetings, urging me to support the food-control bill and indorsing Mr. Hoover as the proper man to administer the department of food control. The letter from the Merchants' Association of New York is as follows:

NEW YORK, May 29, 1917.

HON. JEFF: MCLEMORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Permit us to thank you for your favor of May 26, in which you make inquiry concerning Mr. Herbert C. Hoover.

While we understand that Mr. Hoover is a man of considerable wealth, we have no knowledge of his having made his money in Wall Street. We understand he is a mining engineer; that he worked his way through the School of Mines at Stanford University, then went to Australia, from which country in four years he was called by the Chinese Government to take charge of its bureau of mines.

After a year in that position we are informed that he became manager of mining properties of a Belgian corporation in China, and a year later, because of his great success, was made a partner in a large British mining firm.

His remarkable success in conducting relief work in Belgium stamps him as a man of ability and gives him an experience which seems pre-eminently to qualify him to take charge of our food problem in this country

Yours, very truly,

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
By S. C. MEAD, Secretary.

The Coal Situation in Michigan.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PATRICK H. KELLEY,
OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 22, 1917.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the privilege given by unanimous consent of the House, I reproduce from the Detroit News, of June 11, 12, and 13, 1917, a series of special articles by Mr. James Sweinhart relative to the coal situation in Michigan, as follows:

COAL AT $20 A TON SEEN BY DEALERS—FUEL FAMINE FACING CITY—UNITED STATES RAIL AND MINE CONTROL DECLARED ONLY REMEDY—GREED OF TRADERS FORCING UP PRICES.

[This is a series calculated to give to readers a succinct but comprehensive and accurate survey of the coal situation.

To rich and poor alike the problem of filling the bins with the coal is increasingly serious. It is a problem which, directly or indirectly, touches every man, woman, and child in the city.

With this idea in mind, the News has taken considerable time and gone to some pains and expense to study the whole situation and find out just why coal is so scarce, just why it costs so much.

There is a great deal more to the coal problem than ordering a winter's supply of the local dealer. Beyond the dealer's yard are causes and influences seldom seen or considered by the man whose business does not bring him in touch with them—economic causes, intricate in their operation, far-reaching in their extent, and all-powerful in their control. The householder, the man in the street, everybody who has to pay a coal bill should know about these causes and influences.

It is with the intent that every person in Detroit may have opportunity to know these facts that this series is written.]

[By James Sweinhart.]

No one can mention the coal situation in the street these days without bringing forth from his companion these two questions:

"Is there going to be a scarcity of coal this winter?"

"Is the price going to be higher than last year?"

The answer to both questions is:

"Yes."

There is just one thing that can change conditions and make abundant coal at lower prices.

That is governmental supervision of the coal mines and the railroads.

Every element in the present situation indicates coal will be more scarce and sell for higher prices in Detroit during the coming winter than it ever has before in this generation.

Mines are not putting out their normal production. Railroads are short of cars and are not transporting rapidly the coal that is mined. Here and there are evidences that brokers are hoarding what coal they can get, but this condition is not general. The larger coal yards, the railroads, the big industries—especially the public utilities—which at this time of the year usually have enormous supplies of coal stored against the coming winter, have but two or three days' margin.

DEALERS ACTIVE.

And all along the line, the mine operator, the broker, the dealer, seem to have come to a common determination to make hay while the sun shines, and are adding on to the price of coal two and three times the amount which before the war they considered a good profit.

In some cases this is done openly, as will be told later. In others it is done by indirect and covert means, such as selling through subsidiary sales companies and getting an additional profit on the sale; buying long ton and selling short, leaving the public with the impression that the dealer has had to pay the short-ton price; using the reconsignment privilege of railroads to keep the coal moving around at little expense until some manufacturer in desperation offers a premium price.

Estimates, now, as to what prices will be asked for coal next winter are futile.

Anthracite coal—the hard coal generally used for home furnaces—is fast becoming a luxury. Compared to the soft coal fields, the anthracite fields are very small. They are all in Pennsylvania. The ordinary output is between 80,000,000 and 90,000,000 tons a year. Production so far this year is not only under normal, but shipments of what there is is unprecedentedly slow and uncertain. Coal dealers predict that anthracite will soon disappear from all markets west of Buffalo.

ORDERS REFUSED.

As an example of the demands for anthracite, W. B. Palmer, local manager for the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Coal Co., one of the largest anthracite dealers, is turning away orders. He says he has sold all the anthracite he can handle up to April, next year.

This condition seems general. Inquiry at all the larger coal yards shows they have been unable to make the usual storages put in at this time of the year and, when winter comes, there will be no surplus to draw from.

Bituminous coal, for manufacturing and railroad purposes, is more in abundance. But conditions are anything but satisfactory. The situation the railroads have to meet is indicative. Usually, at this time, the Michigan Central is well advanced in storing its winter coal supply—about 1,000,000 tons. At present it has about 60,000 tons on hand.

The Pere Marquette, last August, contracted for its coal for next winter at $1.10 a ton. Up to date the mines are more than 500,000 tons short of the contract schedule. The railroad has been compelled to go out and buy coal in the open market, paying $4.25, nearly four times its contract price. At present it has about two days' supply on hand, a condition which every railroad man knows is extremely serious.

LITTLE RELIEF SEEN.

Dealers throughout the city give no promise as to future deliveries of anthracite. They are willing to take orders for most any number of tons, but they refuse to set a date for delivery or fix a price per ton. A ton at a time can generally be bought for immediate delivery and some are taking advantage of this to get their winter's coal gradually.

This situation has already reflected itself in rentals. Last winter there was a great skurrying for apartment houses and family hotels where heat is furnished. But this year tenants, when they come to sign their leases, will find therein a clause which says that in case the landlord is unable to furnish heat that fact shall not make the lease void, but in lieu of the heat the landlord shall remit a certain percentage of the rent.

W. B. Palmer, mentioned above, says anthracite will simply not be in the market in Detroit this winter and that soft coal may go to $13 or $14 a ton.

Walter Brooks, of Jewett, Bigelow & Brooks, who deal only in Pocahontas coal, say that it will go above $12 and probably stay there throughout the winter.

$20 PRICE PREDICTED.

An agent of the Berwind White Coal Co., one of the largest operators, predicts that the war, freight congestion, and inability of the railroads to handle coal will shove the price of anthracite to $20 and soft coal to $18.

A few years ago we were paying $6.50 for hard coal and $5.50 for soft. To-day hard coal sells for from $9 to $9.25 and soft from $8 to $8.50.

What is the reason?

There are a great many of them. One of them is that the mine operators after years and years of small profits, when coal glutted the market, suddenly found themselves face to face with a demand which they never had anticipated, which was far beyond anything they had ever dreamed of or hoped for, and being human they propose to make the most of it and "get theirs while the getting is good."

This phase of the situation will be discussed in detail to-morrow.

WAR BRINGS WEALTH TO COAL MEN—MARKET, ONCE GLUTTED, IS DRAINED AND DEMAND NOW EXCEEDS SUPPLY—MANY SCHEMES LAID TO FORCE UP PRICES.

[By James Sweinhart.]

There are two causes behind the present high prices of coal.

One is the tendency of mine operators and coal dealers to make up for many lean years by obtaining profits far in excess of what used to be considered a fair profit.

The other is the scarcity of coal, due almost entirely to shortage of railroad cars, which forces the consumer, out of sheer necessity, to pay whatever price is asked.

To understand what profits are now being made, one must know something of the coal market in years gone by, and of the cost of coal production.

MARKET WAS GLUTTED.

For years prior to 1915 the coal industry, both anthracite and bituminous, suffered from chronic overproduction. The output was stimulated not only by a steady demand but, of late years, labor troubles, an inherent unsteadiness of mine labor, and raises in wages forced by a powerful and arbitrary union reduced net profits on the standard prices for coal then existing to such a minimum that the operators all over the country were forced to an ever-increasing production to even pay interest on capital invested. The result was that for the decade the coal market was glutted and the problem was to get rid of the stuff, rather than to fill the demand.

August 1, 1914, saw the beginning of the great war. The economic effect on the United States was an immense stimulation in all kinds of manufacture whose product the war would consume, such as munitions and foodstuffs, and the springing up of thousands of new industries to meet the demands of home and foreign markets formerly supplied by England, Germany, Austria, and France.

This in turn produced an immense increase in freight and steamship traffic. There were not half enough locomotives to haul the war products to the seaboard, and those on hand were kept working night and day. Then, too, the warring countries either denied access to their own mines or, demanding more than they themselves could supply, came to America and bought everything in sight.

The result was that the United States experienced a consumption of coal such as the world never saw. By June 1, 1915, the accumulated surpluses of years had been consumed and the market began to tighten. For the first time in years there were clamorings for coal, a demand that ran apace and then outstripped the supply.

PREMIUMS OFFERED.

Be it said to the credit of the operators, the first increases in the price of coal were economically sound. The demand exceeded the supply, a situation which will boost the price of any commodity. Munition manufacturers, with prodigious contracts to get out at prodigious profits, offered premiums for coal and ready shipment. In time they were bidding against each other for the stuff, and the effect was to increase the price of coal generally in leaps and bounds. The coal operators, much to their surprise and delight, suddenly found themselves face to face with a situation where the increased prices of their commodity far outran advances in wages and all other costs of production.

In less than a year the whole economic position of the industry underwent a tremendous change. The new energy experienced in moderate degree in 1915 continued and grew. Toward the close of 1916 the mines were utterly unable to keep pace with the demand. By the first of the year sensational prices were being paid, and 1917 opened with the prospect of profits never dreamed of.

The operators have not been at all backward in taking advantage of the demand. In the old days, when the market was glutted, 25 to 50 cents a ton net profit was considered very good business; 75 cents a ton was a handsome profit; $1 a ton quite unheard of.

PROFITS ARE BIG.

But to-day the operators force from a public, which must buy or freeze, profits of from $1.50 to $2 a ton.

Here are some figures on the cost of coal and profits made by those who handle it.

Anthracite—the hard coal burned in house furnaces—can be mined for approximately $2 a ton. This figure, including labor, machine expense, interest charges, and all other items figuring in the production of the coal and putting it in a coal car at the mouth of the mine is given by the United States Bureau of Mines.

To this figure the coal-mine operator adds a profit varying from $2.10 to $2.45. The prices of the several sizes of hard coal at the mine now are: Egg, $4.10; stove, $4.35; chestnut, $4.45.

The total freight charge on a ton of coal from the hard coal fields—say Scranton, Pa.—to Detroit, with the car put on a siding for teaming, is $3 a ton. That brings the cost of the several sizes of coal at Detroit to: Egg, $7.10; stove, $7.35; and chestnut, $7.45.

SOFT COAL COSTS LESS.

Large dealers, using big motor trucks and other modern equipment, can handle coal for about 50 cents a ton; that is, deliver it from the cars to homes. That brings the cost of the several sizes to: Egg, $7.60; stove, $7.85; chestnut, $7.95 per ton.

To-day's hard-coal prices are: Egg, $9; stove, $9.25; chestnut, $9.25. That leaves a profit for the local dealer on each ton of hard coal delivered at the curb in front of your house as follows: Profit on egg, $1.40 a ton; on stove, $1.40 a ton; on chestnut, $1.30 a ton. And if the dealer carries the coal in to your cellar bin he charges you 35 cents a ton more.

Now, turn to soft coal. Because of simpler and easier methods of mining soft-coal production is much less expensive. According to the United States Bureau of Mines the cost of turning out a ton of soft coal into a car at the mouth of the mine, all overhead charges having been added, is approximately $1.60.

To this figure the operator adds a profit for his own pocket of about $2.90 a ton. Soft-coal prices at the mine are hovering about $4.50 a ton.

EASIER MINED.

Because soft coal is easier and less expensive to handle in transit the freight charges are less. The Michigan Central freight-rate agent says the freight charge from the West Virginia and Kentucky soft-coal fields to Detroit is $1.60 a ton.

That makes the cost of the coal in Detroit $6.10 a ton.

It will cost 50 cents a ton more for distribution—that is, delivery to the manufacturers buying it—which boosts the price to $6.60 a ton.

The better grades of soft coal are selling to-day for $8 a ton. That leave a profit of $1.40 a ton for the local dealer.

But, substantial as these profits are, the mine operators are not satisfied. They have other ways of making profits on coal—or, at least, hogging all the profits—by manipulating the sales.

Ninety per cent of the hard coal is mined by companies owned by five big eastern railroads—the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, the Delaware & Hudson, the Lehigh Valley, the Erie, and the Reading. Between what these roads get in profits and freight charges per ton the earnings of the roads from their mines are enormous.

Take the Lehigh Valley, for example. The Lehigh Valley Railroad owns the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., which operates a series of mines. In 1912 the Lehigh Valley Railroad organized the Lehigh Valley Coal Sales Co., owning all its capital stock. The Lehigh Valley Coal Sales Co. takes all the coal put out by the mines of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. So, on every movement of every ton of coal from the Lehigh Valley fields, the Lehigh Valley Railroad gets a profit.

DIVIDENDS MOUNT UP.

When the coal company mines a ton of coal and sells it to the coal sales company, it makes a profit which goes into the yearly dividends to be paid to the railroad company. The sales company sells to distant jobbers and retailers, making another profit, which is turned over to the railroad at the end of the year. And, of course, every time the ton is moved it goes over the Lehigh Valley's lines at fat freight rates.

The Wall Street Journal and other financial papers recently reported a financial melon—soon to be cut open for Lehigh Valley Coal Sales stockholders—which, of course, is the Lehigh Valley Railroad. On July 14 next a cash dividend of 30 per cent will be paid.

There is another little point about the anthracite business which the man in the street doesn't generally know. The coal dealer tells him that anthracite costs $4.40 a ton at the mine. Very true, but the dealer doesn't tell him that that is a gross ton. The ton which the coal dealer buys weighs 2,240 pounds. The ton he sells to the householder weighs 2,000 pounds.

There's a fat little profit in that fact alone—and the public should not be misled by the two different weights.

The coal broker—especially the coal broker just starting in business who wishes to get rich quick—has a little device for profit making all his own. It is known as the railroad reconsignment privilege.

BROKERS ACTIVE.

A broker, say, orders 100 cars of coal from Virginia and gets a through freight rate on the shipment—usually considerably less than the local rate. The coal arrives in Detroit. The broker has 48 hours to unload before the railroad will begin charging demurrage. But the market isn't right; it looks as if it will be higher in a few days; the broker doesn't want to sell right away. He has the privilege of reconsigning, and, just before his 48 hours of grace are up, he does so, say, to himself, at Flint. And he gets the same through rate on this also.

The coal goes to Flint. Again the broker has 48 hours to unload before demurrage is charged. But still the market isn't right. He doesn't yet want to sell. So, just before his 48 hours expire, he reconsigns again from Flint—this time, say, to Laporte, Ind., for he wants considerable time. By the time it goes to Laporte and waits 48 hours some Detroit manufacturer is found in sufficiently desperate straits to pay a handsome premium. Whereupon the broker wires to Laporte to rush the coal back to Detroit, and it is then dumped in the manufacturer's yards at, perhaps, three times a normal profit.

Charles S. Cunningham, railroad commissioner, says that 80 per cent of the difficulty in getting coal in Detroit is caused by this abuse of the reconsigning privilege, as practiced by Detroit brokers who have gone into the business without sufficient capital to have yards and terminals, and make the railroads and their cars serve for storage while they wait for a favorable market.

RAILROADS BLAMED FOR COAL CRISIS—CAN'T SUPPLY ENOUGH CARS TO HAUL FUEL, FORCING MINE CLOSING—DEALERS ARE MONTHS BEHIND IN ORDERS.

[By James Sweinhart.]

There is just one reason why the coal-mine operators can force their high prices onto the dealers, and why the dealers, in turn, can force them onto the public in Detroit and elsewhere.

It is this: The supply of coal being produced in this country does not come anywhere near meeting the demand.

If the consumer, individually or collectively, refuses to pay the prices now being asked, that does not worry either the dealer or the mine operator in the least. Both are months behind in their orders. Most of them are refusing to take orders at all. If the consumer will not buy now—well, he will have to when cold weather comes, and at a still higher price.

In Detroit here there never has been a time before—not even in the days of the great coal strike of 1903—when there was so little coal on hand at this time of the year.

Usually, as soon as hot weather comes and the demand for household coal ceases, the dealers lay in a surplus supply against the coming winter. This summer they have been unable to do this. The shortage of coal is so acute that, even with the household demand eliminated, the coal is bought for industrial use before it leaves the cars. And many of the great plants are running only on what they can get from day to day.

Failure to get coal for five days would close hundreds of plants in Detroit and stop every train of the Pere Marquette Railroad.

LACK OF CARS FOR HAULING.

The cause of this scarcity lies in the transportation situation—a shortage of cars to carry the coal.

There are not only not enough coal-carrying cars, but there is mismanagement of the use of the cars on hand by both railroads and shippers.

And this condition is confronted by a shipping demand five times as great as the railroads of the United States have ever been asked to meet before, brought on by the prodigious expansion of industry, due to America's entrance into the war.

To understand the situation one must not look at it too narrowly. This condition is not local; it besets the entire country. And for its causes one must look to bygone years.

In the upstart of industries that followed the Civil War, the supreme need of the country for its development was railroads. Private capital lent itself readily to all sorts of railroad enterprises, and where private capital was lacking the Government, State and Federal, subsidized construction. First there followed a period of railroad chaos, during which there was the wildest kind of exploitation, but gradually consolidation and organization set in and the great systems began to develop.

WHEN THEY DOMINATED.

With the great systems came a breed of dynamic railroad giants—Huntington, Hill, Harriman, Vanderbilt, Cassatt, and a host of others—of vision so big, of ambitions of railroad empire so vast and of force of character so dominant that Government officials, State and Federal, were as mere pawns, which they used at will to accomplish their desires.

There came a period when the Government was the railroads. The elder Vanderbilt voiced the attitude of all the railroad kings when, in a fit of temper, he exclaimed, "The public be damned!" And, in their belief that their supremacy was everlasting, the railroads ran things with the ruthlessness of feudal barons.

But presently the public wearied of being imposed on. Its long-suffering patience gave way to an indignation which spread countrywide and rapidly removed from office every man suspected of being under railroad control. The pendulum swung the other way. Antirailroad legislation blossomed in every State and regulation was the word of the hour.

The final blow to railroad ambition came when the Government took over the rate-making power. In the days of exploitation the railroads generally were used as financial balloons by the adventurers behind them and were blown full of purely gaseous values.

SOLD FAKE BONDS.

A classic example was that of certain officers of the Erie, who, needing money, put out a fake issue of bonds which had never had the knowledge or consent of the stockholders.

Stock was issued far beyond the value of the roads. To meet interest on bonds and pay dividends the roads had made rates to suit themselves. In territory where a road had a monopoly its tariffs were nothing short of robbery. In cases where competition loomed they resorted to secret rebates and other practices to get business. But when the Government instituted rate regulation all this passed. The necessity of meeting interest on the obligations of the past came as a terrible legacy to railroad managers. For the last 15 years the railroads have been hard put to get enough out of their Government-regulated rates to meet the increased cost of railroading, pay interest on inflated stock, and show a profit.

On January 1, 1917, the country faced the solemn and astounding fact that 54 per cent of all railroads in the United States were in bankruptcy.

BOTH SIDES WOUNDED.

The public, in the last 20 years, has been evening the score for the generation of arbitrary railroad rule preceding. But it has also been hurting the country. For see the position of the average railroad manager.

On the one side the Government fixed the income of the road. On the other the stockholders demanded dividends. Despite rising costs the public refused to advance rates. There came a time when the earnings of the road would just pay dividends. The railroad manager had to choose between paying dividends and buying new equipment—including coal cars—which the road needed for development. But if he failed to pay dividends, he would lose his job. And he did the perfectly human thing—he paid dividends and the new cars were not bought.

That brings us down to the present day, when the railroads of the United States haven't half the cars needed for the development of the country—and at the same time, a need far exceeding any crisis ever met before.

And not only does the car shortage hold up transportation of coal already mined—it retards production.

NO STORAGE FACILITIES.

There are no facilities for storing coal in the mines. The labor charges involved in storing it at the mouth of the mine would almost double its cost and make outside storing prohibitive. The situation is met by building tracks to the mouth of the mine so that when the coal comes down the chutes from the elevators it dumps directly into empty cars.

That fact is very important, because, when the railroads do not supply cars, there being no place to store coal, the mine shuts down and production is held up. To-day, in the coal fields, thousands of miners are up and breakfasted at 6.30 a. m., waiting to hear the whistle at the mine. If it blows one long blast, that means "Come to work; we've got cars." If it blows two short blasts, that means "Don't come to work. Mine won't run. No cars have come in during the night."

PRODUCTION ONLY HALF.

One of the largest coal producers in the Virginia fields opened his books to me. They showed that, for the last six months, mines that could fill from 30 to 45 cars a day had been getting from 1 to 18 cars a day; that in that time the mines had been worked an average of but four days out of a possible six, and then only to about half their capacity.

This uncertainty of work has a still further deterrent effect on production. The labor situation in the mining fields has been acute for years. Good, steady miners are scarce. The European war made them doubly so. The opening up of munition plants, with demand for all kinds of labor at unheard of wages, offered steady employment to the miners who, because of car shortage, could work but two and three days a week. Thousands of them went into the munition plants to stay, and the mine operators now find themselves short of labor, even when they can get the cars to load.

NEW PROBLEM ARISES.

Now, on top of this acute car shortage, comes a demand for a vast transportation of troops and war supplies. This demand the country did not have to meet last year.

Some idea of what this means in the tying up of cars may be had from a report made to the War Department by Lieut. Col. Chauncey B. Baker, the Government's expert on military transportation. One United States field army is composed of 80,000 men—three Infantry and one Cavalry divisions—and the auxiliary troops supporting them, such as the commissary and hospital units.

Lieut. Col. Baker reported that to transport such an army to the coast would require 6,229 cars, made up into 336 trains, which, of course, would require 336 locomotives. Of this total, 2,115 would be passenger cars, 385 baggage cars, 1,055 box cars, 1,899 stock cars, and 775 flat cars.

That means seven-tenths of 1 per cent of all the locomotives owned by all railroads in the United States, 4 per cent of all passenger cars, and two-tenths of 1 per cent of all freight cars.

That was for one field army of 80,000 men; to get the amount required for 1,000,000 men multiply each item by 12½.

And the Government is planning in the next year to recruit and send abroad 4,000,000 men.

FALSE NOTE OF HOPE.

The man who tells you that the car situation is going to ease off, and that there will be plenty of coal in Detroit at a lower market within a few weeks is doing so for his own mercenary reasons.

The Government itself has ordered 7,000,000 tons of coal distributed along the Atlantic seaboard for use of the Atlantic Fleet. Government orders are always filled first—what tens of thousands of coal cars that order alone will tie up!

The coal shortage in Michigan could be eased somewhat by a more intelligent use of cars now on hand.

Tuesday the abuse of the reconsignment privilege was explained in detail. That privilege should be suspended temporarily and brokers compelled to take the coal from the cars as soon as it is delivered in Detroit, thus releasing the cars for other shipments.

Again, coal cars should be restricted to coal carrying. So scarce have all kinds of cars been in Detroit that some of the railroads, hounded by automobile manufacturers for cars, have taken coal cars coming from the south, loaded them with automobiles, and sent them even as far away as the Pacific coast. When the cars get back to the coal fields again, for use in another coal shipment, only Providence knows.

WON'T BRING COAL HERE.

Because of this practice and the practice of brokers with small capital making the railroad tracks their storage yards, the Louisville & Nashville, one of the largest coal-carrying roads of the South, recently established an embargo against Michigan. That is, it refused to ship coal into this State.

The railroad commission undertook to find out why, and in a letter to Commissioner Charles S. Cunningham, on May 10, C. E. Evans, vice president of the Louisville & Nashville wrote that on that day there were in Michigan 3,661 Louisville & Nashville cars that had been held more than 30 days—for the most part unnecessarily. That is 16.7 per cent of all the cars the Louisville & Nashville owns.

In such a situation not only the public but the railroads as well would welcome supervision by the Government. Then railroad managers would have something more than a request or demurrage tax to compel consignees to unload cars.

National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Associations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JEFF: McLEMORE,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 22, 1917.

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this most drastic measure in its present form, and if there were no other reasons for my opposition, the ones given by the National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Associations would be more than sufficient. Those reasons were embodied in a plea recently issued by the National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Associations, and reads as follows:

DON'T TIE OUR HANDS.

We, the organized farmers of the grain belt, a half a million strong, claim to be as patriotic, as courageous, and as ready to sacrifice our sons, pour out our last drop of blood in defense of "liberty and humanity" as any like army of our fellow citizens, but in fairness to the land we love and the country we have had a large part in building, we plead for fair treatment and a square deal RIGHT NOW.

If in the judgment of our National Congress it shall be necessary here and now to fix the price on food, which is the sole produce of our farms—we have no by products, no side lines—so as to limit our profits and net returns in behalf of the Nation, then we submit that mere and simple justice demand that prices on all other commodities and products produced or distributed by our fellow countrymen shall be fixed in the same way and at the same time.

Be assured that in our effort to increase our acreage we have purchased feed, seed, machinery, and necessary farm supplies at an increase in prices of from 100 to 1,000 per cent. For example, plow shovels which cost $2.50 before the war now cost $7; cultivators which sold at $28 before now sell at $56.; binder twine which sold at 8 cents before now sells at 18 cents; potash has advanced 600 per cent, fencing 100 per cent, wagons 30 per cent, prepared feeds 200 per cent, tankage 100 per cent. The price for labor advances with the high prices already being offered by all other lines of industry.

We must meet the ravages of cholera, drought, frost, rust, rain, and hail. Already some of our crops are gone and our fields are being replanted. Of these things we do not now complain.

So long as the Constitution of our country is upheld, so long as our business is surrounded by the same degree of protection that is thrown around all other industries, our country will receive at our hands a full measure of sacrifice, devotion, and cooperation.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are still other reasons that would deter me from voting for this bill, and one of the most urgent is that it may tie the hands of the cotton planters as well as the hands of the wheat growers, and at a cost to the cotton planters of millions upon millions of dollars. Another urgent reason why I am opposed to this most un-American measure is that its passage will mean the creation of a "food dictator," and that "dictator" has already been named in the person of a gentleman who has not been a resident of the United States for many years, but whose home is in England, and whose business interests lie on the other side of the Atlantic. If we are to have a "food dictator," let us so frame the law that he must be an all-American citizen and not one whose home and business interests lie in foreign lands. I have heard it stated, Mr. Speaker, that this proposed Hooverism was all worked out in advance, and that Mr. Hoover was selected to head the Belgian relief work as the first move in the game to make him "food dictator" of the United States. It has also been frequently stated that it was English influence that caused Mr. Hoover to be placed at the head of the Belgian relief work. Because of this I see no special cause for complaint, as Mr. Hoover knew the Belgian people and also knew the country. It has repeatedly been given out that Mr. Hoover donated both his time and his services as the head of the Belgian relief work, and I do not doubt for a moment that this is true. And I also believe, Mr. Speaker, that there are thousands of American citizens who would have done the work equally as well and on similar terms, and that, too, with no other thought of reward than to serve humanity. But getting back to the bill before the House, even before it has been passed and a "food dictator" created, Mr. Hoover has been named for the position and Members of Congress have been receiving letters urging them to vote for the bill and indorsing Mr. Hoover for the place. Among those received by me was one from the Merchants' Association of New York, with offices at 233 Broadway, Woolworth Building, New York City, and in reply to a letter from me, inquiring who Mr. Hoover was, I received this:

NEW YORK, May 29, 1917.

Hon. JEFF: MCLEMORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Permit us to thank you for your favor of May 26, in which you make inquiry concerning Mr. Herbert C. Hoover.

While we understand that Mr. Hoover is a man of considerable wealth, we have no knowledge of his having made his money in Wall Street. We understand he is a mining engineer; that he worked his way through the School of Mines at Stanford University, then went to Australia, from which country in four years he was called by the Chinese Government to take charge of its bureau of mines.

After a year in that position we are informed that he became manager of mining properties of a Belgian corporation in China, and a year later, because of his great success, was made a partner in a large British mining firm.

His remarkable success in conducting relief work in Belgium stamps him as a man of ability and gives him an experience which seems preeminently to qualify him to take charge of our food problem in this country.

Yours, very truly,

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
By S. C. MEAD, Secretary.

Now, why was it deemed necessary to bring a gentleman from England, a gentleman who had not been a resident of the United States for many years, and invest him with powers greater than those conferred on any Old World monarch—powers so great that at a stroke of the pen he could deprive our farmers and cattlemen of millions upon millions of American dollars? Why could not one of our own citizens, a man whose ideals and interests are all for and of the United States, been selected for this position of absolutism?

Mr. Speaker, I want to see this war brought to a speedy and successful termination, but in the prosecution of the task that has been outlined for us, that of establishing democracy in the countries of Europe, I do not believe it is either necessary or expedient for this Congress to enact a measure that goes beyond anything ever before attempted in the United States and which is so un-American that even the contemplation of it should cause the average American citizen to pause and reflect. One of the most conservative Members on this floor, a gentleman who is all-American and whose lifetime has been spent in the cause of the Democratic Party [Mr. MOON], in speaking on this bill, among other things, had this to say:

Surely there is no man in this House who has been raised in the faith of the Democratic Party who believes that this bill ought to pass in ordinary times. Whether the war necessities at this time justify the passage of this bill is to my mind exceedingly uncertain. Whether the conditions of our country are such that a measure of this character, crude, and, without disrespect to the committee, I may say thoughtlessly in some of its provisions, perhaps, and intensely arbitrary in others, should receive the sanction of this House without amendment, is to my mind very doubtful. * * * I very greatly doubt the wisdom of conferring upon any man the powers here conferred, even in the midst of flagrant war, much less in a period like this. These are powers that ought to be held sacredly in the hands of the Representatives of the people and not given to any man so long as you value a republic. * * * We are entering upon a war that may last for a long time. It may end suddenly. We know not, but we do know that all that this Republic has or will have is pledged to the successful prosecution of the war. We ought to know, too, that our domestic affairs and concerns ought to move along just as smoothly in this time as though no war had been thought of, because this country is great enough and powerful enough, at least joined with the allies, to conquer Germany, and not interfere unwisely with our own concerns within the borders of the Republic.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee spoke wisely and well in the sentences I have quoted, and for fear that I will be charged with unfairness in using so much of his speech as served my own purposes and ends I will go further and admit, regretfully it may be, that in another portion of his speech he stated that he would "vote for this measure as the best thing, perhaps, that has yet been proposed." I can not go so far as to say that I will vote for this measure in its present form, but I sincerely hope that when it goes to conference that the committee will so change and amend it that I can conscientiously give it my support and my vote.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. WILLIAM RAMSEYER,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 21, 1917.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following letter:

OTTUMWA, IOWA, June 19, 1917.

Hon. C. W. RAMSEYER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: I note what you say about the bill before Congress on the question of food and coal control. You can not be too vigorous on this question. I understand the combination of the coal business, especially in this part of the country, is under control of a combine at Minneapolis, a brokerage which controls the coal market and which simply holds us the retailer and the shipper, and everybody else. I believe that a bill should be drawn that anybody during these war times, especially who is a member of an organization for the control of the necessities of life beyond what is fair and reasonable, should be liable to imprisonment, and I also believe that the laws should prevent these men from issuing circulars and scareheads trying to scare the people into buying coal at an early date, for fear of high prices, and so on. I know that legislative bodies can not make men honest, but they can prevent them from stealing, to some extent. This is a very important question at the present time and lies at the very foundation of our economic condition. I want to see the Government take hold of all of these war issues and prevent the absolute robbery of the people, who are contributing from their pockets to the Red Cross, Belgian relief, home relief, and all of these things, and still carrying the other burdens of life, and they should not be pounced upon by the avaricious mulchers who want to take blood money from everyone, irrespective of their condition or station in life. You can not make it too hard.

With kind regards and with best wishes and hopeful of your success, I remain, as ever,

Your friend,

A. W. ENOCH.

Control of Food and Fuel Under the War Power.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY J. STEELE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 21, 1917.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, the RECORD is loaded down with statistics and information showing the necessity for some legislation of the kind now under consideration. Apparently there is no dispute of the facts. From the beginning of the European war there has been a constant upward tendency in prices, both in this country and abroad. In this country the rate of increase in the cost of staple foods and groceries in January, 1915, was 1 per cent, and this rate gradually increased until, in April, 1917, it amounted to 43 per cent, while to-day, according to estimates made, the rate of increase is far in excess of that amount, being from 75 to 100 per cent, and in some cases reaching 150 per cent. In Canada the increase for April, 1917, over 1914 was 45 per cent, while in Great Britain the increase for the same period was 94 per cent.

There seems to be a difference of opinion as to the real causes which have brought about this situation. Some attribute it to food speculators, others to increased cost of production. Investigation shows, however, that the wage paid labor in all walks of life has not kept pace with the increased cost of the necessaries of life. It is estimated that the cost of food has advanced about 10 per cent beyond the advance in wages. It is clear, therefore, that with this constant increase in prices there should be given to some agency the power of regulating, particularly when we know that in those countries where the advance in prices has existed legislative regulation along the lines proposed in this bill has tended to reduce prices. The main purpose of this bill is to provide such governmental agency. The administration has given the subject careful consideration, and the President has stated that—

This bill is one of the most important and most imperatively necessary of the measures which have been proposed in connection with the war.

We are involved in a war of uncertain duration, and in order to win the war it is as necessary to have a sufficient supply of food as to have soldiers, battleships, and munitions. The war has created a scarcity of food abroad, and it is clear that we must conserve existing food stocks, encourage further production, and regulate proper distribution. The Committee on Agriculture has given the subject careful consideration and study, and has reported this bill with the recommendation that it pass. It is probably one of the most important bills ever considered by the Congress, for it affects every citizen in this country and most of those in Europe.

With the necessity and propriety of this legislation so clearly established, further discussion, except to perfect it in detail, would seem to be unnecessary. By common consent the legislation of this special session is confined to the consideration of emergency war measures, and during the discussion of this bill certain constitutional principles were asserted bearing upon the war power of Congress, which should receive further consideration. Time for action has arrived, however, with regard to the pending bill.

The first question was the assertion that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, now has "all the power necessary to handle the whole food question, so far as the feeding of the Army and the Nation is concerned." The second, that the war power transcends all other provisions of the Constitution, including those relating to the protection of life, liberty, and happiness. No attempt is made to justify this bill as a constitutional measure in time of peace. It is conceded to be a war measure. Its constitutionality depends upon the following clauses of the Constitution:

The Congress shall have power * * *—

To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water.

To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

To provide and maintain a navy.

To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

Though the Federal Government is one of enumerated powers, its powers are not prescribed in detail, and from the very beginning it has been construed to possess not simply those powers which are specifically or expressly given it, but also those necessary and proper for the effective exercise of such express powers. The classic statement of the scope of the implied powers of Congress is that made by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316), as follows:

> We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended; but we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into effect which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional. It need not be said, of course, that the question as to whether or not the particular means selected is the best possible means that might have been adopted is one primarily for Congress to answer. All that the courts have to consider in passing upon its constitutionality is as to whether it is calculated in any appreciable degree to advance the constitutional end involved.

Thus, our entire Penal Code depends practically upon the exercise of implied powers under the Constitution. Neither do constitutional provisions change, but their operation extends to new matters and conditions as the modes of life and habits of the people vary with each succeeding generation. In South Carolina v. United States (199 U. S., 437) the court said:

> The Constitution is a written instrument. As such its meaning does not alter. That which it meant when adopted it means now. Being a grant of powers to a Government, its language is general; and as changes come in social and political life, it embraces within its grasp all new conditions which are within the scope of the powers in terms conferred. In other words, while the powers granted do not change, they apply from generation to generation to all things to which they are in their nature applicable. This in no manner abridges the fact of its changeless nature and meaning. Thus things which are within its grants of power, as those grants were understood when made, are still within them; and those things not within them remain still excluded.

Thus the law of the common carrier is the same to-day as when transportation by land was by coach and wagon, and on water by canal boat and sailing vessel, yet in actual operation it touches and regulates transportation by modes then unknown. Just so it is with the grant to declare war and raise and support armies. The Constitution has not changed.

The power is the same, but it operates to-day upon modes of warfare then unknown to the fathers, and it will operate with equal powers upon any new modes of warfare which the future may develop. It must, however, be a means plainly adapted for carrying into execution the express power. It can not be a remote and uncertain means of so doing. Thus, in United States v. De Witt (9 Wall., 41), an internal-revenue act of Congress prohibited the sale of oil made from petroleum in aid and support of the internal-revenue tax imposed on other illuminating oils. The court held this provision to be unconstitutional, saying:

> This consequence is too remote and too uncertain to warrant us in saying that the prohibition is an appropriate and plainly adapted means for carrying into execution the power of laying and collecting taxes.

Bearing these principles in mind, it is difficult to understand how the one clause in the Constitution conferring the power to declare war can be held to have broken down every other clause inserted for the protection of life, liberty, and property. The advocates of this enlarged power frequently refer to a statement of its existence contained in a speech delivered in 1836 by former President John Quincy Adams, as follows:

> In the authority given to Congress by the Constitution of the United States to declare war all the powers incident to war are by necessary implication conferred upon the Government of the United States. Now, the powers incidental to war are derived not from the internal municipal source but from the laws and usages of nations. There are then in the authority of Congress and the Executive two classes of powers altogether different in nature and often incompatible with each other—the war power and the peace power. The peace power is limited by regulations and restraints, by provisions prescribed within the Constitution itself. The war power is limited only by the laws and usages of nations. The power is tremendous. It is strictly constitutional, but it breaks down every barrier erected for the protection of liberty, property, and life.

The Constitution makes a distinction between executive and legislative power in military matters. With reference to the Executive it says:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States.

The power herein given relates exclusively to the Army and Navy. It is a military power and has no direct relation to either private citizens or private property. It is only incidentally in carrying out the military power that any right over either of these can be obtained. In times of war, therefore, the powers of the military commander in the control of his own men and of the citizens of his country are much broader than in times of peace, but it is still true that they are subject to the limitations which the civil law imposes. To illustrate these limitations, several leading precedents in American history will be cited.

During the second war with Great Britain Gen. Jackson was in command of the American forces at New Orleans. On December 15, 1814, he issued a general order placing the city under strict martial law, took upon himself the command of every person in the city, suspended the functions of all the civil authorities, and made his own will for the time the only rule of conduct. It was believed that this course was absolutely necessary. Judges, officers of the city corporation, and members of the State legislature insisted on it as the only way to save the citizens and their property from outrage and destruction. Gen. Jackson used the power thus taken by him moderately and benignly and only for the purpose of preventing mutiny in his camp. A single mutineer was restrained by a short confinement, and another was sent 4 miles up the river.

But after he had saved the city and the danger was all over he stood before the United States district court to be tried by the law of the land. On March 21, 1815, an order was issued by that court directing him to appear and show cause why he should not be held in contempt for his refusal during the pendency of his order declaring martial law to recognize a writ of habeas corpus issued by that court. Jackson filed a written protest, but the court held his conduct illegal and imposed a penalty of $1,000, which he paid. In 1842, after Gen. Jackson had served two terms as President, a bill was introduced in Congress to reimburse him for the amount of this fine. Debate was able and thorough. (Benton's Abridgment of Debates, p. 14, 628.) Mr. Bayard opposed the bill on the ground that the military order proclaiming martial law was illegal. Mr. Buchanan, then a Member of Congress and a personal friend of Jackson, spoke in its favor, but did not attempt to justify the order. He said:

> We do not contend, strictly speaking, that Gen. Jackson had any constitutional right to declare martial law at New Orleans.

Other leading members took the same ground.

The question as to the validity of this order declaring martial law came before the Supreme Court of Louisiana in Johnson v. Duncan (La.) (3 Martin, 530) upon a motion to proceed with the case, which motion was resisted because of the existence of martial law. On page 549, the court said:

> The Constitution of the United States, in which everything necessary for the general and individual security has been foreseen, does not provide that in time of public danger the executive power shall reign to the exclusion of all others. It does not thrust into the hands of a dictator the reins of the Government. The framers of that charter were too well aware of the hazards to which they would have exposed the fate of the Republic by such a provision, and had they done it the States would have rejected a Constitution stained with a clause so threatening to their liberties. In the meantime, conscious of the necessity of removing all impediments to the exercise of the executive power in cases of rebellion or invasion, they have permitted Congress to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus if those circumstances of the public safety shall require it. Thus far and no further goes the Constitution.

Mitchell v. Harmony (13 Howard, 115) presented for the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States the question of the extent of the right of a commanding general in the field to appropriate private property to the public service, and it was decided that such an appropriation might be made in case it should be rendered necessary by an immediate and pressing danger or urgent necessity existing at the time and not admitting of delay, but not otherwise.

It was shown in that case that when a state of war was declared to exist between the United States and Mexico the Government of the former country resolved to penetrate the enemy's county by three lines. On the left Gen. Taylor was to move from the lower Rio Grande; in the center Gen. Wool was to move into the State of Chihauhau, Mexico, from San Antonio, Tex.; while on the right Gen. Kearney invaded California by way of New Mexico. Having reached Santa Fe and received the submission of New Mexico, the latter general ordered a column under command of Gen. Doniphan, First Missouri Volunteers, to penetrate into the State of Chihauhau in such a manner as to make a diversion in Wool's favor.

Accompanying Doniphan's command was the Second Missouri Volunteers, commanded by Lieut. Col. Mitchell, the same who was subsequently the plaintiff in error in the case before the Supreme Court. The enemy was met on the way, but defeated December 21, 1846, and finally Doniphan reached and took possession of Fort San Eleasario at El Paso del Norte on the upper Rio Grande. Here the commander of the expedition first heard of the failure of the center column to reach Chihuahua. It became then a grave question of what course should be pursued.

In every direction was enemy country, and either to advance, retreat, or stand still seemed extremely perilous. The bold resolution, however, was taken by penetrating to the city of Chihuahua, which was successfully accomplished, although enemies vastly more numerous had to be met and vanquished. The column, turning to the left, joined Gen. Taylor. It was when starting from San Eleasario, and thence during the progress to Chihuahua, that Lieut. Col. Mitchell committed the acts for which the Supreme Court afterwards held him liable for damages. There was present with the command a Mr. Harmony, a citizen of New York, who, in the capacity of trader and before he knew that there was to be war, had left Independence, Mo., for Santa Fe with a large train laden with goods and merchandise, destined for New Mexico. Ventures of this nature were then encouraged by the United States Government. The train was overtaken by Gen. Kearney's army of invasion but was permitted to accompany one of its columns to Santa Fe, and Harmony was given permission to dispose of his wares to natives and others in the regular course of his business. When Doniphan's expedition was fitted out for New Mexico, Harmony sought permission to accompany it. He did this not to add to the security of the column, which his presence only weakened, but for purposes of trade. He was present with the entire approbation of the United States authorities on the spot. He was there to make money by selling the products of the United States to the people of the country, and it accorded with the policy of the Government that such commercial intercourse should be fostered. He had full authority for being there and for the purpose that brought him there.

But he did not wish to accompany the Army beyond San Elisario. He saw an opportunity to dispose of his wares in that vicinity, or, if not, he imagined he saw in the perils of the journey to Chihuahua under existing circumstances greater danger to his pecuniary interests than were likely to result from his remaining in the midst of Mexicans, with whom, however, he was on excellent terms, and whose language he perfectly understood.

It was claimed afterwards on the trial that he was at this time meditating schemes hostile to the cause of his country, and that through the agency of what he claimed was legitimate traffic with the Mexicans he was really giving the enemy aid and comfort, but the Supreme Court in its final verdict said that there was no proof that he was actuated by such motives. It treated the surmise as a vague suspicion, which could not, even under the circumstances then existing, be legally made the foundation of action inimical to Harmony's interest.

Lieut. Col. Doniphan gave orders that Harmony should accompany the command in its further career of conquest. The attending to the details of securing this was intrusted to Lieut. Col. Mitchell, who afterwards claimed, no doubt truthfully, that he acted under Doniphan's orders in the premises, but whom the court found had moved with a degree of zeal in the matter considerably in excess of what a plain, matter of fact obedience of orders would have necessitated. The lieutenant colonel gave to Harmony a memorandum stating the reasons for this action, which were:

1. That it was desired to make use of the wagons and bales of goods to form a field work in the event of the troops being attacked by an overwhelming force of the enemy.
2. It was desired to make use of the American teamsters, whom the commander of the forces had armed and organized, as an infantry battalion, numbering nearly 300 men.
3. It was desirable to prevent the large amount of property in Harmony's wagons from falling into the hands of the enemy, because it would have aided him in paying and equipping his troops. There is no doubt that he recognized the trader's train and employees formed an important element of strength, when, en route from San Elisario to Chihuahua, the American troops met and February 28, 1847, decisively defeated a vastly superior force of Mexicans at Sacramento, the result of the conflict being the opening up of an uninterrupted path to Chihuahua, the capital of the hostile State of that name, and which was the objective point of the expedition.

The city being reached, permission was given Harmony to sell his goods and merchandise, but the people were hostile, and he could not do it. Much of his property, especially wagons and animals, had been rendered unserviceable or totally destroyed. He declined to accept what was left when the American commander offered to turn it over to him, preferring to abandon the whole to those who had taken forcible possession of it and to secure whatever redress might be available to him through the agency of the law. First, he attempted to secure reimbursement through an act of Congress, but the bill for that purpose, in the usual course, having been referred to the Secretary of War, the Hon. William L. Marcy, for an opinion upon its merits, was returned with an adverse report, which settled its fate in that direction for the time being, at least, and left the civil courts the only means of relief.

The cause came on for hearing before the Circuit Court of the United States, Nelson, judge, presiding, in the October term, 1850, at New York City. The defenses set up were four:

1. That at the time of the seizure, Harmony was engaged in an unlawful trade with a public enemy.
2. The seizure was to prevent the property from falling into the hands of the enemy.
3. The property was taken for the public use.
4. That the plaintiff was estopped from claiming damages because he had subsequent to this received back the property from the military officers.

It may be well to remark that the Government supported Mitchell's views of the case, the United States district attorney defending him.

The trial was before a jury whose province, as explained by the court, was the determination of the facts, while the court expounded and applied the law. Nearly all the defenses were rejected with emphasis, while those for which it was conceded there was color of reason were pronounced too insufficiently supported to relieve the defendant from liability for damages.

It was held—

First. That the goods of a trader who, encouraged by the governmental authorities to carry on a particular kind of commercial intercourse with the enemy, had penetrated a subjugated country, were not liable to seizure on the ground that such trading was unlawful. It would be setting a snare for the unwary, an act not to be attributed to the Government or the executive department without the most convincing proof.

Second. To justify the seizure of property so situated, on the ground that such seizure was necessary to prevent its falling into the enemy's hands as booty of war, the danger must be imminent and urgent, not contingent or remote. It was for the jury to say, after duly weighing all the facts of the case, whether the danger was of this pressing nature.

Third. While a military officer is justified in a case of extreme necessity, when danger is impending, when the safety of the Government or the Army requires it, in taking private property for the public service without being liable as a trespasser, it is necessary that these circumstances should conspire to relieve him from responsibility for the act. When this is so, the owner of the property must look to the Government for indemnity.

On the other hand, if private property be thus appropriated, not on account of impending danger at the time, or for use to repel an immediate assault of the enemy which might endanger the safety of the Army, but for the strengthening of the Army, aiding in an expedition against the enemy 200 miles distant, the military officer would be a trespasser and the liability would attach at the instant of seizure.

Fourth. If the superior officer who gives the order for seizure is not justified, the subordinate who executes it will not be.

On appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed.

In an opinion delivered by Chief Justice Taney he said:

There are occasions where private property may lawfully be taken possession of or destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy, and also where a military officer charged with a particular duty may impress private property and take it for public use. Under these circumstances the Government is bound to make full compensation to the owner, but the officer is not a trespasser.

But in every case the danger must be present or impending, and the necessity such as does not admit of delay or the intervention of the civil authority to provide the requisite means. It is impossible to define the particular circumstances in which the power may be lawfully exercised. Every case must depend on its own circumstances. It is the emergency that gives the right, and the emergency must be shown before the taking can be justified. In deciding upon this necessity the state of facts as they appeared at the time will govern the decision, because the officer in command must act upon the information of others as well as his own observation. And if, with such information as he can obtain, there is reasonable ground for believing that the peril is immediate or the necessity urgent he may do what the occasion seems to require, and the discovery that he was mistaken will not make him a wrongdoer. It is not enough to show that he exercised an honest judgment and took the property to promote the public service; he must also prove what the nature of the emergency was, or what he had reasonable grounds to believe it to be; and it will then be for the court and jury to say whether it was so pressing as to justify an invasion of private right. Unless this is established the defense must fail, because it is very clear that the law will not permit private property to be taken merely to insure the success of an enterprise against a public enemy. * * * It can never be maintained that a military officer can justify himself for doing an unlawful act by producing the order of his superior. The order may palliate but it can not justify.

This case is given in considerable detail to show under what circumstances private property may be taken from the owner by a military officer in time of war.

And the question here is—

Said the court—

whether the law permits it to be taken to insure the success of any enterprise against a public enemy which the commanding officer may deem it advisable to undertake. And we think it very clear that the law does not permit it.

It was claimed by the defendant that the goods were taken for the purpose of strengthening an invading force against Chihuahua and of attacking a fortification more than 200 miles distant in the interior of the enemy country. The court left it to the jury to say whether the seizure under the circumstances presented a case of immediate and pressing danger or urgent necessity existing at the present time, and the jury held that it did not. A verdict of over $90,000 was rendered against Mitchell, the military officer.

The principle in this case was afterwards recognized and sustained by the Supreme Court. In United States v. Russell (13 Wallace, 628) the court said, referring to an appropriation of private property in time of war:

Where such an extraordinary and unforeseen emergency arises in the public service in time of war, no doubt is entertained that the power of the Government is ample to supply for the moment the public wants in that way to the extent of the immediate public exigency, but the public danger must be immediate, imminent, and impending, and the emergency in the public service must be extreme and imperative and such as will not admit of delay or a resort to any other source of supply, and the circumstances must be such as imperatively require the exercise of that extreme power in respect to the particular property so impressed, appropriated, or destroyed.

In Dow v. Johnson (100 U. S., 169) the court said:

We do not controvert the doctrine of Mitchell v. Harmony, reported in the 13th Howard; on the contrary, we approve it.

In the midst of our Civil War, in October, 1862, Benjamin R. Curtis, ex-Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and one of the most profound lawyers who ever sat upon that bench, published an article on "Executive Power," and discussed that power as follows:

In time of war a military commander, whether he be the commander in chief or one of his subordinates, must possess and exercise powers both over the persons and property of citizens which do not exist in time of peace. But he possesses and exercises such powers, not in spite of the Constitution and laws of the United States, or in derogation from their authority, but in virtue thereof and in strict subordination thereto. The general who moves his army over private property in the course of his operations in the field, or who impresses into the public service means of transportation or subsistence to enable him to act against the enemy, or who seizes persons within his lines as spies, or destroys supplies in immediate danger of falling into the hands of the enemy, uses authority unknown to the Constitution and laws of the United States in times of peace, but not unknown to the Constitution and those laws in times of war. The power to declare war includes the power to use the customary and necessary means effectively to carry it on. As Congress may institute a state of war, it may legislate into existence and place under Executive control the means for its prosecution. And in time of war, without any special legislation, not the commander in chief only, but every commander of an expedition or of a military post is lawfully empowered by the Constitution to do whatever is necessary and is sanctioned by the laws of war to accomplish the lawful objects of his command.

But it is obvious that this implied authority must find early limit somewhere. If it were admitted that the commanding general in the field might do whatever, in his discretion, might be necessary to subdue the enemy he could levy contributions to pay his soldiers; he could force conscripts into his service; he could drive out of the entire community all persons not desirous to aid him; in short, he could be the absolute master of the country for the time being. No one has ever supposed, no one will now undertake to maintain, that the commander in chief in time of war has any such lawful authority as this. What, then, is his authority over the persons and property of citizens? I answer that over all persons enlisted in his forces he has military power and command; that over all persons and property within the sphere of his actual operations in the field he may lawfully exercise such constraint and control as the successful prosecution of his particular military enterprise may, in his honest judgment, absolutely require; and upon such persons as have committed offenses against any article of war he may, through appropriate military tribunals, inflict the punishment prescribed by law. And there his lawful authority ends.

The military power over citizens and their property is a power to act, not a power to prescribe rules for future action. It springs from present pressing emergencies and is limited by them. It can not assume the functions of the statesman or legislator and make provisions for future or distant arrangements by which persons and property may be made subservient to military uses. It is the physical power of any army in the field and may control whatever is so near as to be actually reached by that force in order to remove obstructions to its exercise.

But when the military commander controls the persons or property of citizens who are beyond the sphere of his actual operations in the field, when he makes laws to govern their conduct he becomes a legislator. Those laws may be made actually operative; obedience to them may be enforced by military power. Their purpose and effect may be solely to support or recruit his armies or to weaken the power of the enemy with whom he is contending. But he is a legislator still, and whether his edicts are clothed in the form of proclamations, or of military orders, by whatever names they may be called, they are laws. If he have the legislative power conferred on him by the people it is well. If not, he usurps it. He has no more lawful authority to hold all the citizens of the entire country, outside of the sphere of his actual operations in the field, amenable to his military edict, than he has to hold all the property of the country subject to his military requisitions. He is not the military commander of the citizens of the United States, but of its soldiers.

The great fundamental principle of our system of government may then be said to be the sanctity of the personal and property rights of the individual. To secure these our written constitutions have been adopted. But even the so-called martial law does not abrogate these guaranties of the Constitution. Willoughby on the Constitution, 1233–1234, says:

In European countries living under written constitutions provision is quite generally made for the declaration in times of danger of what is called a "state of siege," the effect of which is immediately to suspend the operation of all the ordinary constitutional limitations upon executive power. No similar status is known to American law. The use of the military arm of our States or of the Federal Government in times of peace and upon domestic soil to maintain order and secure the execution of law in no wise operates to suspend civil law or to negate individual rights, liberty, and property any more than the exercise of the ordinary police powers by the State to this effect. * * * There is then, strictly speaking, no such thing in American law as a declaration of martial law whereby military is substituted for civil law. So-called declarations of martial law are indeed often made, but the legal effect of these goes no further than to warn citizens that the military powers have been called upon by the Executive to assist him in the maintenance of law and order, and that while the emergency lasts they must, upon pain of arrest and punishment, not commit any acts which will in any way render more difficult the restoration of order and the enforcement of law. * * * During the time that the military forces are employed for the enforcement of law—that is to say, when so-called martial law is in force—no new powers are given to the Executive, no extension of arbitrary authority is recognized, no civil rights of the individual are suspended. The relations of the citizen to his State are unchanged. Whatever interference there may be with his personal freedom or property rights must be justified, as in the case of the police power, by necessity, actually or reasonably presumed.

It is remarkable—

that during the Civil War but few questions respecting the war power were passed upon by the courts. Some extravagant claims were put forth on behalf of this power by theorists, as if where war existed constitution and laws alike were to give way and the military authority to be supreme and unlimited. * * * The people have never delegated to any department of the Government or to any officer, civil or military, the authority to subvert the laws or put aside the Constitution either temporarily or permanently.

One of the questions referred to by Judge Cooley arose in ex parte Milligan, 4 Wallace, 118, the court stating that "no graver question was ever considered by this court, nor one which more nearly concerns the rights of the whole people." The court stated the question involved, as follows:

The controlling question in the case is this: Upon the facts stated in Milligan's petition and the exhibits filed, had the military commission mentioned in it jurisdiction legally to try and sentence him? Milligan, not a resident of one of the rebellious States, nor a prisoner of war, but a resident of Indiana for 20 years past and never in the military or naval service, is, while at his home, arrested by the military power of the United States, imprisoned, and, on certain criminal charges preferred against him, tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged by a military commission organized under the direction of the military commander of the military district of Indiana. Had this tribunal the legal power and authority to try and punish this man?

The military commission referred to had been created pursuant to an act of Congress of March 3, 1863, authorizing the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus throughout the United States by the President. Five of the Justices of the Supreme Court held that Congress was without the constitutional authority to suspend or authorize the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus and provide military commissions in States outside the sphere of actual military operations, and with their civil courts open and ready for the transaction of judicial business. The remaining four Justices held that Congress had not in fact made legislative provision for the military tribunal in question, but asserted that it possessed the constitutional authority so to do should it see fit. The argument of the four dissenting Justices was as follows:

Congress—

has the power not only to raise and support and govern armies but to declare war. It has, therefore, the power to provide by law for carrying on war. This power necessarily extends to all power essential to the prosecution of war with vigor and success, except such as interferes with the command of the forces and the conduct of campaigns. That power and authority belong to the President as Commander in Chief. * * * We by no means assert that Congress can establish and apply the laws of war where no war has been declared or exists. Where peace exists the laws of peace must prevail. What we do maintain is that when the Nation is involved in war and some portions of the country are invaded, and all are exposed to invasion, it is within the power of Congress to determine in what States or districts such great and imminent public danger exists as justifies the authorization of military tribunals for the trial of crimes and offenses against the discipline or security of the Army or against the public safety. * * * It was for Congress to determine the question of expediency.

The majority of the court, on the other hand, held, first, that no mere legislative declaration was sufficient to create a necessity for the exercise of martial law when no such necessity in fact exists, and, second, that the circumstance that the ordinary courts are open and undisturbed for the execution of their functions is conclusive evidence of the fact that there is no present necessity for martial law. In the course of the opinion of the majority it was said:

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government within the Constitution has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been ably proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority. * * * This Nation, as experience has proved, can not always remain at peace, and has no right to expect that it will always have wise and humane rulers, sincerely attached to the principles of the Constitution. Wicked men, ambitious of power, with hatred of liberty and contempt of law, may fill the place once occupied by Washington and Lincoln; and if this right is conceded and the calamity of war again befall us, the dangers to human liberty are frightful to contemplate. If our fathers had failed to provide for just such a contingency, they would have been false to the trust reposed in them.* They knew—the history of the world told them—the Nation they founded, be its existence short or long, would be involved in war; how often or how long continued human foresight could not tell; and that unlimited power, wherever lodged at such a time, was especially hazardous to freemen. For this and other equally weighty reasons they secured the inheritance they had fought to maintain by incorporating in a written Constitution the safeguards which time had proved were essential to its preservation. Not one of these safeguards can the President or Congress or the judiciary disturb except the one concerning the writ of habeas corpus.

The last sentence of this citation accords precisely with the statement of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, above referred to, declaring that the order of Gen. Jackson declaring martial law in New Orleans was invalid. After an analysis of this case, Prof. Willoughly, in his work on the Constitution, page 1251, concludes:

There would seem to be little question but that the doctrine stated by the majority in the Milligan case is essentially a sound one, namely, that actual necessity and not constructive necessity, as determined by legislative declaration alone, will furnish justification for substituting martial for civil law.

From this discussion it is clear that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, does not possess the power to meet the present food situation, and therefore this present legislation is necessary. In the brief filed by the Committee on Agriculture, having charge of the bill, it is stated:

It is not herein contended that the power of Congress to legislate for war purposes is derived from any source other than the Constitution, or that the Constitution is suspended or abrogated during the existence of a state of war.

The weight of authority seems to sustain the correctness of the view of the majority of the court in the Milligan case. The liberties of the people as granted in the Constitution are, therefore, in no danger of invasion. It is contended by some, however, that the great powers vested in the Executive under the terms of this bill may be susceptible to abuse, and if abused may lead to mischievous consequences. This argument, addressed to popular fears and prejudices, finally acquires a weight in the public mind to which it is not entitled. Every power, whether broad or limited, is susceptible to abuse; no legislation can provide perfect guards against it. Confidence must be reposed somewhere, and where can it be better lodged than in the Executive whom the people have trusted? Mr. Justice Johnston, in Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat., 204), well stated this view:

The idea is Utopian that government can exist without leaving the exercise of discretion somewhere. Public security against the abuse of such discretion must rest in responsibility and stated appeals to public approbation. Where all power is derived from the people and public functionaries deposit it at the feet of the people, to be assumed again only at their wills, individual fears may be alarmed by the monsters of imagination, but individual liberty can be in little danger.

We have heretofore given the President almost unlimited authority in the conduct of this war, and all agree that it is a patriotic duty in this crisis to uphold the administration. In our declaration of war we pledged all our resources to carry it to a successful termination, and it is idle to suppose that the powers given under this bill will be used for the injury of the people.

As above shown, Congress only can grant these powers, and I shall support the bill in full confidence that its provisions will be used benignly in the interest of all the people.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AMBROSE KENNEDY,

OF RHODE ISLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 22, 1917,

On the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Speaker, under general leave to extend remarks in connection with the bill now under discussion I desire to place in the RECORD an address on "Our Food Problem" delivered by Herbert C. Hoover, United States food administrator, at the gathering of Brown University alumni in Sayles Hall, Brown University, Providence, R. I., subsequent to the commencement exercises held on Wednesday, June 20, 1917, during which Mr. Hoover received his sheepskin for the LL. D. degree which was conferred on him by the university while he was in Belgium.

The address is as follows:

OUR FOOD PROBLEM.

Ladies and gentlemen, I would be insensible, indeed, if I did not give expression to my gratitude for the great honor which I have had at Brown University this day. It is not alone an honor to myself, but it is an honor which was acquired through the period of Belgian relief, and it is an honor taken by each and all of those 200 Americans who formed that army of relief. Furthermore, it is unique in another sense that it is the first honorary degree given by one of the older American universities to a graduate of the youngest university in the United States.

Now, uppermost in my mind, and no doubt the uppermost idea in your minds, is the problem for which I was called from Europe to engage myself in in behalf of the President. I do not propose, in the few minutes that I have, to enter upon a course of diatetic administrative, economic discussion with which this problem is surrounded.

I wish, however, to present one single theme to your minds: Our food problem, the problem of food administration revolves around one single factor, the diminishing productivity of Europe and the absorption of commerce by the armies. Since the wonderful harvest of 1916 the food supplies of the world have been steadily lessened. This year we are faced with a world shortage, and next year this shortage will be even greater. Seven million men have been called out of productive labor and devoted to fighting, in the production of implements of war.

The women have been unable to renew the need of that labor shortage. With the diversion of animals of transportation to war, the land is no longer receiving the fertilizer that it needs in order to increase production, to increase the production of bread grains to secure protein and fat supplies that Europe demands for her vast armies. She is eating into the capital of animals. This reacts again in the productivity of the latter. Our own allies are supported from foreign markets—Russia, Bulgaria, Roumania—which are cut off, and Australia and India are three times the distance, and therefore three times the more difficult of access to the Atlantic seaboard.

TELLS OF FOOD SHORTAGE.

The Argentine crop is a failure, and she has interposed an embargo. As the shortage grows, so does the need grow. It is the impact of this shortage that has during the past year knocked at every door in the United States, and, though America may obtain a surplus, the reverberation of Europe's need would have knocked seriously at our doors even though we hadn't entered the war.

The function of war has raised our prices above endurance, and if we do nothing it will raise them higher still, for the need of Europe grows yearly, and the value of food now transcends everything else. By our entering into the war we are forced not alone by one issue, but we are under the force of two issues: The first issue is we must have, in any event, the control of our food; second, we must also meet the increased demands of our allies in order that they may remain constant in war and not leave us alone as the enemy of Germany.

Those problems are not insoluble if they are taken in time. In their solution lies the prime test of democracy. The question is, Can our form of government find the devotion and efficiency necessary in the preparation in advance of the storm? Must we wait until disaster is upon us and reap the whirlwind in the lament of too late? Can we not only do this in time, but can we do so without resorting to measures of Prussianism? I believe that we can. I believe our faith is right.

I believe that democracy can not only defend itself, but that it can prepare for that defense. I believe that the spirit of self-sacrifice and idealism runs higher amongst our people than those of any other land, that the average of commercial morality, of commercial devotion, is greater than that of any other country in this world.

I believe that by the mobilization of the voluntary support of our people those problems are all soluble, but I know of no people of such idealism but that some individuals, some individual selfishness would defeat the will of the majority. To this end we must have power, and that power of Prussianism is the same power that rests in the police of the State. It is the power to repress crime.

I do not wish to say more on this occasion, but I would like to leave this one thought with you: The wolf is at the door of the world. We, in our abundance, our undeveloped resources, our wastage, and our extravagance, hold it in our power, and ours alone, to keep this wolf from the door. It is a problem wider than the country; it is a problem of humanity.

The 1917 River and Harbor Bill.

I ask the gentlemen of the minority who submitted this report to make good their contention that any one of these projects are unworthy and ought not to be included in the bill. * * * I challenge the gentlemen of the minority * * * to do so. * * * Such opposition can not find defense at the bar of public opinion.—Chairman SMALL of the River and Harbor Committee.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. FREAR,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 16, 1917.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, on June 11 in general debate the above "challenge" was voiced, and on June 15 the chairman of the River and Harbor Committee, Mr. SMALL, placed in the RECORD (see Appendix) a "timely" statement given to the press by Secretary of Commerce Redfield. The statement was accompanied by the gratuitous remark that "the opposition to the pending 1917 'pork-barrel' bill are indulging in unfounded criticism of our waterways." "Such opposition," he continued, "can not find defense at the bar of public opinion and will be justly rebuked." That statement of the chairman was noted on the following day when it appeared in the RECORD, and it is here pointed out as an indication of public opinion that seven members of the 1916 River and Harbor Committee, all of whom were supporters of annual river and harbor bills were not returned to Congress, notwithstanding presentation of their cases "at the bar of public opinion." Again, seven members of the present committee have declared in a minority report that the pending bill "is only the continuation of efforts to secure river and harbor legislation portions of which invariably bear the justifiable designation of pork."

Again, 120 votes were cast in the House against taking up this pending river and harbor bill for consideration, and again a majority of the Democratic caucus decided to drop the pork-barrel bill from the 1917 legislative program, but the pressure seems to have been too hard to resist. Again, three of the last four bills reported by the River and Harbor Committee and passed by the House have failed to become law and have been rebuked "at the bar of public opinion."

Because of its present form the pending bill promises to go the same route. This much is said in reference to the expert opinion of those who criticize opponents of "pork."

When Mr. Redfield's effusion on waterway improvements, so "timely" issued to the press, was printed in the RECORD, an effort was made to show the value of Redfield's judgment and discrimination and the character of the new "waterway" commission which has been named by the Council of Defense. A point of order was immediately offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] that Redfield was not germane to the waterway item under discussion. Although the point was properly made from a parliamentary standpoint, it should not be forgotten that others on the floor quoted Redfield's article approvingly in the presence of the gentleman from Texas, who, however, uttered no protest and offered no points of order against that side of the discussion. Notwithstanding these remarks are destined to be embalmed in the RECORD morgue, I desire, for the benefit of those who may be interested in the subject of waterways, briefly to discuss Mr. Redfield's knowledge of the subject and his judgment generally. I desire also at the outset to show the personnel and interests of some of the experts (?) of the new waterway board named by the Council of National Defense.

While the food bill is occupying the attention of the House it may be well to offer a few additional observations concerning both food and waterways, because the distinguished Secretary of Commerce has ventured to become an authority on both. What does Secretary Redfield know about waterways? Presumably no more than he knows about the food question, although his numerous contributions to the administration's joke literature usually offered at "timely" times has served to relieve the oppressive atmosphere occasioned by the European war. Mr. Redfield says in effect we must go the limit on inland waterway improvements. Get scows, skiffs, ships, sloops, and schooners is his timely advice, which is in entire harmony with "Sister Susie sewing shirts for soldiers." It makes no difference whether anyone will use the skiffs or scows, but "get them" is Redfield's advice.

"Eat whales," was Redfield's advice on a recent occasion according to press reports. Whale steaks, kangaroo chops, and giraffe giblets would relieve the food situation, according to the Secretary of Commerce. All that the average housewife now needs to do, according to his judgment, will be to go to the nearest market and get a whale soup bone or walrus ham in order to solve the food problem. Centuries ago a distinguished youth named Simple Simon also started out with all the enthusiasm of a modern Redfield. Memory may be treacherous, and yet it brings back a trite old saw that when "Simple Simon went a fish'n' for to catch a whale, all the water he could find was in his mother's pail." To the average housewife the thought will come that whale eating must not become a confirmed habit before we learn to catch the rabbit.

WHALE MEAT AND PORK.

Secretary Redfield is likewise an authority on "pork," which is also a political food product, and I desire briefly to refer to his knowledge and judgment on that subject on which he has offered himself as authority. In fact, on all subjects the distinguished Secretary of Commerce expresses himself with freedom and conviction. Back in December, 1915, Secretary Redfield was called upon to welcome the national river and harbor lobby which met in Washington. In the course of his remarks he said that the lobby's usefulness was weakened because of the habitual "though untruthful" use of the word "pork." Although the New York Board of Trade called that same lobby a "mutual bribery organization," and although Senator TILLMAN once called the river and harbor bill "a humbug and a steal," and although the minority of seven members of the River and Harbor Committee now declare the pending bill is of the "pork family," I pass by Redfield's expert opinion on "pork," expressed before the lobby in December, 1915, without comment, beyond a reminder that the "pork barrels" of 1914 and 1915 were both defeated in the Senate, and the 1916 bill, after a thorny road, passed the Senate with only one vote to spare. Redfield says it is untruthful to say "pork," but Redfield was talking to a river and harbor lobby at the time—a lobby that advertised its powers to secure pork by a tabulated statement contained on pages 60 and 62 of its 1911 official report, from which I quote briefly.

The members of the lobby "congress" were impressed with the relation between that body and the amount of Government appropriations for each separate State. I quote literally from the listed method of comparison and cite a dozen States or more to show the proportionate grabs that are held out invitingly to gaze by the lobby officials.

All of these facts were again presented during debate in the House on the last bill. The statement taken from the lobby's official 1911 report follows:

	Amounts subscribed to the support of National River and Harbor Congress, by States, 1906–1911, inclusive.	Amount of appropriations received by States, in river and harbor bills, 1907–1911, inclusive.
Pennsylvania (east)	$4,295	$4,837,745
Connecticut	2,115	2,318,000
Massachusetts	2,850	1,451,733
Maryland	1,755	2,778,265
New Jersey	2,735	3,484,895
North Carolina	2,538	2,239,614
South Carolina	1,137	1,237,290
Virginia	4,306	4,082,454
Georgia	8,281	4,102,889
Florida	1,620	5,188,670
District of Columbia	1,530	1,243,000
Alabama	6,090	6,952,000
Louisiana	9,505	3,820,292
Texas	8,825	9,193,309
Mississippi River		21,842,775

Mississippi River (1914), $10,500,000, or nearly one-half of the six years' total.

UNFAIRLY DISTRIBUTING THE PORK.

Texas and Florida receive more than the average State, excepting that the Mississippi River lump sum would swell the adjacent States over $21,000,000, if counted. Florida has many small waterways, like the Kissimmee and the Ocklawaha, and is the home of influential Members at both ends of the Capitol, who determine the fortunes of annual river and harbor bills. Florida had $2,217,000 in the 1917 bill alone, as will later appear, but many bad items were omitted from the Kenyon substitute measure rejected by the lobby.

I pass by any further discussion of "pork" manipulation by the lobby on its own proud admission, and also the fact that the president of this national waterway lobby is an active member of the administration's legislative forces, and again return to the commission which Secretary Redfield mentions in his "timely" statement to the press. He states a committee under the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense has been found to advise in promoting the immediate use of all of our waterways. As at present constituted, it consists of George E. Barthol, of Philadelphia; Gen. W. H. Black, Washington, D. C.; Capt. J. F. Ellison, Cincinnati; Joy Morton, Chicago; James E. Smith, St. Louis, president of the newly formed Mississippi Valley Waterway Association; Walter S. Dickey, Kansas City; and M. J. Sanders, of New Orleans. The statement further states that that committee has hired rooms down in the Munsey Building, presumably at Government expense.

THE NEW WATERWAY COMMISSION.

Glancing over the list of names, one seems to have a familiar appearance, and upon examination I find that Capt. J. F. Ellison, of Cincinnati, Ohio, was the former secretary of the national waterway lobby at the very time the table of pork appropriation allotments just mentioned was prepared for his 1911 report. Further, at that time Capt. Ellison made his secretary's annual speech, which appears in the official report, and he is quoted as saying:

We send Congressmen here to legislate for the Nation theoretically, but actually to get all he can for us; and if he does not get our share, and then some, we do our best to replace him.

That statement is from a man appointed by the Council of National Defense as a waterway expert. Ellison says, "get pork" or "get out of Congress"; and Redfield, who says there is no "pork," now recommends Ellison as a distinguished member of the new board.

Walter S. Dickey, of Kansas City, Mo., a reputable citizen beyond question, another member of the commission, is connected with a steamboat on the Missouri River—possibly he is connected with two steamboats and some scows, skiffs, and barges. Mr. Dickey is probably as willing to get fat appropriations for the Missouri River, as Ellison is for the Ohio; both have helped their particular projects in the past to get "their share." I will not quote his testimony in the report but when the Missouri River project was recommended for abandonment by Col. Deakyne, the following businesslike statement was made, which appears on page 11, of Document No. 463, Sixty-fourth Congress.

The Kansas City-Missouri River Navigation Co. (Capt. Dickey, manager), the only through line on the river, operating between Kansas City and St. Louis, charges 80 per cent of the railroad freight rates. Assuming this to be the relation between the rail-and-water rates for the entire traffic, the saving to shippers by the use of the river in 1913 was about $10,000. It is evident that this saving is entirely inadequate to warrant the serious consideration of an expenditure by the Government of $1,100,000 per year in interest and maintenance. * * *

It is frequently argued that if the improvement of a river gives lower rail rates, such improvement is justified even if the river never carries a ton of freight. This might be true if there were no other method of controlling rail rates, but in these days when the railroads claim that they are being regulated too much, there appears to be no lack of governmental machinery for controlling them and it does not seem necessary to spend $20,000,000 to bring about a proper rail rate between Kansas City and St. Louis.

SPENDING $100 TO SAVE $1.

Mr. Dickey's boats collected about $40,000 in freight charges that year, according to Col. Deakyne's statement, but it will cost the Government approximately $1,100,000 per year to save $10,000 annually in freight rates for Kansas City shippers, according to Col. Deakyne's estimates. He recommended the abandonment of this project that also deals in land reclamation, and in this position he was supported by Col. C. McD. Townsend, whose opinion is also important in connection with the next member of the new commission, Mr. James E. Smith, of St. Louis, who is president of a new Mississippi River Waterway Association. In determining the value of Mr. Smith's judgment on waterways, I quote Col. Townsend's official statement, on page 13, Document No. 463, Sixty-fourth Congress, wherein he says:

The fact, however, that there has been a failure to properly utilize the improved channel that has been maintained during the past 10 years from St. Louis to New Orleans should cause Congress to hesitate before continuing the large appropriations it is making for the western rivers.

In the opinion of the division engineer, the problem of developing our western rivers should be treated as a single one. * * * An opportunity should then be offered the American people to determine whether they want waterways not by rhetorical efforts in river conventions, but by a practical utilization of the channel thus afforded. Until such revival occurs appropriations on the tributaries should be confined to maintaining the existing status.

After spending over $100,000,000 on the lower Mississippi River and $46,000,000 on the Mississippi above the mouth of the Ohio, Col. Townsend says—what everybody has learned to know—that there is no appreciable commerce on the river. With a channel 100 per cent better than the Rhine, the actual commerce is not one-half of 1 per cent of that on the Rhine, although we have spent five or six times as much on the Mississippi as has ever been spent on the Rhine.

UTILIZATION V. RHETORIC.

Returning to Mr. Smith, the president of the new waterway association, who lives in St. Louis, and no doubt wants liberal appropriations for that stream, I again quote where Col. Townsend significantly says:

An opportunity should be afforded the American people to determine whether they want waterways not by rhetorical efforts in river conventions but by practical utilization of the channel thus afforded.

Col. Townsend officially declares in the Government report that utilization of the river channels when created, and not oratory in waterway conventions, is what the country needs at the present time, and Townsend's advice carries much weight when we ascertain that Mr. Smith, a president of river conventions, lives on the river which has received such enormous appropriations during past years, and yet no commerce has resulted. Townsend further says, "Until such revival occurs, appropriations on the tributaries should be confined to maintaining the existing status." That is the official advice of a Government official and is in direct contrast with the political advice of Secretary Redfield. Col. Townsend says, in effect, do not put political pork into insignificant streams or any stream, and that advice has added force when we are considering the 1917 pending bill.

The less said about Gen. Black's judgment on inland waterways the better. Last December he addressed the same waterway lobby that Redfield welcomed in 1915, and he drew enthusiastic applause with the sentiment, "There is no use recommending too small an improvement." It was Gen. Black who overruled Cols. Deakyne and Townsend and fastened the $20,000,000 Missouri River project on the country for the accommodation of Mr. Dickey's steamboats. It was Gen. Black who in 1916 recommended $2,000,000 for the upper Mississippi in line with the desires of President Smith's waterway association. It was Gen. Black who overruled other Army engineers in recommending the $4,500,000 upper Cumberland project, and also $18,700,000 for the 26-mile canal on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals. Gen. Black, when acting as colonel, recommended several of the new projects in this bill, including $100,000 for Congaree River and $455,000 for Freeport Harbor. I do not question the honesty of any of these men but do doubt their judgment. With that kind of a waterway commission the public may pray to be delivered from the Government tax collector.

WHO APPOINTED THESE MEN AND WHY?

It is unnecessary to refer to other waterway experts on the commission appointed by the Council of National Defense. Those best acquainted with the remaining members can tell whether any one member has had experience in actual inland water navigation, and if so, to what extent, and with what results so far as the public interest is concerned.

Judging from the brief record here given the taxpaying public may well inquire what purpose lies behind the appointment of this commission, and if it is an index of other appointments by the Council of Defense the public may be sure that before long the country will inquire into the suitability of such other appointments and into the personnel of members of the council itself. No one will question every effort to provide for war needs, and every Member of Congress will support all legitimate expenditures, but the air is now redolent with "hold ups" of the Government on coal, oil, steel, and other supplies, and it is fair to inquire what good purpose lies behind a commission of the character recommended by Mr. Redfield.

THE 1917 RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The 1917 pending river and harbor bill has been condemned in unmistakable language by the minority report, which is signed by a majority of the Republicans on the committee and two leading Democratic members. In this connection it may not be irrelevant to say that of 21 members of the 1916 committee 7 members of that committee, all of whom supported recent river and harbor bills, are not now Members of the present Congress. Whether voluntarily or involuntarily retired, it is a circumstance that carries its own lesson, that the country is beginning to protest against Ellison's estimate that—

We send Congressmen here to legislate for the Nation theoretically, but actually to get all he can for us, and if he does not get our share, and then some, we do our best to replace him.

The minority of the committee in its report pronounced this bill a pork barrel and indefensible. In reply the Chairman [Mr. SMALL], in his opening remarks, stated, page 3361:

Every appropriation in this bill constitutes an emergency either for commerce or national defense, and I wish to state that there is no item of appropriation in this bill either for maintenance or improvement which was not specifically recommended by the Secretary of War.

After that sweeping statement, that sounds like the ebullition of a waterway association, the chairman further challenged the world in general and the minority members in particular to point out unworthy projects. I quote from his statement to the House:

I want to ask the gentlemen of the minority, who submitted this report, to make good their contention that any one of these projects is unworthy and ought not to be included in this bill. * * * I challenge the gentlemen of the minority who have offered this report to do so, and I hope to have an opportunity of listening to them.

So much for Chairman SMALL's challenge.

It was shown at the outset of general debate that this pending bill was practically the 1916–17 bill that was then opposed by 132 votes in the House and failed to get reported out of the Senate committee last session. It was also shown that the pending bill, with four items otherwise provided for, or reduced, reaching an aggregate of over $9,000,000, deducted from the last bill, is substantially the same bill as the last pork-barrel measure. A few new projects have been dropped but scores of worthless maintenance items have been added under the novel grouping scheme to which reference will be made.

Four hundred and odd items in the bill, including nearly every objectionable item of the past, bob up, and yet the chairman challenges criticism.

WHY REFUSE TO TRUST THE PRESIDENT?

To meet this situation and brush aside the specious apologies and justifications for various items of pork contained throughout the bill, the minority members of the committee accepted the challenge of the chairman by offering to leave to the President of the United States the determination of every item. While this procedure would permit the Chief of Engineers to have a strong voice in such certifications, the action was taken on the advice of leading members of the administration who have advocated the plan of giving the President power to "strike out." Pursuant to the desire to cut out scores of wasteful items, the minority of the committee at the outset, on June 15 (pp. 3680 and 3681), offered the following amendment to the bill:

Provided, That no money shall be expended for the items of maintenance in this act unless the items are certified to by the President of the United States as necessary in his judgment for the commercial needs of the country or for the successful prosecution of the present war: Provided further, That no money shall be expended for the items or new projects, surveys, or for continuing improvements until and unless the items are certified to by the President of the United States as necessary, in his judgment, for the successful prosecution of the present war.

That amendment, which would have placed full power in the hands of the Executive to disallow any wasteful item, was defeated in the Committee of the Whole by a vote of 104 to 72 (p. 3682 of the RECORD). Immediately thereafter an amendment was offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, supported by the minority members of the River and Harbor Committee. The amendment was as follows:

Provided, That during the continuance of the present war no money shall be expended except for necessary repair and preservation of existing public works or for construction and completion of works of immediate military necessity to be determined by the President.

That amendment was also defeated in the Committee of the Whole by a vote of 111 to 69 (p. 3682 of the RECORD of June 15). It is unnecessary to discuss the scope of either of those proposed amendments; both speak for themselves. In an effort to eliminate or materially reduce extravagance and waste the minority of the River and Harbor Committee endeavored to place full authority in the hands of the Executive, and so stated on the floor of the House, but the offer was voted down.

That was the answer of the minority, and should be the answer of all those who have not questionable items in the bill. The minority members, including a majority of the Republican members of the committee, offered to let the President decide on every specific project. That was an answer to the "challenge," and it is a matter of record that nearly every Democratic member of the River and Harbor Committee and a majority of the Democrats present in the House at the time, on a rising vote and also vote by tellers, refused to permit the President to strike out of the bill unworthy projects.

The country can form its own estimate of the bill when its proponents have not sufficient confidence in their own leader to permit him to strike out worthless items. Although surrounded by Secretary Redfield, Gen. Black, and other gentlemen who advocate and justify extravagant waterway projects, the minority offered to permit the President to strike out, and on that offer agreed to withhold further opposition or criticism of specific items. That proposal was opposed and voted down by Chairman SMALL and his associates on the committee.

LARGE BALANCES ARE AVAILABLE.

The minority, believing that $32,000,000 in balances on hand would abundantly provide for all existing projects and start any needed projects, recommended the defeat of this bill. It was denounced as a pork-barrel measure, and in support of these allegations in the minority report we agreed to permit the President to pass upon all items.

Notwithstanding the president of the national waterway lobby and the first vice president of the Inland Waterway Association, together with Secretary Redfield and Gen. Black, Chief of Engineers, would all have a voice close to the throne, the minority was willing to make the test, but that offer was turned down by the administration's political supporters. The result speaks for itself.

To discuss any single item in the bill intelligently requires more time than can be given under the five-minute rule, so that to discuss scores upon scores of worthless or extravagant items would be impossible under present methods of pork-barrel legislation.

SCORES OF WASTEFUL ITEMS IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

For illustration, Col. Townsend, one of the ablest of all the Army engineers, has repeatedly stated that over 50 rivers and creeks in the Mississippi Valley ought to remain in "statu quo," to use his expression. Only channel work or maintenance should be kept up and extravagant improvement schemes should be stopped until the lower Mississippi and Ohio streams with existing deep channels have been utilized.

Townsend has more intimate knowledge of conditions on the Mississippi River than Gen. Black, who annually recommends millions for wasteful improvements. Practically all of these fifty-odd wasteful items are contained in the pending bill, including $1,000,000 for the lower Missouri land reclamation scheme, $1,200,000 for the upper Mississippi, $600,000 for the Cumberland, $400,000 for the Tennessee, and, in the judgment of many others, with equal force, $5,000,000 for the Ohio River.

No effort will be made to discuss any of these items, although in my extended remarks on June 11, contained in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, data and expert opinions, together with a half century's experience, were offered to show present extravagance and waste on the three largest rivers of the country.

OTHER WASTEFUL ITEMS.

What is said by Col. Townsend about 54 projects in the Mississippi Valley applies with equal force to scores of projects along the Atlantic coast and on the Gulf, including the celebrated Trinity, Brazos, Sabine, Oklawaha, Kissimmee, Congaree, Wateree, Altamaha, Scuppernong, Little Peedee, Big Peedee, Toms River, Raccoon Creek, and other Atlantic coast projects.

It is not contended that all of these projects are entirely worthless; some of them are; but Government expenditures have been wasteful and continue to be wasteful in proportion to the returns.

It is a matter of interest to discover that practically every project in the bill is supposed to be sponsored by some Member or group of Members coming from that particular section of the country. The Maine items are expected to be defended by Maine Members and the Pennsylvania items by Pennsylvania Members, and so on down the coast through North and South Carolina, Florida, Louisiana, Texas, California, and through the interior sections wherever a stream or rivulet has its source and awaits Government funds.

As a corollary every attempt to strike out or criticize items is taken as a personal affront by those most vitally interested, and the shape, character, and method of logrolling of the average pork barrel can best be understood from this fact. These waterway projects are not treated as national waterways, but as local property rights, while the general grab-bag policy instituted against the Public Treasury is manifested by those who wish to make a showing of serving their district or State.

Of course, this system is brought about by present omnibus methods of legislation, and will continue to exist as long as we persist in making waterway improvements an annual "pork" football wherein political considerations form the most important part of such legislation and are put through the posts by mass plays.

MEMBERS FOLLOW DEMANDS OF CONSTITUENTS.

Members carry out the wishes of their constituents, and it is a constant pull and haul on the engineers, on the committee, and finally on Congress to get specific items into the bill and then to get the bill passed. Woe to those who get in the way of the barrel if of sensitive dispositions or tender sensibilities. Members who would not swerve a hair from standards of individual honesty get behind the bill and of every objectionable project in the bill, and that is the irresistible pressure exerted on this bill containing over 400 items scattered over three-fourths of the States of the Union.

For several days the pending bill has been discussed as a whole or by items before the House, and will again be up for consideration following the pending food-control bill. During discussion of the river and harbor bill inquiries have been made of different items. Heretofore many items have been specifically criticized, but as none can be struck from the bill only a few objectionable items have been pointed out during this debate.

THE INDEFENSIBLE GROUPING SYSTEM.

This bill contains many groups of items running from a half dozen in number to from 25 to 30, all in one group, and the Chief of Engineers is permitted to expend the whole amount on any single item of the group at his option. The effect of this new method of grouping is to prevent criticism of specific items as heretofore. For illustration, on June 15 the difficulty existing was pointed out in the following statement:

"Cold Spring and Absecon Inlets, Absecon and Tuckerton Creeks, and Toms River, N. J.: For maintenance, $35,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is an illustration of the bad policy of grouping various projects for maintenance concerning which criticism has been lodged against this bill. Here we have a paragraph containing some five separate items, three or more of which have no estimates, so far as I have been able to ascertain, for maintenance work during the coming year.

Absecon Inlet is referred to. Everyone who has visited Atlantic City knows something about Absecon Inlet and has noticed the dredge there engaged continuously at work in trying to keep open a 12-foot channel running from the ocean into the upper inlet, which dredging is necessary every time they have a storm there. It was originally projected in view of the establishment of a line of steamers from New York to Atlantic City, but that soon was found to be unprofitable and it was abandoned. As far as I know Absecon Inlet has no commerce to-day whatever, except some small sloops that can get in through the natural channel without the necessity of a 12-foot channel.

Thereafter on the same group I presented a further statement to demonstrate the purpose of this new system.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, ordinarily I present official reports and leave the House to draw its own conclusions. In the Cold Springs and Absecon Inlets and Toms River, N. J., items there is a balance of $75,000 shown to be on hand March 1, according to the balance sheets.

This item calls for $35,000, a small amount comparatively, for maintenance, but I desire to show how this money can be used on certain items.

Cold Springs Inlet will be found in Document No. 388, page 5. In the 1916 Engineer's Report, page 2083, he says that it is not practicable to obtain any commercial statistics for Cold Springs Inlet in 1915. Yet we have appropriated $961,200 for that project to date.

That was the report made on that project several years ago; and this last year, after spending over $900,000, there is no commerce developed or reported. Engineer Flagler said, on page 5 of the same document, that the improvement "will increase the attractive features of Cape May to visitors, and a good harbor would doubtless have a very advantageous effect. It would also permit the resumption of yacht races, which at one time they had at Cape May and which form one of the most attractive features of the season." That is the Army engineer's report concerning commercial necessities of Cold Springs Inlet.

Now coming to Absecon Inlet, which had about 5,000 tons of commerce this last year, the engineer said, in the former report, that there was going to be a large profit through saving of freight rates when the project was completed.

On page 7 of Document No. 1395 it was estimated by the engineer that they would save $502,000 annually in freight rates on the tonnage on this project when the project was completed. It is completed now, and how much tonnage did we have last year? Five thousand two hundred and thirty-five tons. They were going to save a half million dollars in freight expenses annually, and yet only 5,000 tons of freight were handled altogether in 1915.

Let us take Toms River, another project. The engineers said in regard to that—

"Toms River is located on one of the principal automobile lines of travel. Dredging it to a suitable depth would increase the traffic, owing to the ease with which owners could communicate with the yachts at this point."

They could come down with their automobiles and get out on the yachts; that was an important consideration. Four thousand nine hundred and ninety tons was the amount of commerce on Toms River in 1915. So, here are three items in the grouping system—Cold Spring Inlet, Absecon Inlet, and Toms River—all of a kind, apparently. I have not spoken of the grouping system before, but how can any Member take that grouping system as proposed and ascertain what money is to be used and where? The Chief of Engineers can use it on any one of these projects, which now have balances of $75,000, and none of which are necessary for any commercial needs or possess any value in proportion to the money that has been expended on them.

Neither Absecon Inlet, Cold Spring Inlet, nor Toms River will stand the light of investigation, but these three items on the New Jersey coast are grouped with others in the pending bill and under the new plan can never be eliminated from such bills as long as the present Chief of Engineers and existing policy governs such bills.

NEARLY 30 ITEMS IN ONE GROUP.

In order to make known this feature of the bill, I quote further from the debate of June 16:

The Clerk read as follows:

"Rockhall, Queenstown, Claiborne, Tilghman Island, Cambridge, and Crisfield Harbors, Elk and Little Elk, Chester, Corsica, Choptank, Tuckahoe, Warwick, La Trappe, Tred Avon, Wicomico, Manokin, and Pocomoke Rivers, Slaughter, Tyaskin, and Broad Creeks, Twitch Cove and Big Thoroughfare River, and Lower Thoroughfare, Deal Island, Md.; Nanticoke River (including Northwest Fork), Del. and Md.; and Broad Creek River, Del.: For maintenance, $15,800."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I invite the attention of the committee——

Mr. SMALL. Is there any motion pending?

Mr. FREAR. I move to strike out the last word. I invite the attention of the committee to this paragraph of the bill which has just been read by the Clerk. Heretofore the statement has been made to the House that it will not be difficult to move to strike out certain items from this grouping system wherever they occur, whenever it is the disposition of the House to do so. I point out here that about 30 items are placed in this group, which never before have been grouped together, with a $50,000 balance remaining to their credit substantially. According to the bottom of page 8 of the bill, substantially 30 items are grouped, while heretofore some of these items have been criticized in the House. I do not propose to enter into any discussion with regard to the individual items now, but I call the attention of the House to the fact that no one hereafter will ever be able to challenge one of these items when it appears in this bill, nor in any other grouping system can you challenge a single item. When it is placed in the bill it stays there. No matter whether it may be worthless, no matter whether there is no commerce on the stream, the money may be poured in there, as we have seen in so many cases, without any return whatever to the public, and we continue to pay that money without an opportunity to know where the money is going or how to get rid of the objectionable items.

Here are 30 items strung all along the coast in this neighborhood and grouped, and some of them have been already criticized. This is only one evidence of the system in which you have covered up for all time any effort hereafter to get after these specific items or to show up the character of them because the appropriation goes to the total and the engineers can give it to any item they choose.

As I stated early in the discussion, in the case of the Toms River and in the case of Cold Springs Inlet and two or three other items that were in that group, the most of which will not stand the light of day, the Army engineers can turn the money over in the same way. It is said, "Oh, yes: you can pick them out: you can move to strike out," but you can not move to strike out unless you have before the committee the amount of money that is to be expended on the item. So I say that the Army engineers have succeeded in preparing a bill which I have no doubt will be followed in the future, and which will prevent striking out of any items by the House.

One further item discussed gives another phase of this grouping system. In the discussion of the bill on June 16 occurs the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

"St. Johns River, Fla., Jacksonville to the ocean, opposite the city of Jacksonville, Jacksonville to Palatka, and Palatka to Lake Harney, Lake Crescent and Dunns Creek, and Oklawaha River, Fla.: For maintenance, $335,000."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I care to ask for five minutes, but I wish to ask the chairman this: We have adopted the grouping system, which has been discussed in several cases, but I can not understand the purpose of the group on the bottom of page 13. On the St. Johns River, Fla., there are several different portions of the river included, and the lower portion of the river has a balance of $239,276 uncontracted for, and $15,000 is for the next item and $16,000 for another item. The Oklawaha River is joined with this group. What is the reason for joining the Oklawaha River in a grouping system of that kind, if the chairman has the information? I know the engineers have assumed charge of this, but what possible reason could they have for that method of grouping and for giving for maintenance $335,000, all of which, of course, might possibly be expended on the Oklawaha River? Of course that would not be likely, but that is a possibility.

Mr. SMALL. I will state that the Oklawaha River empties into the St. Johns River, and that gives it a direct connection with it, and makes the grouping consistent, and of the appropriation $330,000 is for the St. Johns River from Jacksonville to the sea and $5,000 for the maintenance of the Oklawaha.

Mr. FREAR. It would be possible under this grouping system for the Army engineers to use any portion or all of that $335,000, if they desire, on any of these projects, including the Oklawaha River.

WATERWAYS, REAL AND IMAGINARY.

In this connection it may be well to say that after an expenditure of $98,000 by the Government on the Oklawaha, the 1915 commerce is given (p. 2302, Rept. 1916) as 29,393 tons, of which 27,624 tons was floating logs or cheap freight, on the average of 1,769 tons on the whole river, up and down. This amount is less than 5 tons per day, and such statistics are not likely to be underestimated by the interested parties along the bank who furnish the "statistics."

Army engineers have authorized a new project for this river of $733,000, although its present commerce is practically nothing, and under the pending bill we are to place in the hands of Army engineers $335,000 for maintenance of several streams, all of which, under authority conferred in the bill, could be spent on the Oklawaha.

I do not question the integrity of Army engineers nor their disposition to do exactly what Congress expects, but I do know that a distinguished statesman at the other end of the Capitol persuaded the engineers to reverse their position on the Oklawaha, as shown by the official document, and since this bill has been before the House for discussion a gentleman from Florida has assured me that the Senate will again insert the Oklawaha $733,000 new item in the pending bill. With an indefensible system of grouping as disclosed and Congressmen or Senators demanding that generous slices of pork shall be given to some particular community in the group, it is not hard to discover what disposition of funds may be made under that authority. Neither will it be hard to discover that under the grouping system, first undertaken to any particular extent in this pending bill, no further effort can be successful in attempting to strike worthless or wasteful items from such bills.

No attempt will be made in the brief time or space afforded to discuss at length the items in the bill which have caused the minority of the committee to recommend its defeat. Several items will be briefly referred to because of particular significance, and are only taken from among many that have been repeatedly exposed in the past.

A $12,000,000 TO $20,000,000 CANAL ITEM.

In its report the minority said as follows regarding the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal item contained in the bill:

The appropriation of $1,300,000 for the purchase of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal is omitted, but a clause ultimately much more expensive is added by the item authorizing the condemnation of this obsolete waterway. The minority feel that the House should have a thorough understanding of what the condemnation of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal really means. For many years an effort has been made to have this project assumed by the Government. It is a canal 13 miles long, supposedly having a depth of 9 feet which, if taken over by the Government, will mean an expenditure of from $8,000,000 to $12,000,000, or possibly more, in order to secure a depth of 12 feet. A wide stretch of imagination must be used to argue that this can possibly contribute to the present national emergency. It is a part of the so-called intercoastal waterways for which strong influences have been at work. Congress has already adopted portions of this system, and if by influential persuasion from time to time additional sections are adopted, the proponents of the proposition will feel they can consistently argue that the whole system should be connected up by adoption of the final links. Untold millions are involved in this ambitious project. The minority urge that it should not be countenanced by the purchase of this canal as a war measure. It would be a splendid opportunity for owners of worthless stock and depreciated bonds to dispose of them to the Government that helped build this canal, but such financing is no part of the Government's war emergencies.

That is the minority opinion expressed in its report on this link of the intercoastal system. The 13-mile canal link may eventually cost $20,000,000, depending on depth and according to increased costs of construction, while the system of which it is proposed to be a part will eventually involve the Government in an expenditure of from $100,000,000 to double or triple that amount, depending upon the depth provided for innumerable and useless canal "links."

It must be borne in mind that the president of the Interwaterway Association is a distinguished, able, and persistent Member of the House on the Republican side, while the first vice president of that same association is the distinguished chairman of the River and Harbor Committee, whose influence with his Democratic colleagues may be measured from the importance of his position on the committee. All intercoastal measures proposed in river and harbor bills have the vigorous and sustained support of these two gentlemen, and that support was directly enlisted when the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal item was attacked in the House.

When this canal item was reached, which contemplates an eventual expenditure of several million dollars for condemnation of this private canal, a point of order was made against its inclusion in the bill. The point was discussed for an hour or more. In ruling the Chairman, Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi, one of the able parliamentarians of the House, said, "The Chair's own district is vitally interested in the inland waterway proposition." But he ruled, according to precedents, that the River and Harbor Committee had no jurisdiction over canals, and that the item should be sent to the committee having jurisdiction of canals.

That ruling was opposed vigorously by the distinguished gentlemen who have been mentioned, and the decision of the Chair, although based on all precedents, was overturned by a vote of 55 to 42, and on a demand for tellers the Chair's decision was set aside and the item retained in the bill by a vote of 64 to 40.

OVERRULING THE CHAIR TO SECURE AN APPROPRIATION.

I quote the statement of an able parliamentarian of the House, Mr. LENROOT, which was made during that discussion. He said:

I want to make this one observation: Criticisms have been made of certain items in the bill. Other criticisms will be made, no doubt, * * * but if the supporters of this bill are so desperate and the decision of the Chair upon a question of parliamentary law, which is undoubtedly correct, is overruled, it will demonstrate to the country beyond peradventure that this bill is not being considered on its merits, and that whenever there is a piece of pork in it they are willing to violate the rules of the House in order to keep pork in it.

After the vote the following significant observation was further made by the same gentleman, Mr. LENROOT:

What has just transpired in this committee in overruling the decision of the Chair would not have happened on any other bill than a river and harbor bill. * * * It is no secret that many Members of this committee voted to overrule the decision of the Chair fearing that their own items might suffer if they did not do so.

That is the parliamentary procedure accompanying this pork-barrel bill and the result was sure and certain, irrespective of parliamentary usage or the rules of the House.

A motion was then made to strike out the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal item. Upon that motion the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] said:

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I was interested and somewhat amused the other day when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] characterized this item as being rotten, and the criticism was taken as a personal affront by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who at once defended it; and he became so bitter in his criticism I thought we ought to look into the history of this item a little and see whether or not it was above reproach, whether or not there was anything rotten in this item, whether all of the transactions connected with the canal it is proposed to purchase were straight and legitimate. So I got a copy of this letter of the Secretary of War, and what do you suppose I found? I find here that the men in charge of this canal, of a concern where 38 per cent of the stock was paid for out of the Treasury of the United States, and is now owned by the Government, had stolen or permitted to be stolen $609,000 of the bonds of this canal, and the company owning the canal and the Government owns 38 per cent of the stock in this company, is now paying interest upon that amount of bonds that were spirited away, and now we are about to appropriate money, we do not know how much, ten of twelve million dollars, and the fellows who got those bonds will get $609,000 out of the Treasury of the United States for the bonds for which not a dollar, according to this report, was ever paid to the canal company.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not gentleman know that that whole matter was thoroughly investigated by a Senate committee?

Mr. GOOD. I know that whole matter was thoroughly investigated by a commission appointed by Congress to investigate it, and the secretary of the company in his letter says that the total bonds of the company amount to $2,609,000, and that there was included a fraudulent overissue of $609,000.

And yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania complains because the gentleman from Illinois used the mild term of "rotten" when referring to the very rotten canal transaction, a transaction which the secretary of the company itself characterizes as fraudulent.

Thereafter the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said forcefully of this bankrupt canal item:

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this scheme we are about to vote upon very soon now was conceived in iniquity and sin, and it is still iniquitous, and still rotten, and still undeserving, and now we are to purify it by the expenditure of millions of dollars out of the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMALL. Can not the gentleman possibly be serious while indulging in those violent adjectives? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina I never was more serious in my life, and never more serious in my purpose to expose the iniquity involved in this nefarious enterprise, never more serious in my purpose to prevent the consummation of an iniquity, than I am in my purpose to defeat this rotten measure. Does the gentleman think that is serious enough? [Laughter.] If he thinks I am not sufficiently serious, I will say a few more things that are still more serious. Is the gentleman serious in his endeavor to foist this rotten incubus onto the Treasury of the United States? Does he believe that this wart, known as an inland waterway, sought to be purchased on the recommendation of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, is justified as an emergency war measure?

THE CANAL OF NO VALUE FOR SHIP-CANAL PURPOSES.

It may be unnecessary to add more to this record, but I append a further statement made by myself in the discussion of this $20,000,000 canal item:

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] made a remark about his surprise in regard to the appeal of the committee from the decision of the Chair a few moments ago by this committee. We have had two very surprising demonstrations by the committee during the last two days—that of yesterday, when the committee refused to accept the President of the United States as the arbitrator to determine what are war measures in this bill, and this item would have come within that description or category if it had been acceptable to the President; second, after you gentlemen of the committee had failed to put confidence in the Executive by permitting him to pass upon these various items, you have to-day overruled the decision of the Chair on a parliamentary proposition in favor of this $20,000,000 canal, as it will eventually prove to be. In the report—I am reading now from Document 215 of the Fifty-ninth Congress—the report of the Government officers who made the investigation of this 13-mile canal it is said on page 20:

"The value of the work of the present canal as a part of a ship canal is relatively very small and has not been estimated." It is of no value as a commercial or as a naval proposition for a ship canal; and yet we are putting in all these millions to buy what? An old rotten and rotting canal. I know what it is; a canal that has not paid a dollar of dividends to the United States in 40 years, during which time we have placed $450,000 in there; a canal that only paid small dividends for 11 years during a period of nearly 80 years; with stocks now valueless and bonds below par—a bankrupt proposition, a canal that to-day is barely going and does not carry one-half the commerce carried a half century ago.

Before the Senate committee the other day Admiral Benson appeared as a witness. If anyone would be strongly in favor of this proposition, it would be gentlemen who have at heart the naval interests of the Government. Because of the heavy appropriations required for the war he did not consider this canal of value at the present time. He suggested that this canal might be bought in the future.

Secretary Redfield told the committee that it would require $35,000,000 to get several of these propositions, and Admiral Benson, who was interested if any man can be in looking after the naval interests of this Government, says that it is not of importance at this time.

A LONG TIME IN MAKING A WATERWAY.

It would take from 5 to 10 years or more to make it a real although useless waterway.

Think of the proposition. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole is overruled on a plain parliamentary proposition in order to commit the Government to the purchase of a bankrupt canal, with valueless stock and depreciated bonds, at a cost of several million dollars, a canal that is of no value as a ship canal and could not be completed in order to be used by the lightest-draft naval vessels for many years to come.

The proposition involves an eventual expenditure of possibly $20,000,000 for this 13-mile canal, and that is one of the items contained in the bill, by setting aside the rules of the House, a method of keeping it in the bill.

The principal officers of the Inland Waterway Association have made good their determination to fasten that bankrupt canal on the Government, but I doubt if it will ever be permitted to become law.

I have offered statements made on the floor not in an effort to discuss the demerits of the canal proposition but to show the general situation surrounding this particular item.

FORCING EXTRAVAGANT AMENDMENTS FOR WORTHLESS PROJECTS.

In order to further demonstrate legislative methods accompanying this river and harbor bill, I take up another item that was under consideration on June 16 and quote from the RECORD:

The Clerk read as follows:

"Winyah Bay, Waccamaw, Little Pedee, and Great Peedee Rivers, S. C.: For maintenance, $70,000.

"Santee, Wateree, and Congaree Rivers, S. C.: For maintenance, including the Estherville-Minim Creek Canal and the Congaree River as far up as the Gervais Street Bridge, Columbia, and for improvement of the Congaree River in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 702, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $30,000."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do it with better satisfaction because I know that the gentleman who is interested in the new project on the Congaree River is present.

Lines 13 and 14 of the bill contain items which have been criticized heretofore, and I shall not refer to them, excepting to say that on the Little Pedee River there was spent for office expenses last year $739, and nothing was spent for actual improvement, according to the report of the Army engineers.

The Congaree River has had spent upon it thus far something like $668,298, and $1,268,000 for the Congaree, Santee, and Wateree combined. After all that expenditure of money we have secured 4,000 tons of commerce each year on an average. On page 3 of the document the engineer says:

"I therefore report that the further improvement by the United States of the Congaree River, S. C., is deemed advisable to the extent of maintaining a 4-foot navigable channel by dredging, assisted by properly designed bank protection, and recommend that this protection be provided first at Congaree and Gill Creek, and that $10,000 be provided in one appropriation for that purpose, together with $10,000 annually for the operation of the dredge now owned by the work, and for other necessary maintenance."

In the hearings that were held upon this proposition—and I have them before me—the engineer, Col. Newcomer, stated it was not deemed advisable to go on with this improvement at this time; but subsequently, it seems, gentlemen interested in the project went before the committee and it was inserted. It is inserted in this war measure. Let us see what we have before us in that proposition.

It is stated on page 8 of the document that at present "nothing which could be described as terminal facilities in the usual meaning of those terms are on the river." There is only an ordinary river landing with a small tent to protect freight; and that is true at Columbia.

Now, we have spent over $600,000 on this stream, and here we are called upon to spend $100,000 more for the purpose, apparently, of revetment work along the banks.

A COSTLY OLD STERN-WHEELER.

That is the report of the board, and the improved facilities for navigation consist of one stern-wheeler, according to the engineers' report, which made last year 36 trips, and in the last three years has averaged about 4,000 tons of commerce annually. After an appropriation of $600,000 for this river during past years we are asked to spend $100,000 more, in addition to $30,000 through this war-measure waterway bill.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate may close in seven minutes, two minutes to be occupied by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to add to what I have stated, because I simply read from the report. I do desire to read what Col. Newcomer stated to the committee, which may be of interest in regard to this item. When $30,000 was mentioned as a maintenance item, Mr. TREADWAY said to the colonel, "May I ask the immediate need for this appropriation?" and the colonel replied:

"Col. NEWCOMER. This is mainly for use on the Congaree River. You know that from Columbia out they are maintaining a barge line, and the Columbia merchants claim, of course, that it is a matter of great importance for them to have that barge line in operation, and this is mainly for maintenance work on the Congaree River. In the last bill there was an additional improvement authorized, but we left that out because we thought it was not sufficiently urgent."

That is the statement of the engineer before the committee. I do not question the interest and the anxiety of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], but I am making this statement for the benefit of this committee, to show the lack of necessity for this project at this time. That is the testimony placed before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors which you are now asked to set aside.

Thereupon the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] arose to defend this particular proposition and, heaping injury upon injury, offered an amendment increasing the maintenance item from $30,000 to $80,000 in addition to the $100,000 item previously mentioned. On this amendment I offered additional official testimony, but the committee overturned the feeble protest of the chairman and voted in the entire $180,000, in addition to $668,298 heretofore appropriated, for a river or creek that only has one stern-wheel boat, making 36 trips a year, and which, after an expenditure of some $668,000 by the Government, returns about 4,000 tons of miscellaneous traffic annually, or about one or two good trainloads. And yet the chairman of the committee challenges the minority to produce a single item in the bill that is not proper or necessary.

OPPOSITION TO SUCH BILLS IS NOT SECTIONAL.

In this connection it is well to remember that the distinguished Senator from South Carolina first denounced these river and harbor bills as "humbugs and steals." It is also worthy of remark that the same statesman from the old South State has consistently opposed such bills during recent years.

In the same connection I quote the clean-cut statement of another gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], who said during debate in reference to the pending bill:

I have voted against every river and harbor bill for the last four years, but never before have I raised my voice in protest. But you have exceeded the speed limit, and I now wish to protest against it in time of war. I not only protest against it, but the people of America will protest against it, and they will be justified.

That sentiment is offered to the gentleman from North Carolina, who talks about the "bar of public opinion." Opposition to these bills is growing and is not sectional, and I commend the opinions of the Senator from South Carolina and the gentleman from the same State [Mr. BYRNES] when it is pretended that opposition to these bills is sectional.

I pass over many items in the bill that neither invite confidence from a war or commercial standpoint. From the fact that none of these items are believed to be of sufficient importance to require the passage of a bill at this time, according to the minority, it will be understood that none require appropriations in addition to the balances now on hand.

PROJECTS INSERTED AS "WAR MEASURES."

An item of $66,000 for the mouth of the Brazos River and $150,000 for Freeport Harbor, or $216,000, is urged as a military necessity. It is difficult to set forth the facts regarding this item in a few words but to claim it is a military necessity is to discount ordinary judgment of men in or out of Congress.

Document No. 1469, Sixty-third Congress, third session, is relied upon to sustain the claim. It may be well to know that $956,264 has thus far been appropriated for the mouth of the Brazos, near which Freeport is located (p. 2499, 1916 report), and a balance of $161,890 uncontracted was on hand March 1 last. A commerce in 1915 is reported of 149,335 tons, including 58,208 tons of sulphur valued at $1,164,160. In favor of the item it is urged we must dig the Brazos River up to the village of Freeport in order to help ship sulphur, because sulphur is necessary for munitions of war.

It appears that a channel at the mouth of the river 18 feet deep at low water has been completed and in existence for years and that depth has been maintained by the Government (p. 968, 1916 report). Engineers now recommend $455,000 for a deeper channel to include operation of a dredge with an initial appropriation of $255,000 and $100,000 annually thereafter.

Such a dredge will probably be sufficient to provide a reasonably permanent channel about 22 feet in depth from the jetties up to the present wharf and leave some time which can be devoted to the maintenance of the intercoastal canal adjacent to the river and perhaps for such extension of the project upstream toward the town of Freeport as may be found desirable.

The italics are not in the report.

Briefly, it is proposed to spend $455,000 for a new project and $100,000 annually thereafter for maintenance, ostensibly to dredge the mouth of the Brazos 4 feet but also for work on a shallow intercoastal canal and to dredge the Brazos River 6 miles or more up to Freeport, from its present depth of 10 feet to 22 feet.

Under the proposed authority engineers acting on the urgent advice of the locality, can use the money practically as they see fit on any waterway.

AN EXPERIMENTAL PROJECT—NOT A WAR MEASURE.

Gen. Black, the present Chief of Engineers, as senior member of the board recommends the project on pages 6 and 7.

On page 6 of Document No. 1469 he says:

This project (22 feet) should be considered tentative and in a sense experimental, and its continuance should depend upon the commercial and navigation developments during a period of three years after the plant has been put in operation. The cost of maintenance is high, and it is believed that work should not be continued beyond that time unless a commerce of considerable magnitude shall have been developed.

And it is recommended as an urgency war project.

That is the same general language adopted for Absecon Inlet and many other projects, although Army engineers know that when once adopted the locality, through its Representative, never permits a project to be abandoned, while the present situation on the Brazos River, Trinity, Arkansas, and other similar projects shows a failure of commerce to develop and refusal of Congress to abandon worthless waterway projects. This project is urged because of sulphur mines near Freeport, a new town about 6 miles above deep water, but Freeport wants to be brought down to the sea. An attached map in the document shows that for years vessels have loaded at the railway wharf down on the river several miles below Freeport and Velasco. A railway brings sulphur and other freight down to the wharf, to deep water, whereas a crooked stream some 6 miles in length and 10 feet deep must be dredged out to give Freeport a river or harbor.

At the time of the last census Velasco was a small village of less than a thousand people, while Freeport was unknown according to the official reports, but Freeport now wants a harbor 6 miles up the river, and because sulphur mines are near Freeport and sulphur is being shipped from railway terminals down the river at deep water Army engineers urge this project as a war measure.

Increased depth at the mouth of the river for boats of larger draft presents a question similar to that on the James River, where the same relative depths present and proposed occur, but the effort to include the intercoastal canal and a 22-foot river up to Freeport is of a different character.

POLITICAL PULL INVOLVED.

Document No. 1469 is illuminating because it contains resolutions from 25 or 30 towns scattered from Coffeyville, Kans., to Kansas City, Mo., which all resolute in favor of Freeport Harbor according to page 32. Some 20 or more of these resolutions are printed in full in the Engineer document, and the identical language employed in many of the resolutions shows how systematic and thorough has been the publicity bureau located at Freeport.

In every resolution the Senators and Representatives from Texas and other neighboring States are instructed to work for Freeport, and inferentially any bill that contains the Freeport item.

A generous Government has thus far appropriated $1,991,192 for the Brazos River, in addition to $956,000 near the mouth of the river and a few hundred thousands on intersecting canals near the river.

After appropriating nearly $2,000,000 for the Brazos River proper we are informed by the Engineers Report, 1916, pages 2501 and 2502, that "no commercial statistics are obtainable" and "no freight is carried on this section of the river," on which a million and a half dollars has been expended by the Government. Like a pork sausage the familiar answer is offered that a few more "links" are necessary. The balance remaining available on the Brazos River and mouth, uncontracted for on March 1, was $372,432. That will meet pressing needs on this "project."

Mr. Callaway, a Texas Congressman, began dissecting the annual pork-barrel bill back in 1913. His criticisms of the Trinity, Brazos, and intercoastal canal, in Texas, are familiar to many Members, but in order to furnish direct evidence of the character of the Brazos River, disclosed by a Texas Member, his testimoney before the House is again submitted.

BRAZOS RIVER.

When a previous bill was up, about a year ago, the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Callaway, at page 6495, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 7, 1916, made the following comment on the Brazos and Trinity Rivers:

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am acquainted with the Brazos River. I and mine have been acquainted with it as long as Mr. Guyler, and we know it nearly as well. Our friends from Texas, if they do not get appropriations for the Brazos, Trinity, and Red Rivers, would not vote for the intercoastal canal. [Laughter.]

Let us look at the Brazos. As I said when I was talking about the Trinity, I am not partial to the Brazos. It is as good as many other projects in the bill. It is as good as the Trinity, and they look alike. They are both infinitely better than the intercoastal canal.

From the mouth of the Brazos to old Washington we have spent $425,462.15. From old Washington to Waco, the present head of navigation—from old Washington to Waco we have spent up to the present time $1,350,654.74.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Has the gentleman any explanation of what we have got for the amount we have expended?

Mr. CALLAWAY. You had a Congressman here for 18 years. [Laughter.] My colleague [Mr. Henry] could say, like the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], of the Mississippi River, that he knows it is navigable because he has navigated it time and time again to Congress. [Laughter.] Now, we have expended up to the present time on these sections $1,776,116.89, and we are asked to appropriate $215,000 additional on that proposition, making $1,900,000, in round numbers, that we have spent on the Brazos River up to the present time. Let us see what they say about the commerce. The Engineer's report says:

"No freight is now carried on this section of the river. There can be no commercial effect of the improvement until it is completed."

Mr. Chairman, it is estimated that it will cost about $10,000,000. They have been at work on it for 15 years. They have spent up to the present time about $2,000,000. In 15 years if they have spent $2,000,000, and no traffic can go up the river until it is completed, and if we work in the future as we have in the past we will spend $10,000,000 in five times 15 years, or 75 years, from the time it was begun, or 60 years yet.

About the same proposition applies to the Trinity. It is estimated to cost $10,000,000, and, according to the way they are working at it, it will take 41 years yet to complete it.

Children of the men who are getting the appropriation for the river may see this project completed. A large part of the time there is no water in the river to furnish navigation, even if they had locks and dams.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman wish the House to understand that there is no water in either the Trinity or the Brazos?

SPENDING $2,000,000 FOR "WATER AT TIMES."

Mr. CALLAWAY. Oh, there is some water. You can find water at times. [Laughter.] Here is an interesting letter concerning the Brazos put into the RECORD April 7, 1916, by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. The writer, Mr. Guyler, is president of a bank, as well as vice president of other banks, and connected with other business interests:

WALLIS, TEX., January 26, 1916.

HON. JAMES A. FREAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Noticing in the press your attitude respecting appropriations toward improvement of various streams and more particularly those applying to the Brazos and Trinity Rivers of Texas, I felt constrained to write you expressing my complete approval of your course. I am a native Texan, born and raised within 2 miles of the Brazos River; am 50 years old. My father and myself have owned land bordering on the Brazos for 58 years. I now own one tract which borders river for about 3 miles. I beg your pardon for mentioning these items. It is done to evidence my familiarity with the subject. The Brazos is an alluvial-banked stream; easily caves in banks. The work the Government has done and is doing is so utterly useless that it is contemptible and farcical, and apart from the absolute, complete, total, utter waste of such appropriations; engineers have made regulations which are costing the people along the banks of said streams large sums of money.

I will mention two. If I should put in a ferry, I have to raise my cable 60 feet above low water; 40 feet ordinarily would do. This additional height necessitates longer cables and stronger and more costly posts for elevating. The same applies to bridges. It has cost the people of Fort Bend County at least $40,000 excess to erect four bridges across the river, and this same expense will apply to every bridge and ferry from the mouth to Waco. The reason given for this is to allow height sufficient to clear steamboats. Now, I have lived on Brazos for 50 years and my father since 1858, and never in all that time has there ever been a steamboat either up or down, except the Government snag boat and possibly one or two small gasoline boats sent out by Waco boosters to prove the navigability of the stream. I am not a civil engineer, but I believe it would be cheaper to dig a canal from the Gulf to Waco than attempt to deepen the Brazos; and if an honest capable engineer would investigate, without being wined and feted by those interested, it would be overwhelmingly defeated. Our politicians seemed to be governed by those who make the loudest noise, and the common people have no horns or bands or champions.

I wish you every success. No patriotic American can continue to support such heartless graft. We educate our children that it is proper and commendable to steal from the Government. You are welcome to use my name.

Yours, respectfully, R. W. GUYLER.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the people of Texas that here is an honest man, a man who shows statesmanship, for his home country, and will be a good candidate, in view of the vacancy which may occur, as I am informed, in that district. [Applause.]

EDUCATING CHILDREN TO STEAL FROM THE GOVERNMENT.

I call attention not only to the judgment of Representative Callaway of Texas, regarding the Brazos River, but to the voluntary letter of President R. W. Guyler, of the Wallis bank and other banks, when he says:

No patriotic American can continue to support such heartless graft. We educate our children that it is proper and commendable to steal from the Government. You are welcome to use my name.

R. W. GUYLER.

Mr. Guyler says the Brazos River project is a steal and heartless graft. Congressman Callaway, of the same State, gives a similar estimate, and Senator TILLMAN characterizes such bills as humbugs and steals.

I commend the judgment of these gentlemen to those who profess to believe opposition to such waste is sectional.

The appropriation of $216,000 for Freeport Harbor is no worse than the attempt in the next succeeding item, page 18 of the bill, to transfer $398,700 on hand for the Ouachita from one useless lock to another on that river, while the "sulphur immediately" argument is of the same character and equally unjustified when it appears in the $230,000 new project appropriation on the Mermentau Canal (p. 16) which involves $460,000 more for "sulphur."

These items can not be specifically discussed in 5 or 10 minutes, but before leaving the sulphuric smell accompanying these items, I quote from Document No. 705, Sixty-fourth Congress, page 11, affecting the Mermentau Canal, referred to in the minority report:

The operators of the large sulphur mine at Sulphur, La., it is understood, contemplate the dredging of a feeder canal at their own expense * * * in case the canal is widened or deepened.

And on such flimsy basis $460,000 more is to be put into a hopeless canal that has thus far absorbed over $700,000—pages 2456 and 2459, 1916 report—and in the pending bill carries $230,000 more for a proposition that smells violently of sulphur without any connecting feeder canal to dissipate the odor.

THE MINORITY REPORT ON A LOS ANGELES $1,000,000 PROJECT.

In the minority report filed by Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa, seven members of the River and Harbor Committee subscribe to a statement, page 2, that the bill contains "an indefinite amount for Los Angeles and Richmond, Cal., both of which last-named harbors show very decided appearances of reclamation schemes."

A member of the committee from California takes vigorous exception to so much of the above as relates to Los Angeles and arraigned the minority for a claimed misstatement, and incidentally berated the entire Republican Party for its opposition evidenced against "pork-barrel" bills. The pointed suggestion that Los Angeles and California may secede from the Republican Party permanently if such opposition continues is respectfully referred to those who are piloting the party's fortunes. If the allowance or rejection of pork or even legitimate appropriations is to control the political preferences of California, providence has an important work to do in California. If any Member supports this bill because appropriations are to be given to his particular section, that standard of politics, whether Republican or Democratic, will not serve to influence those who oppose this bill.

It is improper to state how the minority report was prepared, or that the first knowledge of the specific Los Angeles criticism came from other members of the minority, but I am not willing to say this item or the Richmond Harbor item are proper items in this bill or in any bill, and, believing that official documents should be offered to determine the character of projects, I refer to Document No. 462, Sixty-fourth Congress, which was not examined, however, until after this bill was reached in general debate.

IS IT A RECLAMATION OR DRAINAGE PROJECT?

The Los Angeles item, on page 24 of the bill, proposes an estimated cost to the United States of $1,080,000 to protect Los Angeles and Long Beach Harbors, Cal., "from the deposit of silt." Page 3, Document No. 462.

Referring to the map accompanying the document, it appears the Government is to divert the waters of neighboring streams by dams or dikes under what is known as "plan D."

This proposed Government dam and diversion channel begins about 5 miles east of Long Beach and does not reach within 30 miles of the city of Los Angeles. The dam thence extends back into the country about 15 miles to the village of Dominguez, on the Southern Pacific Railway, and about 10 miles from the sea, forming a dike or dam around the village of Long Branch and covering approximately 100 square miles of protected territory and property.

> In this connection it should be added that the lands crossed by the diversion will in general be enhanced in value through the drainage afforded to the water-logged areas, the leaching out of the alkali, the opportunity afforded for proper irrigation at flood times in place of damaging inundation, and the silt which may be drawn upon the lands from the canal as desired during floods.

On page 2 the Acting Chief of Engineers says the canal and dam are important because—> the floods are thus destructive to the ranches by denuding them or by depositing sand, gravel, or bowlders upon their improved lands.

On page 34 Col. Rees, a reclamation authority, says:

> The plan now suggested is based upon the proposition that it is desirable to bring all the flood waters into one channel at the highest possible point—10 to 15 miles inland—and confine them in that channel all the way to an outlet in the sea at Alamitous Bay, and thus protect all the lower country from floods.

Other references in the document appear relating to the general benefits to be incurred by business and private interests irrespective of navigation.

On page 49 of the document appear repeated statements of engineers and chiefs of engineers rejecting the proposal to place this burden upon the Government.

On page 73—January 27, 1915—a United States Senator, two Members of Congress, one Congressman elect, and a dozen other prominent gentlemen came before Col. Black and the board and offered expert evidence that persuaded the obdurate engineer's department that dikes were desirable, even though constructed at Government expense.

HERE ARE THE ITEMS PROPOSED FOR NAVIGATION.

Eventually the engineers surrendered, and on page 30 they agree to build the dam and suggest that it be used as an elevated macadamized oiled road. On page 7 is given a statement of the items of Government expense needed to help "navigation":

Dam	$134,542
Cut east of railroad	544,440
Two levees	131,333
One other levee	44,667
Bank protection on curves	50,000
Dam protection	34,066
Contingencies, 15 per cent	141,514
Total	1,080,009

Possibly the Government has built levees 15 miles inland elsewhere along the coast to protect cities and villages from surface waters. If so, the further possibilities of draining the Government Treasury are infinite. When it was proposed to expend $18,700,000 for Muscle Shoals to help navigation the project looked like such a stupendous fraud that Congress refused to adopt the project, but I doubt if any project will be found from Portland, Me., to Portland, Oreg., where the Government in the name of "navigation" has built a dam 10 miles into the country to protect a community from surface water. Undoubtedly the project takes added importance from the fact that the top is to be oiled and macadamized for highway purposes, but after an examination of the official engineer's document I submit the minority report, so severely criticized because of its allusion to the Los Angeles projects, is correct and understates manifest objections to this surface-water protection dam to be erected with a terminal 5 miles away from Long Beach Harbor and as far from Los Angeles as a land-reclamation project is from navigation. Only a yielding Army engineer, confronted by a squadron of coast statesmen, could find any relation between this diking project and real navigation.

RICHMOND HARBOR, ANOTHER LAND RECLAMATION SCHEME.

No apologies will be offered by this member of the minority for criticizing the Richmond Harbor project as a land-reclamation scheme.

I have driven over the project, literally, because it extends over a lowland that is to be excavated for an "inner harbor." I was not banqueted or dined by an enthusiastic real estate element of the population, but the general purposes of the scheme were set forth by tax-ridden residents, who protested against what they declared was a wholesale grab from the Government Treasury in order to benefit real estate speculators. Let us see what evidence is afforded on the subject of Richmond's inner harbor, which is another "war measure" project contained in the pending bill.

This project is set forth in Document No. 575, Sixty-third Congress. Although the bill only carries $100,000, the project calls for $428,000 payment from the Government.

On page 2, the report says:

> The board states that the plan now proposed would confer special benefits to the immediate vicinity, would add largely to the taxable property of the city (and to private interests), and would give value to the city land yet to be improved.

On page 10, the report states:

> The area covered by the proposed harbor has been divided into tide lots and sold by the State of California to individuals. The validity of the title to these lots is in question, but it appears that when such lots are permitted to be reclaimed the title becomes good.
> Here we have city lots that the Government is about to dig out or fill in to create a harbor for "war purposes."

In passing over the project it is well to note at the top of page 6, Document No. 515, that, notwithstanding all the pressing necessities of this boom town and its possibilities, "there are no public wharves and the existing private wharves are built for special purposes and are not available for general use."

Affecting the real estate proposition, reading from page 12:

> It was considered inadvisable to reclaim lots for individual owners or to run the risk of having them refuse permission to dump material on their lots without compensation, hence the recommendation that the city should acquire these lots, own the reclaimed land, and administer them for harbor and terminal purposes under municipal control.

Why not make parks and cherry orchards out of these lands in the interests of navigation and in these "war-time emergency" bills, why not dredge out lots "for individual owners" just to show the Government is liberal with money drawn from individual taxpayers living all the way from the Atlantic to the Pacific. This proposed harbor project for naval purposes was turned down by the Government in Document No. 1946, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, part 2.

From the December, 1915, number of the Army and Navy News, published at San Francisco, I quote, page 7, a pointed editorial, as follows:

> For years the United States Army and Navy have suffered from the niggardliness of pork-barrel Congressmen, who have vigorously opposed proper military expenditures, but have cheerfully poured out millions for a public building in a crossroads village or for dredging useless streams (or harbors) in their districts. That made them strong with their constituents; it meant pork.

Turning over to pages 18, 19, and 20, among the patent-medicine ads of the same preparedness publication, is a description of "ringing resolutions" to Congress read by the postmaster of Berkeley, demanding an inner harbor for Richmond. A handsomely designed map, prepared by Col. Rees, United States Army, is close up to reading matter, while half-page real estate ads and smaller ones, at so much per square inch, frame the reading matter, advising gullible nibblers that "anything in, around, or near Richmond will yield a handsome return if bought right." As at Muscle Shoals, members of a former Rivers and Harbors Committee are conveniently grouped for effective coloring in pictures to show it is O. K.

After Uncle Sam begins dredging his several-million-dollar project on Richmond flats, bogs, and marshes overlooking the Standard Oil works that surround the flats and bogs, we learn, page 19, "every indication tells the observant visitor that Richmond is the site of one of the largest western cities of the near future." Like a half century ago, the country will unanimously sing, "On to Richmond." Incidentally, Richmond had 6,802 inhabitants last census. But Richmond is being boosted primarily by Uncle Sam, secondarily by those behind the real estate project.

"COL. SELLERS" LIKEWISE SAW MILLIONS IN EYE WATER.

On page 20 of the Army and Navy News is a photographic signature of "Thos. A. Rees, Lt. Col.," following paid reading matter, to prove what no one would otherwise believe—that Army Engineers have recommended this project. Rear Admiral Pond, United States Navy, is also persuaded to subscribe to a statement, same page, "At first sight it has appeared to some that the cost of a station thus formed would be prohibitive," but real estate advocates of a greater Richmond, surrounded by Standard Oil works, think differently, and so forth. Digging a 30-foot harbor on Anacostia Flats is equally feasible and of far greater public value.

A statement authorized by President Anson S. Blake, of the quarry company that owns a wharf at Richmond is forwarded me by irate taxpayers who object to being taxed to contribute to this real estate speculation project. I quote:

DUCK BLINDS TO BRING DOWN UNITED STATES CASH.

The project for the improvement by the United States Government of the so-called Inner Harbor at Richmond, Cal., had its origin in the resourceful minds of a group of very active real estate dealers, who wished to make use of a Government improvement for the purpose of reclaiming and making valuable some of their tidelands, and for giving additional advertisement and prestige to the part of the city where they have large financial interest.

The Richmond Inner Harbor project is not based upon the actual commercial or transportation needs of the community. If the Inner Harbor, which is a mud flat, were not improved for 20 years or more, no harm and no injustice would be done to the community, nor would the business or water-borne commerce of San Francisco Bay suffer in the least. All of the growing needs of the port of San Francisco for the next decade will be more than met by Government improvements which are being made on the Oakland water front.

The appropriation now asked for the improvement of Richmond Harbor is only a small part of what it is hoped will be ultimately expended on this project. The plan of the Board of Engineers for the complete improvement of the west side of the bay, including Richmond, carries with it, in all its details, an expenditure of more than $18,000,000. Conservative estimates by competent engineers have fixed the total cost of this harbor scheme within the city of Richmond at not less than $50,000,000. The mud now underlying the water covering some of the projected excavations for the same reaches an estimated depth of 50 feet in places, and may be safely averaged at 25 feet.

The city of Richmond has already built one municipal wharf, which more than takes care of local water-borne traffic. There is no genuine demand at present for harbor facilities for the city of Richmond, nor will there be for many years. The private wharves already constructed at said city have abundant facilities for a hundred times the local business which is now transacted over them. There is a large amount of tonnage handled in Richmond, but it is through tonnage and has no relation to local requirements. The present tonnage is mainly handled by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe; the Richmond Belt Railroad; Standard Oil Co.; Healy-Tibbitts Construction Co.; California Wine Association; Los Angeles Pressed Brick Co.; and Blake Bros. Co. More than 95 per cent of this tonnage merely passes through the city of Richmond, and is in no way associated with local business needs. This fact is important to bear in mind, as extravagant claims have been made by interested parties before the House committee at various times, the purpose of which is to try and show that all of this tonnage is part of the business pertaining to the city of Richmond and its municipal harbor facilities.

The Richmond Belt Railroad Co. built a wharf at Richmond in 1905 at a cost of more than $100,000. It has the deepest water frontage of any wharf on the Bay of San Francisco.

This structure is an established transcontinental terminal and enjoys the same advantages and freight rates as San Francisco. It is connected with the city of Richmond and its manufacturing district by the Belt Railroad. This company has made a formal offer to undertake to transact over its wharf all the business pertaining to the city of Richmond for the next 20 years and to give ample security for performance. Only at rare intervals has it been used to 5 per cent of its capacity, and the prospects of its future use seem little better.

The Richmond Belt Railroad passes along this wharf, and freight can be transferred direct from vessels to cars. It can accommodate the biggest ships afloat, as it stands in water 35 to 40 feet deep.

It is alleged that this harbor scheme has been promoted by real estate speculators, who have secured election to the city council and other offices in Richmond for the purpose of advancing real estate operations. Their agents have been scattered over the various States, and the names of Government officials have been freely used to induce people having no adequate knowledge of the facts to invest their money in these attractively advertised enterprises. The tendency of such proceedings is to enable speculators to induce people to contract for their lots on a partial cash basis, and to secure purchasers who will likely abandon further payments when the true character of the property is known.

Only a small portion of these lot buyers are looking to actual occupation of the same. The final result is to load down legitimate enterprises in the city with excessive taxation, and to attract a class of people who are only waiting to get out of bad investments at the least loss.

It appears in several places in the reports of the Government engineers that adjacent to the southerly frontage of Richmond there is a "wide, flat area, well suited for manufacturing and industrial plants." A close observer of this locality would perceive that much of this land is now under water, and that much of it is cut up into small lots, the numbers of some of which are indicated by stakes stuck in the mud. There are numerous duck blinds in the vicinity. These lands are being sold through the use of colored maps and extravagant advertisements which present a very different view of the vicinity, and the names of Government officials, doubtless without their knowledge, are being used to further these sales. There is also mention in the reports of the Government engineers of "special benefits" to the "immediate vicinity" of the contemplated harbor work. The only persons benefited to this date, so far as can be ascertained, are the real estate speculators.

Having captured the political machinery, the real estate clique is beginning to overload the community with taxes to such an extent that there is real apprehension on the part of established industries that the legitimate development of the town will be checked and many new business enterprises be driven elsewhere in order to escape exorbitant taxation.

TAXPAYERS PROTEST AGAINST THE LAND SPECULATION SCHEME.

Here follows a significant appeal and protest from nearly fourteen hundred taxpayers of Richmond City, who paid over one-fourth of all the taxes assessed in 1914. This protest went to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors before the committee visited Richmond's city lots covered by water. The protest is as follows:

To the honorable the COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES:

The undersigned who are all enrolled taxpayers of the city of Richmond, Cal., hereby respectfully protest to your honorable committees against any further appropriations by the United States for the so-called "inner harbor" within said city of Richmond, upon the grounds that the said project has already involved the city in a large debt to no useful purpose; that the same is absolutely impracticable, and was put on foot by real-estate speculators, contractors, and others to further their own interests at the expense of the city and its taxpayers, who will reap no benefit therefrom. That this project will, if prosecuted, needlessly create a much greater debt upon the city and turn away legitimate business enterprises from it.

East Shore Co., by C. C. Sullivan, secretary, Richmond, Cal.; Richmond Belt Railway, by R. J. Woods, secretary, Richmond, Cal.; Berkeley Steel Co., by R. C. Berkeley, president, Richmond, Cal.; Blake Bros. Co., by Anson S. Blake, president, Richmond, Cal.; Standard Oil Co., by D. G. Scofield, president, Richmond, Cal.; the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., by A. H. Payson, assistant to president, Richmond, Cal.; Western Pipe & Steel Co. of California, by J. W. Mason, president, Richmond, Cal.; Pacific Sanitary Manufacturing Co., by Wm. S. Eby, Richmond, Cal.; California Wine Association, by Louis S. Wetmore, general manager, Winehaven, Cal.

I certify from actual examination that the foregoing signers paid more than one-fourth of all the taxes assessed in the city of Richmond for the year 1914.

LEVI BOSWELL.

RICHMOND TAXPAYERS' ASSOCIATION.

This association represents about 700 small taxpayers in Richmond.

LEVI BOSWELL, Chairman.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
County of Contra Costa, ss:

Levi Boswelll being duly sworn, on oath says that he is chairman of the Richmond Taxpayers' Association, which is an organization of taxpayers of the city of Richmond, Cal., formed about two years ago to prevent excessive taxation in said city; that as such chairman he caused a protest to be presented to and circulated among the taxpayers of said city of Richmond during the months of October and November, A. D. 1915, and of which the following is a true copy, viz:

"To the honorable MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF RICHMOND:

"The undersigned, who are taxpayers in the city of Richmond, Cal., hereby respectfully protest against any further increase of taxation upon our property for any purpose, and also to the issuance of any additional bonds by the city except for strictly municipal government purposes, such as the erection of schoolhouses when actually needed or the acquirement of grounds for such purposes."

That said protest was signed during said months by 1,377 taxpayers of said Richmond. All the persons who signed said protest as aforesaid were upon the assessment roll of said city, and a very large proportion of them resided therein. They were mostly voters and small taxpayers. Affiant further states that he has in his possession and control the signatures of said signers to said protest, and the matters stated in this affidavit are true of his own knowledge. Affiant further states that during the months of October and November, A. D. 1914, about 700 small taxpayers of said city signed a protest against any increase of taxation.

LEVI BOSWELL.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 3d day of December, A. D. 1915.

Notary Public in and for the County of Contra Costa, State of California.

OTHER TESTIMONY ON THIS REAL ESTATE PROJECT.

It takes some time to defend the minority's statement that Richmond Harbor is a real estate reclamation project, but the charge is supported not only by official documents from which I have quoted but by other reliable data.

I now quote from statement made by E. S. Pillsbury, president of the Richmond Belt Line Railway, who, if anybody, ought to be interested in developing a harbor frontage at Richmond if the project was genuinely for commerce.

On page 4 of his statement appears the following:

An ex-mayor of Richmond is interested in the promotion of schemes for selling lands in said city, which lands are adjacent and contiguous to the so-called "inner-harbor" project of the city, and they are now being offered for sale upon representation of benefits to accrue by reason of this harbor.

He also quotes Col. Rees' statement—that no public wharves are in Richmond, and the existing private wharves are built for specific purposes and are not available for general use.

Since that date, it appears, one wharf has been built by the city as an evidence of sustained hope in the land-reclamation project.

On page 5, Pillsbury says, in answer to extravagant statements of Richmond land boosters:

What has been said by promoters about tonnage pertaining to Richmond is ridiculous. Nearly all of it passes through the city. As well might one try to magnify the importance of Winnemucca, Nev., by showing the tonnage which passes through it over the transcontinental railroads. The wharf business of the city is negligible.

Speaking of present wharfage facilities, he continues:

The Belt Co. would gladly undertake to transact over its wharf all the local wharf business pertaining to Richmond for the next 20 years, and give ample security for performance. Only at rare intervals has it been used to 5 per cent of its capacity and the prospect for the future seems no better.

He further says the wharf is 1,000 feet long and stands in water from 30 to 45 feet in depth, and that during the last five years no wharfage or dockage charges on any freight has been made.

Compare a depth of water at a real wharf reaching 45 feet, in contrast with tide lots where automobiles and other vehicles now meander, and which only floats skiffs at flood tide.

Referring to the official engineer's report that a wide flat area well suited for manufacturing and industrial plants now exists, Mr. Pillsbury says:

A close observer would perceive that a good deal of this land is now under water, and that much of it is cut up in small lots, the numbers to some of which are indicated by stakes stuck in the mud. There are numerous duck blinds in the vicinity. These lands are being sold through the use of colored maps and extravagant advertisements which present a very different view of the vicinity, while the names of United States Government officials are being used to further these sales.

GOVERNMENT AID FOR REAL ESTATE SPECULATORS.

I do not know who is referred to as "Government officials," but I have before me a copy of the Army and Navy News, in which Thomas H. Rees, lieutenant colonel, Engineers, connected with the Los Angeles diking project, makes this statement over his lithographed signature—issue December, 1915, page 20:

The material to be dredged from the harbor by the Government and by the city will be used to fill up and reclaim the city's tide and marsh lands, thus providing a large acreage, adjacent to railroads and deep water, suitable for manufacturing and warehouse sites and railroad yards.

Directly beneath what appears to be a long statement signed by Col. Rees regarding this project is a half-page real estate advertisement wherein the public is advised "anything in, around, or near Richmond will yield a handsome return if bought right." * * * "The opportunities for making money in Richmond real estate are greater to-day than ever."

And then to see that the money is rightly placed, the Harbor-Front Realty Co., San Francisco, 204–210 Luck Building, offers to place all surplus cash.

Other Richmond real estate ads surround the Richmond Harbor write-up, indicating that if this is not a real estate speculation and land-reclamation scheme, as suggested by the minority report, that there is no such thing in existence.

I have only been able to refer briefly to several projects contained in the pending bill. If statements quoted are true, the oft-repeated exclamation "God help the taxpayers" will bear added significance. Scores of items could be enlarged upon to show their wastefulness, but the minority's statement that not one item out of the 400 contained in the bill is for war purposes and that $32,000,000 balances are now in the hands of Army engineers is a sufficient answer to those demanding the passage of this bill.

WHERE THE MONEY LARGELY GOES.

While I do not care to discuss the bill further, it may be well to repeat that a large part of the appropriations contained in this bill is for rivers that have little or no commerce and that will have little or no commerce until some intelligent system is adopted which will involve a thorough control of railway rates.

Over $250,000,000 has been spent on 12 river and canal projects by the Government in an effort to resuscitate a lost commerce. Deducting floatable timber and sand that floated a half century ago in larger quantities than to-day and do not require expensive waterways, several of these projects are reported to have floated in 1913 approximately as follows:

	Tons.
Upper Mississippi (average upper Mississippi haul 26 miles, or less than 7,000 tons average continuous haul)	170,000
Lower Mississippi (excluding coal)	200,000
Ohio (95 per cent coal)	2,000,000
Tennessee (includes on Tennessee 78,000 tons coal hauled 16 miles)	200,000
Tombigbee and Warrior (includes on Warrior 32,000 tons coal, distance not stated), average	56,000
Beaufort Canal	65,000
Cumberland	20,000
Missouri (lower)	24,000
Hennepin Canal	11,850
Muscle Shoals Canal	5,887
Red River	1,694

Aside from soft coal, as near as can be estimated, the average haul was from 30 to 100 miles on the various rivers. The same coal is repeatedly recounted.

In order to show the wisdom of Townsend's advice to stop short in this carnival of engineering extravagance, I call attention to projects showing investments by the Government prior to 1917 and actual commerce returns, counting average traffic throughout.

Deserted waterways.	Appropriated.	1915 actual commerce.
		Tons.
Upper Missouri	$3,234,083	487
Big Sandy, W. Va.	1,655,295	1,039
Cumberland River, Tenn.	6,466,767	16,354
Red River, Ark., below Fulton	2,874,687	14,275
Trinity, Tex.	2,492,287	1,571
Brazos, Tex.	1,990,000	.....
Arkansas, Ark.	3,823,336	12,143
Ouachita, Ark.	4,212,869	14,899
Muscle Shoals Canal, Ala.	4,632,975	7,982
Hennepin Canal, Ill.	7,657,803	7,656
Muscle Shoals Canal	4,550,000	5,887

These few "projects" have absorbed nearly $45,000,000 under the advice of Army engineers, in order to produce an aggregate actual commerce of a little more than 80,000 tons, or practically 2 per cent of the 1915 waterway commerce handled at the harbor of Ashland, Wis., or less than one-half of 1 per cent of the commerce handled at any one of several lake ports that may be named.

During 1914, 1915, and 1916 approximately one-half of the entire amount given to all waterways was for a few river and canal projects. The balance was divided among about 270 or more projects, of which 20 genuine waterways disclosed 1913 traffic as follows:

10 ocean harbors.	Tons.	10 lake harbors.	Tons.
New York (estimated)	100,000,000	Superior-Duluth	46,875,000
Philadelphia	26,267,335	Chicago-Calumet	13,275,000
Boston (estimated)	20,000,000	Milwaukee	8,647,000
Baltimore	14,781,942	Ashland	5,623,309
Norfolk	17,349,942	Ashtabula	15,743,375
Savannah	3,154,089	Cleveland	16,488,083
New Orleans	6,442,932	Buffalo	18,920,854
Galveston	4,445,088	Erie	3,340,071
San Francisco	9,353,530	Marquette	1,852,229
Portland, Oreg.	7,923,902	Soo Canal	79,714,344

Approximately 200,000,000 tons of waterway commerce was handled at the 10 ocean ports, and, allowing for duplications, one-half that amount at the 10 lake ports. Presumably the commerce was carried on the average 200 to 500 miles, counting ocean and lake traffic, but, like some other waterway statistics, no definite figures are available.

The significance of the comparisons will not be overlooked. Ten ocean ports handled fifty times the actual commerce carried on 10 river projects that annually receive about half of the average waterway bill, and these same rivers floated only about 4 per cent of the commerce counted at 10 lake ports.

COST TO THE GOVERNMENT FOR FLOATING "COMMERCE."

The cost to the Government for furnishing a waterway for inland commerce per ton is not definitely settled as to method of computation and only approximate results can be reached, because the amount properly chargeable to investment interest is variously estimated, although annual maintenance is sure and certain. Excluding floatable timber and sand, usually hauled short distances, the following estimates have been made on the several rivers and canals noted:

	Per ton.
Ohio River (excluding coal, $40 per ton)	$3.00
Ouachita	8.00
Warrior and Tombigbee	12.00
Upper Mississippi	12.00
Lower Mississippi	35.00
Arkansas	20.00
Hennepin	36.75
Missouri	40.00
Muscle Shoals (Tennessee)	40.00
Aransas Pass Canal	80.00
Brazos	80.00
Red	100.00
Muscle Shoals (proposed)	150.00
Big Sandy, Ky	350.00

It is interesting to note that in round numbers the following estimate of expenditures per mile have been made by the Government on three waterways with a continued loss in commerce:

	Per mile.
Lower Mississippi, 1,000 miles, at	$100,000
Ohio River to Missouri River, 200 miles, at	86,000
Upper Mississippi, 600 miles, at	40,000
Ohio River, 1,000 miles, at	60,000
Lower Missouri, 400 miles, at	40,000

Government canal investments, all indorsed by the Chief of Engineers, are proportionately wasteful:

	Per mile.
Hennepin Canal, 60 miles, at	$126,000
Muscle Shoals, 26 miles, at	175,000
Muscle Shoals, proposed, 26 miles, at	560,000
Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, proposed, 13 miles, at	1,530,000

The above river and canal projects are small waterways that float an insignificant commerce compared with the investment. Can any condemnation of our wasteful purposeless waterway policy compare with a brief statement of expenditures past, present, and prospective?

Criminal waste is involved in public extravagance at this time. The whole river and harbor scheme of supporting wasteful omnibus bills is bad at any time, but of all times it can not now be forgiven by the taxpaying public.

The committee chairman asks us to take the case to the "bar of public opinion."

I am frank to say that I will not quote some press comments because of severe strictness on the committee and on the chairman who stands sponsor for this bill. The American public is tired of the "pork barrel," and practically every influential newspaper and magazine in the country has voiced its condemnation repeatedly. I have made no effort to sound public opinion on the subpect, but herewith attach several editorials that carry their own arguments as to a public estimate of the merits or demerits of this bill and all others of like character.

A VOICE THAT IS HEARD BY HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS DAILY.

[From the Chicago Tribune, Chicago, Ill., June 16, 1917.]

THE WHY AND WHEREFORE OF PORK.

We sympathize with the attitude that pours out vials of wrath on Congress for passing pork legislation. With others, we feel inclined to call the Representatives hard names for appropriating $30,000 for removing water hyacinths from the rivers of five Southern States. We are in hearty accord with the fight that is being made against the new $27,000,000 rivers and harbors pork barrel. But the people of this country should remember that Congress is not initially or entirely to blame.

We may talk about the war-time extravagance of Congress all we please, but that does not alter the fundamental fact that some hundreds of congressional districts are aiding and abetting that extravagance. We get excited about the action of our Congressmen and forget all about the pressure from the communities that send them to Washington.

There would be no pork legislation if there were not large sections of the country which demand it. No rivers and harbors bill could be passed except by distributing the "fat" around the country. It is a species of national bribery. No Member of Congress would vote for such a disgraceful bill if his district was not "taken care of" in some way or another.

The present bill provides for expenditures in at least 400 parts of the country. One would judge from the support that is being mustered for its passage that these communities don't know yet that we are at war. If we assume they realize the seriousness of our national situation, what condemnation can be too strong for the selfishness that keeps Army dredges and engineers in this country when they are needed in France, to say nothing of the great waste of money?

Congressman FREAR is again marshaling statistics to prove the folly of our rivers and harbors appropriation. They are convincing and unanswerable. They have always been convincing and unanswerable. But just now we need not concern ourselves so much with statistics as with the national or sectional state of mind that will tolerate pork. The attitude of a community toward the pork barrel is a test of its patriotism. Every patriotic district will renounce its "share" of the fat and demand the same renunciation from Congress and the rest of the country.

AT THE BAR OF PUBLIC OPINION.

[From the New York Tribune, Monday, June 11, 1917.]

PORK.

Opponents of "pork" in the House of Representatives have made a good beginning in their fight against the river and harbor bill, masquerading as a preparedness measure. Not so bad, because not so all inclusive of "pork," as the bill which was defeated in the Senate at the last session, the present measure is, nevertheless, by no means the kind of bill which should be enacted when the country needs every man and every dollar at work to full value. It contains some items which are genuine preparedness proposals, such as the appropriation for harbor improvement here, intended to furnish safe entrance to the Brooklyn Navy Yard for the biggest battleships either from the Sound or the ocean. But its sponsor, Mr. SMALL, has had to admit that some of its projects are "more intimately associated" with national defense than others—that is, that there still remain in the bill some of the time-honored pieces of "pork," political grabs which it is now sought to get away with on the plea of patriotism.

No such grab should have a chance of succeeding, now of all times. The country is preparing to levy many drastic taxes, and is offering a huge bond issue in order to raise funds to carry on its share in the war. Nobody can foretell how long the war will last or to what expedients the authorities may be driven to obtain money to prosecute it. Economy is being urged on private individuals; States and municipalities are giving up temporarily improvements and public works which are desirable and necessary, so that the money and workers thus released may be diverted to uses more strictly emergency uses. The Nation has no money to waste in making surveys for projects which will never be carried out or for "improvements" to creeks where rowboats are the prevailing type of craft.

Every doubtful item—and, according to some of the bill's opponents, a good many of the proposals in it are doubtful—should be eliminated before it is voted on. If they are not, the measure ought to suffer the fate of its predecessor, and the country will be left without certain much-needed improvements to its harbors and waterways because some greedy politicians cared more for "pork" than for the Nation's necessities.

[From the World's Work, June, 1917.]

PORK AND PATRIOTISM.

Congress, in the main, has shown an admirable attitude in the present situation; yet certain Members of both Houses are evidently prepared to obtain such advantage as they can for their localities. The pork-barrel instinct is probably the most deep-seated in the congressional psychology; even America's greatest international crisis has not succeeded in stifling it. A number of bills, introduced early in the present session may be taken as fairly illustrating the sort of thing against which we must be perpetually on guard. Representative ———, of New York wants $10,000,000 for the development of an intercoastal canal along the Atlantic and $20,000,000 for improving New York Harbor for naval purposes. Senator ———, of New Jersey, asks $200,000 for a target range and camp in the Great Pierce Meadow in New Jersey. Representative ———, of Nebraska, demands $100,000 to pave a so-called military road from Fort Crook to Fort Omaha, and $2,000,000 to establish a military service school at Fort Crook. Mr. ———, of California, would appropriate $3,500,000 to build a military road from Los Angeles to Lakeview, Oreg., and Mr. ———, from the same State, thinks the Nation should spend $1,000,000 for a munition plant at Benicia and $200,000 on a storehouse at the same place.

Some of these proposals, possibly all of them, may have great military importance in our conflict with the German Empire. We may safely presume, however, that the best military opinion will hardly indorse them all. But this is not the point at issue. The bills emphasize precisely the way in which we can not fight a victorious war. We have voted $7,000,000,000 for war purposes, not to establish a new congressional grab-bag, but to provide the resources indispensable in attaining our military end. That Senators and Congressmen should regard this as a huge fund for parceling among their districts is not surprising; but these Senators and Congressmen are not military experts, and their judgment as to where military roads and coastal canals and munition factories will best promote the public welfare has little value. Probably, in the present temper of the Nation, all these private schemes for spending public money will have little consideration. In that spiritual and material housecleaning which the United States will undergo as a result of the present crisis, the pork-barrel tendency should be suppressed, along with much of our other outgrown political and governmental lumber; and the country should, therefore, insist that Congress scotch its earliest appearance in this present session.

A POWERFUL VOICE FROM THE BAR OF PUBLIC OPINION.

[From the New York Sun, Jan. 30, 1917.]

PORK-BARREL BILLS.

Representatives in Congress who oppose the two primest pieces of pork—the public building and river and harbor bills—put the people of the United States in their debt. So unmistakable was the attitude of the Members that 132 Congressmen rallied together in fighting against the river and harbor bill. Both bills can be, and must be, defeated in the Senate. It is generally known that several Senators have pledged themselves to accomplish the rejection of the bills in the other House. This pledge can not be considered a private matter. It is a gentleman's agreement made with the whole country. Its existence has been publicly recorded, and general attention should be fixed on its existence at this time. There is no difficulty whatever in carrying out the pledge.

The ammunition supplied by Mr. FREAR in the debates in the House is unlimited and of the highest pork-piercing quality. If it is used neither bill can possibly pass the Senate.

ANOTHER VOICE FROM THE BAR OF PUBLIC OPINION.

[From the Indianapolis Star, Indianapolis, Ind., Mar. 29, 1917.]

"NO TIME FOR PORK."

Attention is called to the fact that a strenuous effort will be made to put the "pork" bills through at the extra session of Congress. The present is no time to fritter away the people's money. The Representatives and Senators should be more patriotic at this time.

The $39,000,000 river and harbor bill and the $38,000,000 public-building bill were blocked in the closing days of the last Senate. They are certain to bob up next month. Not all the items included can be termed as "pork." Many river and harbor projects are in the interest of the public and should be provided for. The same may be said of some proposals on the building list.

But the two bills include a large number of expenditures that are not needed and should be avoided. The country is about to spend large sums in preparedness and military operations, and should be spared every bit of waste that is possible. The so-called "pork" measures should be trimmed to the limit.

A MOST CONSERVATIVE VOICE—PORK INVITES PITY.

[From the Washington Star, May 27, 1917.]

THE HOUSE.

Some persons are denouncing the House. Others are pitiying it. Poor old House! Once so powerful. Now so impotent. Once the cynosure of all eyes when important legislation was in the making. Now the object of mild curiosity. Real interest is awakened only when the Senate has business in hand. Nobody expects the House to do more than cut out something in the rough for the Senate or a conference committee to put into finished shape. And so on.

In politics we must always allow for exaggerations. There are exaggerations in this sort of talk about the House. It is not nearly so poorly off as its critics describe. On occasions, when it rouses and gets into its stride, it is still a husky and forceful body.

And yet it must be admitted that in the matter of popular interest the House has of late years been losing to the Senate. The Senate has been oftener in the picture. It has been doing some notable things. Some very stirring episodes have been staged in its Chamber. Some filibusters, with far-reaching effects, have been conducted there. All the successful fights on "pork" have been waged there. In many things the Senate has shown high quality for courage, ability, and general legislative resources.

The House is itself responsible for whatever loss of prestige it has sustained. In curtailing the powers and importance of the Speaker, reducing him to the proportions of a presiding officer only, and in limiting debate too often and too radically, thereby giving countenance to the charge from the outside that Members wasted time with their tongues, it inflicted injury upon itself.

The wonder is that the House does not resume its old form. There never was a czar in the Speaker's chair. Randall and Reed and Crisp and Cannon knew how to handle a gavel and promote business, but none was a tyrant in office. Under all of them excellent legislative results were obtained and wide interest in House proceedings maintained. There was some denunciation but no pitying of that body in the public comment. The Speaker should again be the second officer in influence under the Government, and have full scope for the exercise of talents associable with his place.

GOOD ADVICE FROM THE NORTHWEST.

[From the Minneapolis Tribune, Minneapolis, Minn., Apr. 15, 1917.]

"SWAT THE PORK-BARREL GANG."

This is a good time for the new Congress to resolve to take a stiff rap at the heads of "pork-barrel" cormorants every time they are raised above the surface. Southern pork hunters who are rampantly eager to dump millions of gold—mostly northern gold—into southern wayside creeks, bayous, and rivers already are on the job, licking their chops. It is probable, moreover, that another $38,000,000 public-buildings bill, like the one that failed of passage in the last Congress, will be introduced.

The people gladly will take care of the bill for whatever expenditures are necessary to improve rivers and harbors for public-defense purposes. Millions for that kind of defense but not a cent for "pork" tribute should be the slogan at this time when the burden for war purposes will be heavy enough.

Fortunately the country has some vigilant Congressmen on guard to "show up" the rapacity of the pork seekers. Representative FREAR says the agencies pushing "pork-barrel" legislation are the lobby, locality interests, and Army engineers, "who give certificates of good character to unworthy wasteful projects." By the kind of effort he, Senator KENYON, of Iowa, and others have put forth against omnibus appropriation bills the Federal Treasury has been shielded against projected raids aggregating many millions. He sounds the warning, however, that the fight must go on; that the evils will not be eliminated until the wasteful system of making appropriations is wiped out.

THE FIGHT AGAINST EXTRAVAGANCE.

The majority members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have reported for passage a bill calling for the appropriation of $38,000,000. Despite the determined opposition of the minority members of the committee friends of the bill say it will pass the House. * * *

It is high time, with the Government seeking new objects of taxation in order to supply the constant drain, that men should come forward and put an end to the bolstering of official tenure by sending to the home district money to be wasted in so-called public projects.

A STRONG VOICE WITH THE SAME TONE.

[From the Milwaukee Sentinel, Milwaukee, Wis., June 16, 1917.]

SOME PERSISTENT PORKERS.

The minority report of the House committee on the revised rivers and harbors appropriation concludes as follows:

The minority are convinced that the only items that can be justified at this time are of two classes. First, items of maintenance for meritorious projects that would retain the present channel depths or are of such commercial importance as to require continual attention. Second, such harbor improvements as are of value and importance in the general plan of better preparedness, considering both the commercial requirements and naval needs.

Unless the bill is materially amended along the lines suggested in this report, the minority of the committee believe that no rivers and harbors legislation should be passed in this critical time of our national life.

The second classification calls for special attention, as it goes to the root of discussion as to the character of this bill.

The bill may be characterized as largely an attempt to obtain pork under false pretenses.

The attempt is made to smuggle through a variety of pork items in this bill under a general pretense of military and naval preparedness.

Some items justly come under that head. Others have no more relation to that object, or even to internal improvements of public merit and necessity, than they have to deepening the canals in Mars.

The bill was defeated in the Senate some months ago, to the great relief and satisfaction of the public, but here it is again in the House with most of its former imperfections on its head, and a dishonest pretense that it is in general furtherance of the Nation's preparedness program.

It will be thoroughly expurgated of pork on the lines above suggested by the minority report, or the public will know the reason why.

Congressman FREAR and his associates who are fighting to eliminate the pork and to save the public from these gross local and sectional grabs at its bank roll, are assured of the approval of the general public, and should get the open and emphatic support of the press as a notice to the pork hunters that their gauzy pretense of preparedness will not be allowed to deceive the country.

Should this bill, pork and all, be enacted, the operation will suggest the spectacle of the United States Government warning the public against war-time extravagance and at the same time squandering the money of the public on the notorious form of extravagance odiously knowns as pork.

If there ever was a time when it would be obviously and grotesquely wrong to tax the American for pork it is this time.

Millions for defense, not a penny for pork!

PUBLIC OPINION IN MINNESOTA.

[From the Minneapolis Journal, Minneapolis, Minn., Apr. 2, 1917.]

PORK HUNTERS ACTIVE EVEN NOW.

Not even the pendency of the tremendous questions of war can serve to restrain the appetites of the pork hunters in Congress. The summoning of the Sixty-fifth Congress in extra session to-day is to them merely an opportunity to resuscitate the great pork bills that fell by the wayside in the final session of the last Congress.

Senator RANSDELL, of Louisiana, president of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, declared a week ago that a river and harbor bill would be introduced and pushed energetically in the extra session. Representative JAMES A. FREAR, of Wisconsin, gives warning that another public-buildings bill and river and harbor bill probably identical with the $38,000,000 measures that failed of passage in the last Congress will be introduced in the extra session.

Senator RANSDELL gives as the reason for the rivers and harbors measure that there is pressing need of certain harbor improvements as a matter of national defense. No doubt. But the old items for deepening southern creeks and scooping out southern bayous will doubtless make their appearance again and will be made a condition for the passage of the bill.

It will be remembered that Senator KENYON, of Iowa, endeavored to substitute a porkless measure providing for the necessary improvement of big harbors when the old bill was up. But it was Senator RANSDELL who blocked the way—the same Senator who is now so solicitous for these necessary improvements.

Patriotism should crowd pork off the legislative track in this Congress.

ANOTHER STRONG CLEAN-CUT OPINION.

[From the Post, Chicago, Ill., May 19, 1917.]

ALL RIGHT—TAX "PORK," TOO.

The House yesterday by a vote of 123 to 54 refused to strike out the section of the war-tax bill designed to levy a retroactive tax of one-third the amount of last year's income levies.

All right. Let's adopt this unheard-of business principle.

But let's carry it through.

Let's put it on one side of the ledger as well as the other.

If we are going to charge on last year's figures, let us also economize on last year's figures.

Let us repeal at once the millions that Congress brazenly voted into "pork" despite the shadows of war that hung over the country.

Let us repeal the appropriations for the rivers and harbors bill.

Let us repeal the appropriations for the flood-control bill.

Let us repeal the appropriations for the public-buildings bill.

It is pointed out that there was on March 1, 1917, $32,000,000 available for rivers and harbors work under last year's appropriations. On top of this the same Congress that is voting retroactive income taxes is trying to slip through a little bill for $27,000,000 more "pork."

The great majority of all this work is political waste, pure and simple. Everybody knows it. Congress knows it. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD proves it. The small portion of these improvements which are not waste can well wait their time. War needs must take precedence over them.

Millions upon millions of dollars were voted away wastefully by Congress last year. If last year's incomes are to be taxed, last year's congressional extravagance should be taxed out of existence.

Why should the average citizen have a post-facto burden upon him and the congressional wasters still enjoy their post-facto pie?

AN OPINION OF THE SAME TONE.

[From the Courier-Journal, Jan. 19, 1917.]

FOR GREATER WAHOO.

Among the projects included in the 1913 public-building bill was a $56,000 building for the town of Wahoo; population, 2,168. Wahoo, it seems, is in Nebraska. The name no doubt is an Indian war whoop or some other exclamatory expression from the throat of an aborigine * * *.

The general feeling among villagers and hill-billy Congressmen is that one good chunk of pork desires another. Until public-buildings (and rivers and harbors) appropriations are put upon a business basis and removed forever from logrolling politics we shall continue to waste many millions in projects for which there is no earthly purpose upon the part of Congress beyond that of favoring Members who need public buildings in their campaigns.

In the meantime the public will look to President Wilson to veto the scandalous bill now pending unless it shall be radically cut down.

OTHER OPINIONS THAT CARRY WEIGHT.

[From the Evening Mail, New York, Jan. 27, 1917.]

THE FREE SPENDER.

On the final day of the public-building bill came a striking illustration in Congress. Mr. FREAR of Wisconsin, an opponent of "pork," was pointing out the slices for which Mr. ——— of Tennessee was asking.

He asks for a public building at Jefferson City, a town of 1,328 population. In 1915 the receipts reached only $4,771 for stamp sales. He asks for a building in the village to cost $160,000. Not only had Mr. ——— asked for this building; he was proud of it. Amid the approval of his colleagues he made the following confession of faith: I am not an economist and never have been. [Laughter.] I want to tell the gentleman that I never vote against an appropriation and never vote for a tax. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ——— and his friends will have to vote for taxes now. They first voted $38,000,000 for public buildings and yesterday voted $38,000,000 for river and harbor improvements. They did this in the face of the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government will require $370,000,000 in new taxes.

[From the News, Santa Barbara, Cal., Jan. 30, 1917.]

MORE ABOUT PORK.

The institution of "pork" is about as bad an institution as there is in this country. For years it has existed and for years the public funds have been filched in order that the Representatives from this, that, or the other part of the country might be rewarded for their efforts and the people of their districts might be fed upon a false glory. Some day, and the News hopes that may not be far distant, a champion of honesty will stand up and fight "pork"; the institution as an institution will be cast out from our system of government; the public funds will be spent as they should be spent, for merit and not for favor; and the country at large will be far better off.

The public waterways have long been the bait by which much "pork" has been hooked from the Federal Government. * * *

If the Government must annually spend nearly $50,000,000 in improving the rivers and harbors of this country there should be appointed a commission of intelligent and competent men to investigate. If it is true, as charged, that the Army engineers placed in control of much of the engineering work have not done their work competently, then private engineers should be employed. The rivers and harbors to be improved should not be selected as rewards to the districts but should be selected because they are the logical rivers and harbors demanding Government aid. Furthermore, it would be wise for the commission to map out a comprehensive and systematic program of improvement. As the appropriations are made to-day there is neither rhyme nor reason to them.

AN OPINION FROM A CLOSE OBSERVER.

[From the Washington Times, Monday, June 11, 1917.]

PIGS UNDER THE FENCE.

Half the ingenuity, determination, and persistence that are applied in Congress to selfish local ends would put the Nation on a sound basis if they were directed by clear heads and true hearts. The spectacle of Congressman trying to slip their pork through or under the obstructions raised by the present world crisis is one that excites a certain admiration for the amount of energy thus misapplied.

Chairman SMALL, in introducing the river and harbor bill, declared stoutly that every item "constitutes an emergency either of commerce or of national defense." Manufacturing emergencies is about the easiest thing in the world. When a Representative asked if the new projects were "intimately associated with the question of national defense in a military way," in accordance with Secretary Baker's directions, Mr. SMALL admitted that "some of the items are more intimately associated than others." He might have said with equal accuracy that the longest way round is the shortest way home. Boston is nearer New York than San Francisco.

Representative FREAR, of Wisconsin, estimated that preparedness was not related to a quarter of the projects. It is probably a generous estimate. There is no disposition to stop the supply of any absolutely necessary commercial need. But Chairman SMALL himself admitted that only a third of the projects for which surveys were asked would finally be carried through. Mr. LENROOT asked why Government engineers should waste their time making so many useless surveys, to which there was no answer.

The Congressmen who are trying to get through their pet measures in spite of the Nation's disapproval have not waked up yet. It is the business of the best elements among their own constituents—those who are not hungry for pork—to wake them as rudely and as suddenly as possible.

OTHER CONSERVATIVE OPINIONS.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, May 8, 1917.]

MILLIONS FOR DEFENSE—NONE FOR GRAFT.

We are in a prodigal frame of mind. The sentiment of the Nation is expressed in the famous toast, "Millions for defense but not one penny for tribute." The President, Congress, the State legislatures, the city authorities everywhere, and the people are in the mood to go the limit in protecting the lives and the property of citizens and in sustaining the honor of the country. This is fine. It proves that loyalty and patriotism still burn in the breasts of the American people. Enthusiasm is necessary. Without it little or nothing can be accomplished in this world. It is especially necessary in times like the present. But there is no reason why prudence and common sense should not go arm in arm with love of country.

In a word, we should spend millions and billions for defense, but at the same time firmly resolve that not one penny of the war appropriations should go for graft. To carry out this purpose means unrelenting care and watchfulness. In war times there are bound to be some vultures on the lookout for easy money. It is the duty of the executives and legislators to use every means in their power to prevent waste and extravagance and thievery.

For instance, a $27,000,000 river and harbor bill is about to be launched by the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House. Such a bill seems to be necessary to meet existing conditions. It is understood to have the approval of the President and the Secretary of War, because it provides for certain harbor needs in connection with our ships. So far, so good. But it is a notorious fact that omnibus bills of this character in the past have been utilized as a means of distributing "pork" in certain congressional districts.

Every dollar of this money which is proven necessary for the actual needs of the country, or for the successful prosecution of the war, should be appropriated, but not a penny of it should be allowed to go out of the Treasury for projects which will not bear the closest scrutiny—for schemes that are nothing more nor less than raids upon the money chest of the Nation.

The responsibility for sifting out the good from the bad or the unnecessary rests with the Members of Congress. Appropriate all the millions that may be needed, but satisfy the taxpayers that not a penny is to go for "pork."

That will be real patriotism.

[From the Milwaukee Free Press, Friday, Jan. 5, 1917.]

MAY WE HOPE, MR. PRESIDENT?

A great, an epoch-making opportunity for President Wilson.

It has been nearly a generation since an American Executive had the courage to veto a "pork-barrel" bill. The usual course at the White House has been to deplore these annual raids on the Treasury, and then to sign the current measure on the ground that, after all, it contained many necessary and valuable appropriations.

Of course, this was buncombe. The President fell in with the congressional purpose because of the political value of the "pork" to his party.

The time for action was not the eleventh hour of the session, when the bill was finally railroaded through to the President, but while the grab was in the framing.

Therefore, Mr. Wilson's opportunity exists to-day.

He has expressed himself, like other Presidents, as opposed to "pork-barrel" legislation and the omnibus bills by which it is accomplished.

But he has also expressed his opposition to other abuses—say, the spoils system—and yet when a spoils bill has come to him for signature he has signed it—under protest. It has been the same with the "pork-barrel" measures submitted to him during the past four years.

Will Woodrow Wilson have the courage to take this stand and let politics go hang?

For nearly four years he has had the opportunity to get behind the movement to do away with the omnibus method of appropriation—the bulwark of the "pork barrel." For nearly four years he has been in a position to defend the Treasury against political raids, to place appropriations for public works upon a scientific and economical basis.

But he has done neither the one nor the other.

President Wilson, elected for a second term, should feel superior to the necessity of that political maneuvering which so seriously marred his first administration.

May we not therefore be justified in cherishing the hope that this time he will play the man, the true public servant, and give the coup de grace to the "pork barrel"?

A united country will stand back of him in the event.

[From Leslie's Weekly, New York City, Feb. 8, 1917.]

THE ANNUAL "PORK" RAIDS.

That millions are wasted each year in reckless appropriations is no secret. The public buildings bill is the most glaring example. After this, and even more important in the aggregate amount, are indefensible items in the river and harbor bill. Representative FREAR, of Wisconsin, who has led the fight against "pork" measures in the House, speaking of the lack of systematic waterway development, claims that of $900,000,000 already spent the larger part has been wasted and that the commerce has steadily declined on the "improved" waterways. "Commerce on the Mississippi, Ohio, Missouri, Tennessee, Cumberland, and inland waters generally, excepting deep waterways, has diminished on the different streams from 80 to 90 per cent during the past 40 years." For the same period the Mississippi has received $150,000,000, the Ohio $60,000,000, and the Missouri $22,000,000. Proportionately large amounts have been expended on other streams.

The remedy for this wastage is well known. There should be an abandonment of omnibus bills and each item in the appropriations be made to stand or fall on its individual merits.

ANOTHER MOLDER OF PUBLIC OPINION.

[From the Sun, New York City, Dec. 30, 1916.]

WHAT PORK MEANS.

The income of the United States consists of about a billion dollars, derived from three principal sources. From the customs duties the Government gets about $200,000,000 a year. Internal revenue yields about $400,000,000. The third large item is $300,000,000 of postal revenues. This third item cancels itself, for the post office spends all it earns.

It will be seen that the main reliance of the Federal Government is upon the customs and such direct and indirect taxes as it may levy. Any lessening of one makes imperative an increase of the other. If tariffs are lowered income taxes must make up the loss. If the Government faces a shortage of any considerable proportions it must either raise duties on imported goods or multiply the taxes on its citizens. The Democratic policy has always been to keep tariffs down. The Democratic Party has followed this principle in the face of rapidly rising governmental expenses, with the result that the country is now taxed in ways never known before except in time of war.

In time of war! The phrase suggests immediately the critical situation of this country in respect of taxation and revenue. A prudent man lives within his income and is careful not to overstrain the sources of that income lest an emergency find him unable to cope with extraordinary expenditures and leave him bankrupt. A prudent country lives within its income and is careful not to overstrain the sources of that income, lest war, unprovoked, maybe, but not always to be averted, find the public purse unable to meet instant, incessant, and tremendous expense.

If we have war taxes in peace times, what shall we do for money in war times?

If we waste our income and credit for crossroads post offices and creek dredging in time of peace, how shall we raise money in time of war?

There is a limit both to the credit of the United States and the taxable resources of the United States. That limit used to be thought to be a far bound. It is not so far away as it used to be, and at the cost of war to-day it might be reached and exceeded in the midst of the struggle.

Every Congressman who votes for pork strikes a blow at the defense of his country.

Every Congressman who votes for more and higher taxes to pay for pork is aiding the possible enemies of his country.

Every American who sanctions extravagance in government or in private life, who is complaisant in the waste of public moneys, who votes for Congressmen who waste those moneys, or who permits such waste to go on unrebuked is unfaithful to his country.

A PHILOSOPHICAL AND POINTED OPINION.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Jan. 22, 1917.]

THE ROOT OF THE "PORK" EVIL.

There has been for years in the United States, even in quarters where the rights and dignities of the individual States are most jealously asserted and defended, a disposition to throw upon the Federal Government the cost of improvements which it should not be called upon to bear. The false belief that the Nation should do for the State or the community what the State or the community should do and had better do for itself is the root of the "pork evil," and this belief has been strengthened by success so often that it has come to be regarded as a true conception of the contract upon which the national federation is based. Constituencies have long expected their Representatives in Congress "to bring something home" from Washington, and Congressmen from certain districts have as long believed that their success as statesmen could best be established by "bringing things home."

In reality such achievements as have been scored in this respect may be counted for loss rather than gain by the districts concerned. Through dependence on Federal appropriations, the people of the districts have in numerous instances neglected to do for themselves those things that would have turned the tide of prosperity in their favor. "Waiting for Congress" to do something accounts for arrested progress in many a once-promising community. Rivers are neglected, canals are left unfinished, harbors remain unimproved, everything waits until such a time as Congress shall grant an appropriation. Meanwhile the alert, independent, and self-dependent rival community has gone into its own pockets and made its own improvements and has grown and become rich.

"Waiting for Congress to do something" is on a par with the waiting of Mr. Wilkins Micawber for "something to turn up." It is a blighting weakness. The community that exists in the hope that Congress will "do something" for it "some day" has failure written in large letters across it. Just as soon as congressional districts and their Representatives realize that the "pork" appropriation is an affliction rather than a blessing the present system of logrolling will come to an end.

The United States is immensely wealthy, and it could doubtless spend, without feeling it, far more than it does now on useless "improvements" or on improvements that are purely local; but morally it can not afford to give countenance to the use of public moneys for the payment of political debts.

When all is said, if there is any real distinction the Government can better afford to grant than the congressional district can afford to receive appropriations obtained under false pretenses, or in accordance with a dishonest compact, or without expectation or intention of compensating the Nation. No community can derive ultimate profit from participation in any form of wrongdoing.

SEVERAL VOICES FROM THE BAR OF PUBLIC OPINION.

[From the Standard Union, Brooklyn, N. Y., Dec. 27, 1916.]

HEAD OFF THESE TREASURY RAIDS.

The two "pork" measures before Congress, the well-known public-buildings bill and the rivers and harbors bill, may not be conspicuous because of the aggregate size of the appropriations provided, but undoubtedly they match any heretofore proposed or passed in boldness of purpose to raid the Federal Treasury.

The Mississippi River flood-reclamation bill, which is part and parcel of the raid, its opponents charge with evident reason, provides an appropriation of $45,000,000 as a starter. It is not the amount of money so much as it is the seeming purpose back of the measure, which is alleged to be a gigantic real estate deal. That may not be the case, but obviously there is occasion to view this measure with profound suspicion.

Then there are a number of items for public buildings for towns and small cities that suggest plain loot. Erecting in communities having a few thousand inhabitants costly Federal structures fit for cities many times larger is, of course, disgraceful.

Fortunately a vigorous opposition in and out of Congress is developing, and the raiders may find that they can not empty the Treasury as easily as they hope.

[From the Boston Journal, Saturday, Jan. 6, 1917.]

HALT THE PORK GRABBERS.

The only right means of checking the wicked extravagance of the pork barrel is to keep the situation before the public and force Congress to be honest. In this year of dwindling funds and mounting taxes the waste of Government money is nothing short of crime. Advertise the crime; show it up; watch every Congressman. If the graft incident to sectional representation can not be routed by that means, then the present form of representative government is at fault and must be changed.

[From the Leader, Cleveland, Ohio, Dec. 23, 1916.]

ANOTHER PORK GRAB.

For four years the Democrats in control of the present and the preceding Congress have been squandering the public money with a shamelessness that would have met with a stinging rebuke at the recent election if the American people had not been lulled into easy-going carelessness about Government expense and taxes by the golden lavishness of the war prosperity.

The Wilson administration has not sanctioned this, but its protests have been few and feeble, and it has not exercised its authority and influence to stop the brazen and unprecedented exploiting of the pork barrel as it has in forcing through pet measures of the President. But now that another four years of responsibility rests upon it the situation is different. Secretary McAdoo has given solemn warning that next year there will be a big deficit in the National Treasury. Up until election day there was the possibility that this would have to be met by a Republican administration. Now it must be met by the Wilson administration. And the meeting will not be a matter to joke about.

In spite of the certainty of this deficit and the full knowledge that these pork-barrel raids are ruinous and ought to be made criminal by law, the Democrats of the present Congress, especially the southerners, are determined to keep them up until the day of adjournment, regardless of consequences. A bill is now being made ready for them appropriating $35,000,000 for Federal buildings, mostly needless, in addition to the millions they have already converted into pork. There is practically no doubt that in spite of all shaming and denouncing they will silently and defiantly vote it through.

Then that bill will go to President Wilson. Will he sign it, as he did others of the same kind when he was a candidate for reelection and needed all the political support he could get, or will he veto it against the chance that by so doing he will antagonize pork-hunting Representatives whose votes he will want in the next Congress? The country can only wait and see.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE SITUATION BY A FEARLESS REPRESENTATIVE OF PUBLIC OPINION.

[From the Sun and New York Press, Wednesday, Dec. 27, 1916.]

IN THE SADDLE.

In the House Committee on Ways and Means the chairman and 6 of the 13 other majority members are southern Democrats.

In the Committee on Appropriations 7 of the 13 majority members are southern Democrats.

In the Committee on Claims the chairman and five of the seven other majority members are southern Democrats.

In the Committee on Flood Control the chairman and five of the eight other majority members are southern Democrats.

In the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads the chairman and 6 of the other 12 members are southern Democrats.

In the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the chairman and 6 of the other 10 majority members are southern Democrats.

In the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the chairman and 6 of the other 12 majority members are southern Democrats.

In the Committee on Roads the chairman and 7 of the other 12 majority members are southern Democrats.

In the Committee on War Claims the chairman and six of the other eight majority members are southern Democrats.

And in the Committee on Rules, the carbureter of the machine, the chairman and four of the six other majority members are southern Democrats.

Be good enough to overlook the monotony of phrase and the generally statistical aspect of the foregoing paragraphs; they disclose the truth of a situation that is menacing the public funds in the Treasury and the pockets of the taxpayers. There is no use in blinking the fact that the southern Democracy is in the saddle and is riding like the devil in a fierce raid for pork. There is no disguising the circumstance that the southern Democratic machinery for getting and spending other people's money is at this moment perhaps the most powerful organization of the sort that the Capitol ever saw. The time is short. There is no knowing what eclipse of opportunity will occur when the Sixty-fourth Congress goes out of existence next March and the Sixty-fifth comes in. This is perhaps the last call for the meal that is swiftly attaining the dimensions of a grand gorge. The conviction is growing among the hungry that perhaps it is now or never. The Nation is just now beginning to perceive how grandly the southern Democracy rises to the occasion.

And there are northern Democrats with the same greed of appetite.

From day to day the Sun has been calling attention, both in these editorial columns and in our illuminating news despatches from Washington, to the miserable, sordid, disheartening details of the program of grab and graft, the earlier numbers of which are now being executed in the rooms of the committees constituted as aforesaid. The public-buildings bill is just at present most in evidence for the impudence of its unreckoning voracity. We have exhibited the scheme of granite palaces for crossroads hamlets and grandiose Indiana limestone temples for obscure southern villages which has been developed. Nearly forty millions for Federal buildings, mostly unnecessary, at the time when we need submarines for the preservation of the Republic's very life. Picayune graft and selfish local avarice when patriotism is silent. Turn again to the list in our Washington dispatch of yesterday, and study the shameless enterprise of these mounted and spurred pork chasers.

That is but one number of the meridional program of gluttony. Right after it comes the so-called flood reclamation project, rounded out to forty-five millions under the able supervision of the Flood Control Committee. Right after that the rivers and harbors bill, wrought into gigantic shape and largely fashioned on the good old plan of dumping Treasury cash into the Cheesequake Creeks of both North and South—particularly South—in this year of the saddle. And behind the public-building hod, the flood-control hog, the river and harbor hog, loom the yet vaguely portentous forms of certain claim measures of southern origin, of which we may or may not have more definite vision as the ides of March approach and the urgency of the graft raid increases. It is not a single porker the country now beholds marching toward the Treasury; it is a whole swinery let loose upon the taxpayers.

What is the country to do? Remind the responsible leaders of platform promises pledging the Democracy to economical expenditure and the removal of oppressive taxes? They are long since calloused to such appeals to good faith, to party principle, to ordinary political common sense. Point to the imminent deficiency of a hundred and fifty million or so, which the men in the saddle cheerfully purpose to double for the benefit of themselves and their districts? Why, the cynical answer is already on their lips: What the Nick o' the Woods do we or our constituents care about the deficiency if Hazard crossroads gets its lucky chance in the shape of a $40,000 Federal building and Akatcho Bayou Inlet is put in the same class as the Panama Canal or New York Harbor? Attempt to show by arithmetical demonstration that the Federal tax system, already on a war basis in time of peace, can not stand the additional burden? Again the answer is on the tip of the tongue of the man in the saddle: "Double the income tax once more; the other fellows pay it and we get the pork."

We confess we see little hope of restraining these raiders and defeating these plunderers short of a general and powerful reawakening of public sentiment in favor of common honesty in the disposition of the public money. Make odius the legislative hog. Make the acquisition of pork money personally shameful to the men originating the transaction, and specifically so to the men aiding and abetting or locally or politically profiting by it. Make it a thing to be ashamed of, even in the presence of the pork hunters' own constituents. It is a big job, but it has been done several times in the history of our Republic. Even the salary grabbers of the Forty-second Congress were whipped by the lashes of public indignation into such a state of contrition that many of them went whimpering back to the Treasury door to restore their stolen dollars. It can be done again by the same salutary, if unpleasant process, and the Sun invites the honest newspapers of the United States, without distinction of party nomenclature, to act in concert and to act promptly and to act mercilessly, if need be, as a vigilance committee.

[From the News Letter, San Francisco, Cal., Feb. 17, 1917.]

THE PORK BARREL LUSTILY MILITANT.

Pork-barrel extravagance is running amuck as usual in the present session of Congress. Some $38,000,000 has been appropriated to deepen the inveterate creeks and undrained wells for naval purposes. Even the new situation in the European war fails to restrain the germ-infested pork-barrel rider from his fell determination of scattering the Nation's funds where they will best benefit his constituency in sluicing a creek or adding a foolish wing to the makings of a post office and thus bolster his chances of reelection. This class of national legislators are as pin-headed and as calloused in conscience as the moss-backed Representatives who mulcted the National Treasury for their own wretched selfishness in the forties. Because the United States are extremely wealthy in this period of its development is no reason to rob the Nation. * * *

The pork barrel is one of the last of a company of like abuses, a situation which in itself is significant of much improvement. It lies with the universities of this country to turn out the stamp of conscientious men who will sweep clean the floors of Congress in this respect.

MORE PUBLIC OPINIONS.

[From the Public Ledger, Philadelphia, Pa., Dec. 27, 1916.]

NO DEFENSE FOR THE PORK BARREL.

Everything that the unblushing father of the pork-barrel public buildings bill, which proposes to leach millions from a rapidly emptying Treasury, says in its defense but confirms the odious character of the measure. It is conceived in the worst kind of cheap sectionalism to begin with, is persisted in from the most sordid of motives, the mere desire of Congressmen "to get something" for their districts, and it proposes to gild the squalor of unprogressive "poor white" hamlets, in the uttermost recesses of the pine belts or the mountain regions of the South, with millions of money for Federal buildings just to amuse backwoodsmen largely and to replace the village store as a lounging place.

Having learned the evil lesson from the rivers and harbors bill, the sponsor for the grab is out in an attack on the great population centers and the big cities, whose postal revenues, by the way, as is the case with all their other contributions to Federal revenues, support the Congress and make it possible for Congressmen to throw away the taxpayers' money as if they were drunken sailors. The sound economic thing and the logical thing in the matter of port development is for the Government to see to it that every great entrepôt of the country, whether it be Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, Galveston, San Francisco, or Seattle, is equipped to meet the demands of modern commerce and is also being developed to anticipate future needs and to attract and hold the commerce of the future.

And so with the public-building issue. After the natural distributing centers of the country have received the conveniences and the Federal buildings that will enable them to carry on their Federal functions properly and as their national importance demands, then it will be time enough for Goose Creek, Sandy Bottom, and Lonesome Pine to be looked after. But not with the appalling extravagance defended by Congressmen, who believe that the enterprising sections of the country should be taxed heavily in order that luxuries may be granted to those centers which are and will remain negligible factors in the country's growth and progress, but which are, of course, convenient pawns in the indefensible logrolling game.

FROM TWO GREAT MOLDERS OF PUBLIC OPINION.

[From the Chicago Tribune, Chicago, Ill., June 14, 1917.]

WAR-TIME PORK.

With the defeat of the rivers and harbors bill in the Senate early in the spring it looked as if the country might be spared the disgrace of the annual pork legislation for one year at least. But recently the bill was revised and reported in the House.

This time it is promoted under the guise of being a war measure. The majority say its purpose is to further military and naval preparedness. They also claim it is an "economy" proposition, on the ground that the previous bill has been scaled down from $38,000,000 to $27,000,000.

The speciousness of these claims is being revealed in the discussion in the House. The alleged reductions are not reductions at all. The present bill, for instance, does not include $6,000,000 for the Mississippi River for the simple reason that this sum has been transferred to the sundry civil bill. The same order of economy is illustrated in the elimination of $1,300,000 for the purchase of the 13-mile Chesapeake & Delaware Canal. In this case a clause has been inserted for the condemnation of the waterway, with the probable result that the ultimate cost will greatly exceed the original appropriation. Congressman MADDEN, by the way, said he could not understand the purpose of this improvement unless it was to take the seasickness out of the sea.

A few of the proposed projects come within the scope of naval preparation. They relate to harbor developments at New York, Los Angeles, and elsewhere. But such projects, according to the minority Members, constitute less than one-fourth of the 400 items in the bill. To all intents and purposes it is just plain, old-fashioned pork legislation.

Confident of the success of the familiar logrolling methods, the majority are not making any great effort to justify such items as $5,000,000 for the Ohio River, $1,000,000 for the Missouri, and $632,000 for the Cumberland, not to speak of such smaller amounts as $100,000 for the Congaree (S. C.) and $230,000 for the Mementeau Canal (La.) They are certainly not military propositions. Congress has already spent $60,000,000 on the Ohio, yet commerce in the river is said to be annually growing smaller. The appropriation for the Missouri is declared to be nothing but a land-reclamation scheme.

The case against the bill is even more damning in view of the fact that on March 1 of this year there were balances of $32,000,000 available for river and harbor purposes. The amounts set up in the new bill are entirely supplemental and additional.

In the words of the House committee minority report, it is a sad commentary on legislative methods when Congress preaches conservation and economy to the country and then practices extravagance. While the wheels seem to be greased as usual for the passage of the bill in the House, Congressmen are making a hard fight for the elimination of the pork. The country should let them know it stands back of them.

[From the Sun and New York Press, Saturday, Dec. 30, 1916.]

WHAT PORK MEANS.

The income of the United States consists of about a billion dollars derived from three principal sources. From the customs duties the Government gets about $200,000,000 a year. Internal revenue yields about $400,000,000. The third large item is $300,000,000 of postal revenues. This third item cancels itself, for the Post Office spends all it earns.

It will be seen that the main reliance of the Federal Government is upon the customs and such direct and indirect taxes as it may levy. Any lessening of one makes imperative an increase of the other. If tariffs are lowered, income taxes must make up the loss. If the Government faces a shortage of any considerable proportions, it must either raise duties on imported goods or multiply the taxes on its citizens. The Democratic policy has always been to keep tariffs down. The Democratic Party has followed this principle in the face of rapidly rising governmental expenses, with the result that the country is now taxed in ways never known before except in time of war.

In time of war! The phrase suggests immediately the critical situation of this country in respect of taxation and revenue. A prudent man lives within his income and is careful not to overstrain the sources of that income lest an emergency find him unable to cope with extraordinary expenditures and leave him bankrupt. A prudent country lives within its income and is careful not to overstrain the sources of that income lest war, unprovoked may be, but not always to be averted, find the public purse unable to meet instant, incessant, and tremendous expense.

If we have war taxes in peace times, what shall we do for money in war times?

If we waste our income and credit for crossroads post offices and creek dredging in time of peace, how shall we raise money in time of war?

There is a limit both to the credit of the United States and the taxable resources of the United States. That limit used to be thought to be a far bound. It is not so far away as it used to be, and at the cost of war to-day it might be reached and exceeded in the midst of the struggle.

Every Congressman who votes for pork strikes a blow at the defense of his country.

Every Congressman who votes for more and higher taxes to pay for pork is aiding the possible enemies of his country.

Every American who sanctions extravagance in Government or in private life, who is complaisant in the waste of public moneys, who votes for Congressmen who waste those moneys, or who permits such waste to go on unrebuked, is unfaithful to his country.

PUBLIC OPINION ON OTHER SPECIES OF PORK.

[From the Washington Herald, June 21, 1917.]

ARMY MOVEMENTS MENACED BY PORK-BARREL POLITICIANS—CONGRESSMEN, UNDER THUMB OF CONSTITUENTS HUNGER FOR CAMP-SITE PLUMS, DELAY SENDING OF TROOPS TO EUROPE.

Pork-barrel politics by certain southern Congressmen has tied up the entire Army program and threatened to delay the movement of troops to France until long after the General Staff had planned.

What has been going on behind the scenes in regard to National Guard cantonments became known yesterday and reveals a story of certain Members of Congress sacrificing the best interests of the Army in order that their States might profit by the money spent on cantonments and by the men to be quartered there.

When the General Staff decided upon 32 cantonments—16 for the National Guard and 16 for the draft army—orders were sent to the commanders of all Army departments to select a certain number of sites in their departments for camps. The camps for the conscript army were rapidly selected. About 10 days ago the War Department announced the selection of six sites for National Guard cantonments.

RECOMMENDATIONS REJECTED.

Then the announcements stopped. No further word was heard concerning the nine camps to be established in Gen. Wood's department. Time passed rapidly, until it is less than a month before the first National Guard regiments are scheduled to go into concentration camps.

The reason for the delay became public yesterday. It was declared that immediately he was ordered to select camp sites, Gen. Wood, with the vigor which characterized his actions both as Chief of Staff and commander of the Department of the East, at Governors Island, sent out a number of his staff officers to locate camp sites. They made their reports to him and he immediately went over the territory they had toured, checking up on their recommendations and approving them in toto.

Then he sent the recommendations to Washington. They contained what in Gen. Wood's opinion were the best sites in the southeastern part of the United States for the nine camps, but every recommendation was for a site in the State of Georgia. If the recommendations for these 9 sites had been approved, 11 of the 12 camps in the Southeastern Department would have been in Georgia.

Wind of Gen. Wood's recommendations reached the ears of Congressmen from other States in the department, which extends as far West as Louisiana and as far North as the Virginia border. A bombardment of protests shook the War Department. The General Staff was set upon front and rear by Congressmen whose States were hungry for site plums and who were determined that the State's appetite should be gratified in order that the States might not lose taste for the Congressmen when the next election rolled around.

Such a storm of protests reached Adjt. Gen. Henry F. McCain and Maj. Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, Acting Chief of Staff, that they wired to Gen. Wood, pointing out that all his selections had been for Georgia sites and urging him to reconsider them to an extent at least. Gen. Wood wired back that he stood absolutely by his original recommendations; that the sites recommended offered the best facilities and met the primary requirements of pure and sufficient water, easy transportation facilities, and a short haul to points of embarkation on the seaboard at Savannah and Charleston.

GEN. WOOD'S TASK IN VAIN.

Then, under pressure here, it was stated yesterday, the department ordered Gen. Wood to recommend a new set of sites. He was forced to do his work all over and is still at it, while the moment when the troops will be moving to the camps—now not even on paper—draws near. It was understood at the War Department yesterday afternoon that Gen. Wood had tentatively selected six of the nine camps, two each to be located in Georgia, Alabama, and South Carolina. The Alabama locations will entail a long extra railroad haul, while outside of a few places South Carolina is understood to offer no suitable facilities for a camp of 40,000 men—a camp larger than most of her cities.

Meanwhile the Militia Bureau is completely at a standstill. No arrangements can be made with the railroads for transportation until the camp sites are selected, and no tentage and other materials can be shipped until some place to ship them is determined upon. From the appearance of things last night the mobilization of the increments ordered out on July 15 may have to be postponed. The second and third increments, ordered out on July 25 and August 5, are in little better position.

The prospects are that the camps may be so delayed that the War Department either will be obliged to delay moving the guardsmen to Europe at the time planned, or that the men will be sent overseas without the period of intensive training planned for them and will have to go to France green for trench preparation there.

IN CONCLUSION.

The foregoing clippings are taken from the "bar of public opinion." Many of them were sent me without comment, and they furnish food for consideration by any legislative body composed of able men carrying grave responsibilities, men who can not afford lightly to brush aside such strictures on the greatest legislative body in the country. These clippings would not have been offered but for the challenge of those who pretend to ask for public opinion. Can any intelligent Member of Congress at either end of the Capitol have any doubt on the subject? Some of the strongest editorial writers in the country have expressed their opinions in unmistakable language of legislative standards that surround these local appropriations. I will be ever ready to defend the personal character ordinarily of any Member of Congress, but I would be derelict in performing a public duty if I failed to place before Members a public estimate of such legislation, reflected by the mirror of public opinion, particularly when that opinion is sought by those who challenge its production.

Let me say in conclusion that these remarks were not contemplated and would not have been offered or placed in the RECORD were it not more than all else for the challenge of Chairman SMALL issued to the minority members of the committee. He challenged the minority to find a single unworthy or unnecessary project in the bill, and said he would lay his case at the "bar of public opinion," so a few observations necessarily have been offered in order to show how such bills stand at the bar. Scores of projects in the pending bill, including the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, Cumberland, Tennessee, Trinity, Red, Ouachita, Congaree, and innumerable other inland waters, rivers, canals, creeks, great and small, included in the four hundred-odd items contained in this bill have heretofore been discussed and enormous Government waste on these waterways revealed. Not one of these items has any proper place in this urgency war measure. Dozens of uncommercial inlets and harbors are also found among the items contained in the bill. It is not a question of dollars nor of waste alone, but it is a question of legislative methods that to-day stands convicted at the "bar of public opinion," and will continue to remain there until we alter a notoriously bad system now employed in meeting legitimate national waterway needs.

NO "WAR" WATERWAY PROJECTS IN BILL.

Although Col. Newcomer before our committee has said a 40-foot channel at flood tide will accommodate the largest 33-foot naval vessel in service, I feel safe in saying that if the Hell Gate proposition is considered important at this time, by naval authorities, that project could be put through Congress during the present session without a dissenting voice, unless from some disappointed advocates of other projects. Whether the cost reaches $5,000,000 or $15,000,000, the same statement is probably true of any other necessary waterway project urged as a war measure during the present Congress. Although it is improbable that any of the proposed projects named in the bill can be constructed or made available during this war, or for many years to come, no disposition exists on the part of the minority members of the committee to prevent such improvements but attempts to smuggle scores of items into this bill under the guise of "preparedness" are sure to thwart the purposes of those engaged in the task.

Not one publication of note in the country will be found standing for the pending old-fashioned river and harbor measure, and it requires no investigation by experts to discover that this bill in character is as bad as any of its defeated predecessors. Possibly it is unnecessary to embalm these remarks in the RECORD morgue, because no unprejudiced legislator seriously believes this bill in its present form will become law, but these remarks are offered with a view of stimulating investigation into a bad legislative system. In conclusion it is again submitted that the chairman of the committee, together with a majority of the committee have refused by argument and vote to trust the Executive with authority to strike out wasteful projects. The chairman, supported by a majority of the committee, helped to overrule a plain and correct parliamentary decision of the Chair, striking out of the bill the $8,000,000 to $12,000,000, or possibly $20,000,000, Chesapeake & Delaware Canal project. The chairman of the committee has challenged minority members of the committee to point out a single unnecessary or wasteful project in a bill that is worse than the average bill, because it groups indefensible projects with good projects, and includes innumerable worthless items that have been drawing sustenance from the Treasury during the past quarter of a century.

If any Member desires to cover an inviting field of "pork-barrel" legislation he may learn of ethics governing able men at either end of the Capitol who fill the highest positions in waterway organizations, which organizations in the recent past have assumed to direct waterway legislation in Congress and have organized back-fires against Members who oppose such legislative methods. Investigators may also ascertain that efforts to get places on the river and harbor committee appear to be made by those who desire to promote particular waterway projects and are expected to do so by their constituents—not to promote national waterway development through the country, but more particularly to advance some specific project. Personalities, cheap ridicule, and criticisms will undoubtedly be leveled at those who undertake this field of investigation, but in uprooting a vicious legislative system based on sectional grabs for every locality there should be no hesitation which course to choose—and results count. The pending bill is bad and unjustifiable as a war measure or on the ground of commercial necessity, it is as objectionable as its predecessors that have been dropped by the wayside, and in like manner this bill ought to be defeated.

Telegraphic Demands for War-Time Prohibition.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES H. RANDALL,
OF CALIFORNIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 20, 1917.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I submit here some hundreds of telegrams from men of prominence in commercial and professional life, who have expressed themselves in favor of war-time prohibition. May I emphasize that these men are not professional reformers? There are not a half dozen preachers in the entire list, nor does there appear hardly a name of a person known on the prohibition platform or in prohibition literature.

It has some times been said that prohibition sentiment is chiefly confined to the wild and wooly west, but it will be noted that New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and other Eastern States are numerously represented. It has also been said that the dry sentiment has its habitat in rural districts. But New York City, Boston, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Chicago have more than their proportionate quota in this list.

Again, the opponents of prohibition have been wont to term the reform a hysteria which has attracted the irresponsible in mind and insignificant in substance. Let me call attention to the fact that every individual name represented as signers of these telegrams is an outstanding name. They represent the best in society, intellect, and commerce. This Congress will do wisely to read thoughtfully and weigh carefully the opinions and advice submitted:

ARIZONA.

I strongly favor national prohibition during the period of this war to prevent venereal diseases in Army and Navy, waste of food in manufacturing liquors, and to promote national productive efficiency.

THOMAS E. CAMPBELL,
Governor of Arizona, Phoenix, Ariz.

CALIFORNIA.

Believing society ought not deliberately to tolerate that which impairs both individual and collective efficiency, I favor national prohibition. We can not properly conserve and utilize our resources either of men or materials if we dissipate them in production and consumption of intoxicating liquors.

BENJ. F. BLEDSOE,
Judge of United States District Court,
Southern District of California, Los Angeles, Cal.

Faculty University Southern California unanimously favors national prohibition during war.

GEO. F. BOVARD,
President Southern California University,
Los Angeles, Cal.

Most sincerely in favor of national prohibition during war to safeguard young recruits in Army and Navy, to promote national efficiency in all directions, and to save food wasted in manufacture of liquor.

C. H. GILBERT,
Professor of Zoology, Leland Stanford University, Palo Alto, Cal.

Drink traffic a foe to national effectiveness. Liquor business a colossal, wicked waste of precious food products; punctures moral grit, menaces physical and mental efficiency. It is an enemy within the gates. Immediate national prohibition would constitute one of the most tremendous steps in national preparedness.

J. STITT WILSON,
Ex-Mayor of Berkeley, Cal., Member of National Committee, Socialist Party, Berkeley, Cal.

I believe every important consideration demands national prohibition during war.

Dr. E. S. BOGARDUS,
Professor of Economics, University of Southern California, Los Angeles, Cal.

National efficiency essential to victory. Liquor traffic is an enemy to efficiency, economic and military, wasting man power, material, and facilities of production. It induces further wastefulness and loss.

JOSEPH W. BINGHAM,
Professor of Law, Leland Stanford University, Palo Alto, Cal.

Think national prohibition almost essential for successful conduct of real war. In face of shortage of food supplies, especially grains, we must bend every effort toward conservation.

EDWARD ELLIOTT,
Attorney, Lane, White & Elliott, Berkeley, Cal.

I am convinced that conservation of manhood, foodstuff, materials, and efficiency of forces alike demand suppression of the liquor traffic.

L. J. THOMAS,
President Farmers and Merchants' Bank, Imperial, Cal.

I am unqualifiedly of the opinion that national prohibition during war to prevent diseases, save food used in the manufacture of liquor, and to promote national productive efficiency is not only desirable but an absolute necessity. Our brains must be clear and nerves steady to win this fight for humanity, and we must win. I believe, too, that this expresses the sentiment of all the people of California who do not directly profit by the manufacture or sale of liquor.

W. H. THOMAS,
Judge of the Superior Court, Santa Ana, Cal.

Heartily indorse prohibition measure during war.

E. D. CONGDON,
Professor of Stanford University, California.

Consider national prohibition absolutely necessary to highest degree of efficiency.

ALBERT B. ULREY,
Professor of Biology and Director of the Marine Biological Station, University of Southern California, Los Angeles, Cal.

Heartily approve of national prohibition during war as a measure certain to promote national efficiency, save waste of food and capital, and decrease disease; see message. Clear to me that England and France would have been better off to-day had they dealt more vigorously with the drink problem at the outset.

E. P. CUBBERLY,
Professor of Education, Stanford University, California.

In my opinion national prohibition liquor traffic would be great step toward efficient national defense. From my official experience am convinced effects of liquor in time of peace are extremely detrimental to individual and a public waste. In time its evil effects would necessarily be greatly augmented.

J. W. CURTIS,
Judge of Superior Court, San Bernardino, Cal.

I think national prohibition extremely desirable during the war.

Dr. GEO. C. PRICE,
Leland Stanford Junior University, California.

I am most profoundly and heartily in accord with suggestion for war-time prohibition. No move, in my opinion, could be more desirable.

LUTHER BURBANK,
"The Plant Wizard," Santa Rosa, Cal.

Emphatically in favor of national prohibition as war measure.

HAROLD HEATH,
Department of Zoology, Stanford University, Palo Alto, Cal.

Every consideration favors national prohibition during war.

R. D. HUNT,
Professor Economics, University Southern California, Los Angeles.

We ought to snatch good where we can from evils of war. We must strike directly at two greatest sources of waste of force—alcoholism and vice.

Dr. DAVID STARR JORDAN,
Chancellor of Leland Stanford University, California.

COLORADO.

I favor national prohibition during war.

Dr. F. A. BUSHEE,
Professor of Ecomonics, University of Colorado, Boulder, Colo.

Prohibition by all means.

L. W. COLE,
Professor of Psychology, University of Colorado, Boulder, Colo.

I strongly favor national prohibition. In war the saloon deals in trouble, weakness, and treachery. The money for liquor is needed for food and clothing, the grain use by breweries and distilleries should be added to the food supply.

CHAS. A. LORY,
President Colorado Agriculture College, Fort Collins, Colo.

Strongly favor national prohibition as economic measure, increasing efficiency of Army and Navy, productivity of the people. Also conservator of public health and morals.

F. N. BRIGGS,
President Interstate Trust Co., Denver, Colo.

My visit to Europe last year, and what I saw there, only adds to my conviction that it is not only desirable but positively necessary that we should have national prohibition during the war. It is almost as important as raising an army.

Sincerely, yours,

BEN B. LINDSEY,
Judge Juvenile Court, Denver, Colo.

CONNECTICUT.

Prohibition would impress central powers with our national earnestness, would incite Great Britain to more vigorous action against her supreme menace, and would make war real to our people. Nothing would more unify the Nation and breed solemn purpose than this urgent sacrifice demanded by the Government and promptly effected. Patriotism would take on vital meaning among our careless millions. The proposal is hall-marked with a lofty, invincible, twentieth century Americanism. It would spell resurrection from our dead selves as a gorged, pleasure-mad, materialistic people.

AMOS P. WILDER,
Former Consul General, Shanghi, Secretary of Yale in China, New Haven, Conn.

Drinking intoxicating liquor leads to disease of mind and body. It is not safe for the Nation to trust the secrets necessary to be kept regarding our defenses during war time to people with diseased minds, for the protection of both Nation and individuals; therefore its sale should be prohibited.

Intoxication leads to debauchery and crime against the opposite sex. For the fair fame of American manhood, the stuff that poisons and excites men's minds and bodies in times of war, and leads them to commit crimes against other men's mothers and sisters should be abolished by national prohibition, and its use prohibited by military rules and regulations providing severe punishment.

SIMON LAKE,
M. I. N. A., Inventor and Consulting Engineer, Milford, Conn.

Strongly in favor of national prohibition during war.

BISHOP WHITE,
Vice President American Chain Co. (Inc.), Bridgeport, Conn.

I unqualifiedly approve of national prohibition during the war.

GEORGE G. WILLIAMS,
President J. B. Williams Co., Soap Manufacturers, Glastonbury, Conn.

Favor national prohibition as a national-defense measure.

DR. H. W. CONN,
Professor of Biology, Wesleyan University, Middleton, Conn.

Entire Interurban Club approve national prohibition.

DR. GEORGE BLUMER,
Dean, Medical Department, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

Heartily in favor of national prohibition.

GEO. A. DRIGGS,
President American Pier Co., Waterbury, Conn.

The efforts of your committee for war-time prohibition in this country should, in my judgment, meet with the unqualified approval of all thinking men.

ROBUS M. DANFORT,
Captain, Field Artillery, New Haven, Conn.

For economical reasons as well as others, strongly favor national prohibition during war.

C. C. CHESENEY,
Manager General Electric Co., New Haven, Conn.

Unqualifiedly in favor national prohibition during war.

PROF. F. W. CARPENTER,
Trinity College, Hartford, Conn.

Am heartily in favor of national prohibition.

A. B. BENNERT,
General Manager Crane Manufacturing Co., Bridgeport, Conn.

I fully approve of national prohibition during the war both to prevent disease and to conserve our food supply as well as to promote efficiency in general.

C. J. BARTLETT,
Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

I heartily favor national prohibition during war and continuing after, if possible.

W. B. KNIGHT,
Quidnock-Windham Manufacturing Co., Manufacturer, Quidnock, R. I., and Willimantic, Conn.

Believe national prohibition essential to successful prosecution of the war and to industrial efficiency, so necessary for military success.

OLIVER L. JOHNSON,
President of the Aspinook Co., Jewett City, Conn., and Norwich, Conn.

I advocate national prohibition to conserve resources, increase efficiency, and promote loyalty and integrity of American people.

E. P. BULLARD,
President Bullard Machine Tool Co., Bridgeport, Conn.

I strongly believe national prohibition during war should be adopted. We are facing serious food shortage. Using grain in manufacture of liquor is useless waste. Efficiency of labor and of Army and Navy will be greatly increased.

W. A. ROGERS,
President Bates & Rogers Construction Co., New Haven, Conn.

I am personally strongly inclined to the opinion that absolute prohibition of manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages is most desirable and important.

E. O. GOSS,
Scovill Manufacturing Co., Waterbury, Conn.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

In reply to your letter I would say that I favor and recommend—during the war or any time—the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

NELSON A. MILES,
Lieutenant General United States Army, Washington, D. C.

Conditions that may demand conscription of men as soldiers and of wealth for arming them call as loudly for the diversion of foodstuffs from distilleries, breweries, and bars to gristmills, bakeries, and breakfast tables.

LOUIS F. POST,
Assistant Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

I am in hearty sympathy with the movement for national prohibition during the war as a means both of efficiency and of economy. In the Army, in the Navy, on the farm, in the shops, and in all of the occupations of transportation total abstinence is needed for the highest possible result, and the millions of bushels of grain that would be saved from the distilleries would be far more valuable as foodstuffs for our own people and for the people of Europe.

P. P. CLAXTON,
Department of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

It seems to me vastly important to conserve our boys in training camps and our food resources at home by abolishing the manufacture and sale of liquor and the attendant vices thereto. Why should we waste our soldiers' lives and our civilians' strength with the same deadly weapon?

W. A. WHITE,
Superintendent United States Hospital for the Insane, Washington, D. C.

I heartily favor prohibition at all times, and I think that the arguments in favor of it are even stronger in times of war than they are in times of peace. I shall cordially support any prohibition measure that may come before Congress. I believe that if we could bring about prohibition in the country it would be a very strong element in the matter of preparedness and in the direction of bringing the war to a successful and speedy termination.

J. CREPPS WICKLIFFE BECKHAM,
Member of United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

There seems to be no doubt that many of the excesses committed by soldiers in the first stages of the great European war were committed by soldiers who were more or less intoxicated. They had evidently secured access to great quantities of liquor and had made such use of them as to unsettle their ordinary common sense.

The United States faces at the present time, in my judgment, an exceedingly critical condition with regard to foodstuffs and to the preservation of the mental integrity of its people. There is no doubt that if some measures are not taken immediately the great waste of material to which the American people are accustomed will go on and seriously hazard finally the food supply, and consequently the health of the people. Very much is being done to forestall this result, but probably no one step could be taken which would so helpfully reinforce all that is being done to encourage the planting of gardens and larger acreage to foodstuffs than the proper treatment of the question of liquor with the use it makes of great masses of foodstuffs.

DR. S. M. NEWMAN,
President of Howard University, Washington, D. C.

FLORIDA.

I hope that the President and Congress will carry national prohibition into effect at once.

SIDNEY J. CATTS,
Governor of Florida, Tallahassee, Fla.

GEORGIA.

Vitally important that nation-wide prohibition measure be passed to safeguard our men and conserve our food. Maj. Gen. O'Ryan, quoted in Social Hygiene Bulletin, March issue, established record among 19,000 soldiers on border of less than 20 cases venereal infection by prohibiting liquors in any form and enforcing moral prophylaxis.

JOHN H. EAGEN,
President American Cast Iron Pipe Co., Atlanta, Ga.

Misuse of food supplies in this period of extremely high prices and dearth of necessities is a criminal waste without regard to the injurious effect of the alcoholic products. National prohibition for at least the period of the war seems absolutely necessary to the maintenance of the physical vigor of the Nation; comes before indulgence in alcoholic stimulants.

W. J. PIERPONT,
President of the Pierpont Mfg. Co., Savannah, Ga.

Prohibition in force in Georgia nearly one year has produced astonishing economic benefits. Following are percentages of reduction arrests for crime in Savannah: Assault with intent to commit murder, 64 per cent; burglary, 47 per cent; drunk and disorderly, 72 per cent; larceny, 50 per cent; larceny after trust, 76 per cent; murder, 66⅔ per cent; lunacy, 54 per cent; number of convicts reduced 50 per cent. Approximately 3,000 less calls for patrol wagon and 10,000 less articles pledged with pawnbrokers than in previous years of open saloons. Farmers and other employers of labor agree efficiency and reliability of labor increased 50 per cent. The enormous quantity of grain required for production of alcoholic drinks is urgently needed for food. It will be a crime to allow continued waste in this manner. National prohibition during war is of vital importance.

WALLACE J. PIERPONT,
Mayor of Savannah, Ga.

Heartily in favor of national prohibition for all times.

R. J. JONES,
President of the Canton Cotton Mills, Canton, Ga.

Entirely in favor of war-time prohibition.

F. B. GORDON,
President Columbus (Ga.) Manufacturing Co.

IDAHO.

I very much favor national prohibition, not only during the war but for all time. The experience of Idaho demonstrates beyond cavil that prohibition is one of the greatest economic measures ever adopted.

M. ALEXANDER,
Governor, Boise, Idaho.

ILLINOIS.

Replying to your telegram, would say that I am in favor of national prohibition during the war and forever after.

DAVID R. FORGAN,
National City Bank, Chicago, Ill.

Favor well-defined national prohibition.

J. P. REEVES,
Treasurer Chicago & Eastern Railroad Co., Chicago.

I recommend unhesitatingly during the war, as a necessary step to insure the conservation of foodstuffs and the increase of industrial productivity, and believe immediate steps should be taken to enforce it.

CHARLES PIEZ,
President Link-Belt Co., Chicago, Ill.

I favor national prohibition in its fullest measure.

W. G. BIERD,
President Chicago & Alton Railroad Co., Chicago, Ill.

Believe war-time prohibition very desirable.

MISS JANE ADDAMS,
Author, Head Resident Worker, Hull House, Chicago, Ill.

I am heartily in favor of prohibition during war.

BION J. ARNOLD,
Electrical Engineer, Member of the Naval Consulting Board, ex-President of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, Etc., Chicago, Ill.

I am for nation-wide prohibition as a war measure because of effect on food, economic, and health conditions.

W. A. EVANS,
Editor of Health Department, Chicago Tribune, Chicago, Ill.

I believe national prohibition during the war will add greatly to national efficiency.

BASIL HARVEY,
Associate Professor of Anatomy, University of Chicago.

Believe national prohibition during war desirable for medical and economic reasons.

ARTHUR L. RICE,
Treasurer of the Technical Publishing Co., Chicago, Ill.

Please record me as strongly urging national prohibition as war measure to promote industrial and military efficiency, to secure economy of cereals for food, to help in the prevention of venereal diseases in Army and Navy, and to promote national health and morals.

WINFIELD SCOTT HALL,
Professor of Physiology, Northwestern University, Chicago, Ill.

Favor establishment national prohibition as war measure.

SHAILER MATHEWS,
Chicago University, President Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

I want national prohibition at once, to diminish venereal diseases and save food.

A. J. CARLSON,
Professor of Physiology, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

Believe national prohibition absolutely necessary for an efficient Army and Navy and the proper conservation of our food supply.

WILLIAM N. GEMMILL,
Judge Municipal Court, Chicago, Ill.

I am emphatically in favor of national prohibition during the war. It would very greatly increase the efficiency of nearly every department of American military and industrial activity, and in its practical results would be equivalent to the taxation and appropriation of several billion dollars.

W. T. BEATTY,
President Austin Manufacturing Co., Chicago, Ill.

National prohibition during the war seems to be imperative. Prohibition would greatly increase productivity in munition plants and other sources of war products and save food wasted or worse in the manufacture of liquor.

Judge ROBERT MCMURDY,
Of Church & McMurdy, Attorneys, Chicago, Ill., President of the Faculty of the John Marshall Law School.

Strongly in favor of national prohibition of all alcoholic beverages during war. It will constitute a long step toward increased national effectiveness.

P. M. LINCOLN,
President American Institute Electrical Engineering, Chicago.

I strongly believe national prohibition during war should be adopted. We are facing serious food shortage. Using grain in manufacture of liquor is useless waste. Efficiency labor of Army and Navy will be greatly increased. Health of our soldiers and sailors safeguarded by prohibition.

W. A. ROGERS,
President Bates & Rogers Construction Co., Chicago, Ill.

By all means and through any agency, no matter how rigorous, there should be absolute prohibition during the war to conserve the food materials, prevent disease, possible disturbances, and increase the general good behavior of the people.

WM. L. TOWER,
Professor of Zoology, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

I heartily indorse proposal of national prohibition as desirable war measure.

CHESTER W. WRIGHT,
Associate Professor of Political Economy, University of Chicago.

Must have national prohibition during war at least.

FAY WOODMANSEE,
Woodmansee & Davidson (Inc.), Consulting Engineers, Chicago, Ill.

Am heartily in favor of prohibition in our country. Its introduction would meet with strong opposition of interested parties, but precedents created in Europe would help support it here. Believe the immense moral and economic benefits justify its adoption.

W. W. WILLITS,
President Adams & Westlake Co., Manufacturers of Castings, Headlights, Chicago, Ill.

National prohibition most desirable to save food and prevent disease.

H. GIDEON WELLS,
Professor Pathology, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

I believe it extremely desirable that we have national prohibition for the duration of the war, as it would greatly conserve the grain supply needed for food purposes and will prevent the loss of a large amount of time in industry at a time when the securing of labor is one of the most difficult problems. It will also assist greatly in the prevention of diseases and the reduction of crime and make us stronger in war and stronger in commerce.

L. C. WALKER,
General Manager of the Aeromotor Co., Chicago.

Heartily approve proposition for national prohibition.

J. M. DODSON,
Dean Medical Department, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

No single measure could strengthen our preparation more than national prohibition. Have been particularly impressed by waste of foods in manufacture of liquor. It is of fundamental importance that this food must be conserved during war.

JOHN M. COULTER,
Head of Department of Botany, Chicago University, Chicago, Ill.

Heartily indorse national prohibition during war.

Heartily favor prohibition. Consider it most necessary for welfare of country.

R. R. BENJAMIN,
President Benjamin Electric Manufacturing Co., Chicago.

I believe that national prohibition during the war would influence favorably the prevention of disease, saving of food, and promotion of efficiency. I would add it will protect women and girls in garrisons and marine towns.

Mrs. ELLA FLAGG YOUNG,
Former Superintendent of Schools, Chicago, Ill.

We consider national prohibition essential as preventative of disease in Army and Navy, likewise for preservation of cereals for use as foods and imperative to the welfare of all industrial institutions.

PARLIN & ORENDORFF CO.,
Manufacturers Agricultural Machinery, Canton, Ill.

I think that national prohibition is the only thing at this time or any other.

WM. GIBSON,
The National Carbon Co., Joliet, Ill.

National prohibition would be a justifiable measure for national defense. There can be no doubt but that it would release large resources, physical and economic, which could be utilized for the defense of the country.

JAMES W. GARNER,
Professor of Political Science, University of Illinois, Champaign, Ill.

Apparently we have not learned the great lesson of the war that vast accumulated wealth and a righteous cause are relatively insignificant when opposed to productive, organizational, and operative efficiencies. Efficiency is lacking with us, individually and governmentally.

Anything, therefore, that endangers the food supply or the vital and moral stamina of those fighting at the front or producing at home must be prohibited.

This means that I thoughly favor national prohibition during the war, to prevent diseases in the Army and Navy, and to save the food wasted in the manufacture of liquor, and to promote national productive efficiency.

B. F. HARRIS,
President First National Bank, Champaign, Ill.

During the conflict national prohibition seems inevitable not only as a measure of national discipline and efficiency but as a move to save grain wasted in the making of liquor.

VACHEL LINDSAY, Poet,
Springfield, Ill.

To stop the waste of grains and diminution of human efficiency due to manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages is one of the most important measures of national defense.

EDW. C. HAYS,
Professor of Sociology, University of Illinois, Urbana, Ill.

Now that we are in a world war, health, economy, efficiency, and morals all demand immediate prohibition.

B. B. HIERONYMUS,

I most assuredly think it would be wise to have prohibition during the war to promote efficiency, to save food, and to prevent disease.

C. A. MOORMAN,
Secretary-Treasurer Moorman Manufacturing Co. Quincy, Ill.

National prohibition would make more efficient soldiers, prevent many diseases, conserve food supply, and promote national efficiency.

C. E. LEGG,
President Pontiac Shoe Manufacturing Co., Pontiac, Ill.

INDIANA.

Whatever happens to win the war is a necessity and obligatory. Any national economic improvement helps to win the war. Prohibition has been proved an economic improvement. National prohibition in war time is a necessity and obligatory.

BOOTH TARKINGTON,
Novelist, Indianapolis, Ind.

Under prospective food conditions it seems nothing short of criminal to me to permit any of our grain to be used for liquors of any kind, or to permit the use of anything that will lower the efficiency of either the fighting or industrial army.

F. ECKHART,
President Eckhart Carriage & Auto Co., Auburn, Ind.

I favor national prohibition to promote the health of the Army and Navy, to save our food supply from being worse than wasted, and to promote national efficiency.

Short residence at three Army posts convinced me years ago of the desirability of war-time prohibition.

D. D. BOWSHER,
Of N. P. Bowsher & Co., South Bend, Ind.

National prohibition is absolutely necessary to Army and Navy efficiency, but even more so for all munition and all "back of the line" production. It is a crime to consume grain for drink in this crisis. The Government should take immediate steps for bone-dry nation-wide prohibition. I will gladly do my bit to assist.

ARTHUR R. BAXTER,
President Keyless Lock Co., Indianapolis, Ind.

From every viewpoint it could not be otherwise than exceedingly fortunate if national prohibition could prevail as a war measure. If it could be at once enforced, to be only operative under that particular act until peace was declared, it would be one of the most fortunate war measures, from an economical standpoint and from a moral standpoint; that is, a protection of the morals of our young men that will form the greatest part of the Army. From a hygienic standpoint; that is, the protection of the health of our young men. From the standpoint of efficiency as keeping our soldiers in the best condition to protect themselves and defend the flag when occasion calls.

MARVIN CAMPBELL,
President the South Bend National Bank, South Bend, Ind.

By all means we urge national prohibition during the war to conserve our food supply and increase our efficiency.

E. B. THORNTON,
President of the Bedford Steam Stone Works, Bedford, Ind.

I heartily approve national prohibition. There is no question it would produce beneficial results, and, in my opinion, would be a popular enactment.

A. R. ERSKINE,
President Studebaker Corporation, South Bend, Ind.

National prohibition during war period imperative if we are to meet in high way the responsibilities we face. Waste of food in manufacturing alcohol in any form for beverage purposes at such a time is little less than criminal. Moral conditions surrounding military camps on Mexican border and elsewhere due to alcohol, and social evil and disease consequent upon indulgence therein are deterring enlistments throughout dry States. Fathers and mothers willing to give their sons to the country in its defense and in defense of democracy, but unwilling that the Government should continue to permit debauchery of their bodies and ruin of their souls while making such defense. This is not only my personal view; it is the general conviction. I hear it constantly on streets, trains, and in homes throughout the Middle West. No more effective national-defense step could be taken.

J. FRANK HANLY,
Ex-Governor of Indiana, Indianapolis.

I heartily approve prohibition during war.

While not a prohibitionist, am in favor of national prohibition at all times, more especially so now.

T. E. PALMER,
Manager Ames Shovel & Tool Co.,
Elwood Steel Plant, Elwood, Ind.

National prohibition should become effective at once not only for the prevention of diseases but for the conservation of our young manhood. The awful waste in foodstuffs on account of the manufacture of liquor is appalling.

Yet it is a small part of the real waste when one is reminded of the terrible depreciation of our young manhood and young womanhood on account of the drink evil.

J. K. RISK,
Manufacturers of Centrifugal Cream Separators, Lebanon, Ind.

I strongly favor prohibition by Federal enactment at least for the period of the war as a tremendous factor in material and moral conservation. Our legislature this winter passed State-wide prohibition law. I believe Indiana would heartily support such measure.

Intoxication and all diseases go hand in hand. Remove alcohol, the diseases will diminish a great degree. Conservation and economy demand the use of grain for food, not drink.

National prohibition is demanded as the first of all war measures. Its value has been proven in Europe, and we are far more ready for it than Europe was.

WM. G. FROST,
President Berea College, Berea, Ky.

KANSAS.

By all means Congress should enact immediately a nation-wide prohibition law. With the Nation at war and every possible resource of food production certain to be strained to the utmost we have neither men nor war material to waste in continuing an evil agency. Millions of bushels of grain are used annually in breweries and distilleries. The hundred thousand laborers worse than wasted in the business should be farming or ready to fight. When martial law is proclaimed saloons always are closed. Why not now that war is declared?

ARTHUR CAPPER,
Governor of Kansas, Topeka, Kans.

Favor national prohibition during war to eliminate waste, save food products and labor. Material benefits will greatly exceed loss of revenue. Prohibition will improve moral and physical condition of soldiers.

F. W. BLACKMAN,

National prohibition during the war would mean a vast saving not only of the people's wealth but also of our moral and physical resources.

F. R. HAMILTON,

National prohibition would release large amount of grain, machinery, and labor that could be mobilized for national protection.

W. S. HUNTER,
Professor Psychology, University of Kansas,
Lawrence, Kans.

National prohibition means grain for brain instead of booze; more flour, less whisky; more drygoods, less wet goods; more sober men, less drunken animals. Sober mechanics give the greatest productive power. More efficiency, lessened industrial accidents; better citizenship. A company of clear-brained soldiers will whip a regiment of drunken men. National prohibition for the United States would mean the welding together in this country greatest commercial forces and the highest agricultural resources that the world has known in all its history. It is impossible for any other nation to marshal such a necessary combination in defense of its sovereignty. National prohibition eventually; why not now?

GEO. H. HODGES,
Ex-Governor of Kansas, Olathe, Kans.

Shocking interference of alcoholic drink with efforts of Lincoln to save Union, together with progressive action of Russia and other nations in present war, command us to hit King Alcohol body blow. Our board of trustees have gone on record as favoring the discontinuance of the manufacture of malt and distilled liquors as a necessary step in saving food waste.

H. J. PATTERSON,
President Maryland State College of Agriculture.

I believe no single step the Government can take would be fraught with so much good to Army and Navy and the morale of the public at home as bone-dry prohibition during the war. It would conserve a million bushels of grain for food, set free all hop lands for cultivation, and would prevent a vast amount of venerial disease acquired under intoxication. We are already seeing the baleful influence of the saloon on our Baltimore recruits.

Dr. HOWARD A. KELLY,
Professor of Surgery, John Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md.

Am fully in sympathy with national prohibition during war period.

A. W. CALLOWAY,
President Davis Coal & Coke Co., Baltimore, Md.

Heartily favor immediate national prohibition as greatest single influence tending toward economy and efficiency.

J. T. FINNEY,
Professor Clinical Surgery, John Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md.

First act that should be passed by Congess after a declaration of war is a declaration of war against whisky, which is as great a curse as war. To call hundreds of thousands of young men to arms and surround them with the temptations so persistently urged upon them by the besotted, beastly whisky sellers that flock to the neighborhood of every army camp would be a crime little short of murder. We have an opportunity now to strike a death blow at the unspeakable curse of whisky and to set a standard of national and personal sobriety which would affect the whole world for good. While the world is short of food and prices are steadily mounting, millions of bushels of grain are being turned into alcoholic drink. Every bushel thus used takes bread from the poor and lessens the world supply of foodstuffs, while the products of the brewery and distillery add to the sorrows and sufferings of the world. The brewery interests are endeavoring to combat this position on the ground that the Government will need all possible income and should not deprive itself of the tax on alcoholic drinks. On the contrary no greater saving could be made to the Nation financially and in manhood than national pohibition during the war. We can infinitely better afford to lose the income from the tax on whisky and beer than to lose the two billions or more dollars annually wasted for alcoholic drinks, and the still greater cost in the destruction of manhood by the side of which the loss of money is not to be considered. I earnestly hope that the campaign for national prohibition, at least during the war, may be pushed to a successful conclusion.

RICHARD H. EDMONDS,
Editor Manufacturers' Record, Baltimore, Md.

ELMER JARED BLISS,

I regard natonal prohibition as a war measure for the conservation of food and human resources as a most effective means for promoting the efficiency of our national preparedness.

L. H. MURLIN,
President of Boston University.

National prohibition is needed to protect the makers of munitions, the producers of food, the creators of all the articles of trade. Liquor flowing freely, results of war activities, induce partial moral and physical degeneracy. With liquor banished war stimulus increases efficiency, and through common service, sacrifice, and suffering, tends to heighten the spiritual sensitiveness of the community. Illustrations from Europe during this war offer proofs as to both the evil and the beneficial results.

ROBERT TREAT PAINE,
Trustee, Vice President of the National Municipal League, President of the Massachusetts Public Opinion League, Boston.

For moral and material welfare of the people total abstinence from alcohol is necessary at all times; for efficiency in war it is imperatively demanded. National prohibition would help. Before Lincoln's proclamation a majority of the States were free from negro slavery; Lincoln made all free. Now is the time to free all Americans from the slavery of alcohol.

COURTENAY GUILD,

Think national prohibition of liquor traffic indispensable during war. How can we logically urge national economy when we are worse than wasting hundreds of millions of dollars worth of food in making intoxicating liquors? National efficiency in this crisis also demands strict prohibition. Can not we sacrifice as much for our ideals?

RAY STANDARD BAKER,
Former Editor McClure's and American Magazines, Amherst, Mass.

Cut it all out during the war and after the war too. It is undermining the moral and physical condition of our people and is as dangerous in peace as in war.

I deeply feel national prohibition at present is most desirable to largely reduce waste of food and greatly increase national efficiency. European experience confirms this statement.

J. L. GRANDIN,
Proprietor Bonanza Farm, Boston, Mass.

My personal opinion national prohibition during war desirable. Manufacture of liquor using millions of bushels of grain now much needed for food. Displaced workmen would be quickly absorbed by other industries. Drinking increases social immorality and venereal disease and so menances health and efficiency of Army. Sober Nation would be able to do its part to end war and so save countless life and treasure.

DR. C. C. CARSTERNS,

H. C. FICK,

National prohibition should be inaugurated at the earliest possible moment for the duration of the war. It would increase our national productive efficiency and help largely to conserve our food supply. I believe that national prohibition would be one of the most important measures of preparedness which the Federal Government could institute, not only as a means of preventing diseases but as one of the most important means that could be adopted for promoting health, endurance, and efficiency, and as a means of preventing enormous waste of food materials as well as great waste of time and money.

ALBERT M. TODD,
Ex-Congressman, President Kalamazoo Municipal

B. F. DAVIS,
President City National Bank,

We are strongly in favor of national prohibition at this time as an economic measure both to save the man and the grain that goes into the liquor business. Local prohibition has increased our efficiency at least 25 per cent, aside from the tremendous improvement from the moral standpoint.

Immediate prohibition of manufacture and sale of liquor and beer fundamentally necessary as first step in military preparedness. Equally necessary for peace and war, but would be imperative as a war measure to save labor, food, and health.

JOHN H. GRAY,

National prohibition would, in my judgment, tend to prevent venerial disease; would save waste of foodstuffs now manufactured into liquor, and would greatly promote production and efficiency, all desirable during the war and equally necessary after the war if this Nation is to hold its place in world-wide competition.

MANOAH B. REESE,
Chief Justice Supreme Court, Lincoln, Nebr.

If there is reason for total abstinence in responsible positions, then the most potent reasons exist for the absolute prohibition of the use and manufacture of liquor. Crush the liquor traffic at least during the war, and you will be giving a deathblow to a more forceful enemy than the Imperial German Army.

CHESTER H. ALDRICH,
Ex-Governor, Lincoln, Nebr.

I believe that the Federal Government should immediately prohibit the manufacture of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes. The people of the United States will need the foodstuffs that are wasted in the manufacture of liquors. We can not continue to undermine the physical and moral manhood of the country and continue to reduce the efficiency both of the producers and the defenders of the country if we hope to bring to a speedy and successful termination the tremendous conflict which the Nation is engaged in. Congress should act at once.

CHAS. W. BRYAN,

WM. STARR MYERS,

The production of liquors is a huge waste of food, and the work should be stopped. Transition from liquor to prohibition economy could be effected in next few months with minimum injustice to brewery and other workers due to the great demand for labor.

PAUL U. KELLOGG,
Editor of the Survey, Boonton, N. J.

I am strongly in favor of national prohibition, for especially during the period of war upon which we are entering, not only to prevent the waste of a very large amount food material now used in the manufacture of beer and liquor, but also to increase the efficiency of men who will be enlisted in the service of the Army and Navy.

I have lived for a great many years close to a western Army post and know how seriously detrimental to the physique of the men is the constant use of liquor.

From a moral standpoint and the prevention of immorality amongst the men of the Army and Navy there is no question whatever but that national prohibition should be adopted and the law strictly enforced.

J. HENRY LONGMAID,
President Esterbrook Steel Pen Mfg. Co., Camden, N. J.

I heartily indorse national prohibition during war as a measure of promoting health, economy, efficiency, and order.

E. G. CONKLIN,
Professor Zoology, Princeton, N. J.

NEW YORK.

I strongly favor complete national prohibition. I believe we are facing a serious test of our national character and efficiency and am firmly convinced that a national prohibition measure would be of transcendant importance in its effect upon the national spirit in conserving and increasing our food supply and in raising the efficiency of the Nation. The man power released from the liquor industries could be directed into other productive channels where the need for labor will be acute and thus be readily absorbed. The needs of the agricultural and industrial situation will make this a peculiarly opportune time to put through a national prohibition law with minimum shock to our economy machinery during the readjustment. The business interests involved should be fairly dealt with, but many of the plants can be readily converted to important industrial uses. The plea that Government revenue will be seriously curtailed should not influence action, for prohibition will induce a national efficiency which will open new and far richer sources of revenue. I believe public opinion, particularly in the West, but slightly comprehends the seriousness of the test that this war will put us to. A national prohibition measure would do much to wake up the people to a realization of what war means and demands. If in the end we got no other good from the war than prohibition we would still be winners because of it. I believe it should be complete, and it can only be complete by being national.

F. A. VANDERLIP,
President City National Bank, New York.

Firmly believe that national prohibition would be of great benefit to both Army and Navy.

SAMUEL S. CHILDS,
President Childs Restaurants Co., New York City.

National prohibition would enormously reduce venereal disease in Army and Navy as well as throughout the land. It would obviously save food wasted in manufacture of liquor and promote national productiveness and efficiency more than a dozen other measures which might be devised. Can conceive of no more important and far-reaching step toward national defense.

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.,
Chairman Rockefeller Foundation, New York.

From every point of view consider national prohibition most desirable during war period.

A. J. PORTER,
President Shredded Wheat Co., Niagara Falls, N. Y.

History will justify entry of United States into the world war only if welfare of mankind is thereby advanced. National prohibition would, in my opinion, add wonderfully to America's efficiency as a fighting machine by increasing production and decreasing waste, besides preventing venereal disease, reducing crime, promoting public order, and raising the moral tone of the national prohibition public.

HAROLD S. BUTTENHEIM,
Editor The American City, New York City.

National prohibition for war period would doubtless promote physical, mental, and moral efficiency all along the line. Great manufacturers of various forms of liquor could, to their own advantage and that of country, transform their institutions into food-producing plants. Am sure they are patriotic enough to do it.

CARRIE CHAPMAN CATTS,
President International Woman's Suffrage Alliance,
New York City.

Lloyd George told Parliament that drink was a more dangerous enemy of England's young men than is Germany and her allies. I believe that our Government should close all breweries and distilleries during the war and conserve the barley, corn, and rye for feeding the allies and our own people.

Rev. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS,
Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

I am firmly of the opinion that as an economic measure prohibition is greatly to be desired, either in peace or war.

SAMUEL MCROBERTS,
Vice President, National City Bank, New York.

Believe everything possible should be done to secure national prohibition during present war period. It is necessary to our business that we know world crop condition; also stores of grain supplied for food. We have never known anything like shortage of basic food supplies that confronts us at the present time. There are many other reasons that would make national prohibition desirable, but the economic needs alone are sufficient call for our hearty support of radical measures to secure this end. Earnestly approve national prohibition.

Brewing and distilling almost wholly wastes the nutritive values of grain; alcohol lessens judgment, self-control, mental and physical efficiency, the qualities needed in war—an asset converted into a liability. Alcoholization is the chief contributory cause of veneral infection among men.

No one can examine the facts in the case without reaching the conclusion that in the present emergency the prohibition of the liquor business would serve our Nation's interests. The grain being consumed by our brewers and distillers is sufficient to make 300 carloads of bread every day, or a single loaf every day 600 miles long.

Collis P. Huntington was one of the shrewdest captains of industry our Nation has ever known. He said that when he and his associates began building the Central Pacific Railroad from Sacramento to Ogden they found the liquor dealers near their workmen's camps were a heavy clog upon their undertaking. They decided to drive away the entire business, and that this step enabled them to complete the railway to Ogden three years earlier than they otherwise could have done. All Europe has adopted the policy of the Central Pacific Railway people. The drinkers and the drink makers of our Nation should accept their share of the hardships of war.

TILLMAN COUDET,
Union Oil Co. of California, New York City.

Cordially indorse suggestion national prohibition during war. Common-sense proposition; should commend itself to clear-thinking people.

Most heartily approve absolute national prohibition during the war. My colleagues in Crocker Fund concur with me in this attitude.

FRANCIS C. WOOD,
Director Cancer Research, Columbia University;
Pathologist of St. Luke's Hospital, New York.

It is useless for the Government to urge the people to frugality if at the same time it fails to stop the stupendous destruction of food materials in the manufacture of alcoholic drinks. The economic result of thus shortening the food supply is exceeded in seriousness by the physical and moral weakening of the manhood of the country, particularly of that class of young men who must constitute our fighting force. It does not meet the situation to compromise by prohibiting liquor to soldiers. The soldier to whom the country expects the supreme sacrifice will not fail to see the injustices as well as the folly of trying to force abstinence upon him while permitting indulgence to the comfortable individual at home. I believe there is widespread realization of the absolute necessity for food conservation and productive efficiency, strengthened by the experience and example of the countries abroad during the past two years, and for this reason, if for no other, public sentiment will support the discontinuance of the liquor traffic during the war.

FRANK S. WASHBURN,
President American Cyanamid Co., New York.

I am heartily in favor of national prohibition during war. It would have very good effect throughout coal regions and tend to increase production of coal, for which country is now paying very high prices owing to shortage of both labor and transportation.

T. H. WATKINS,

New York City.

I believe thoroughly in national prohibition during the war for every sort of good that it will do, for it will do immense good and I can see no possible harm that it would work. H. R. ALBEE,

C. C. COLT,

Unqualified indorsement of prohibition during war period.

Dr. EDWARD MARTIN,
Surgeon in Chief, University of Pennsylvania Hospital.

I am absolutely in favor of national prohibition at this time and at all times.

Confining the issue to national prohibition at this time of national crisis, one has but to consider the increased shortage of food supply caused by the use of grains for the manufacture of alcoholic liquor to consider the disgraceful condition exhibited in the shipyards of Great Britain at the beginning of the war, when warships urgently needing repairs were neglected because the workers were drunk, and to consider the close association of prostitution and venereal disease with liquors to conclude that alcoholic liquor and national efficiency are incompatible.

WALTER CORNWELL,
Director, Department of Public Health, Philadelphia, Pa.

National prohibition is necessary to economize food and to promote industrial efficiency. It would double the effective power of the Nation and reduce avoidable disease by the half. No other measure would do as much to elevate the moral tone of the Nation or to show our firmness of purpose.

SIMON PATTEN,
Professor of Political Economy,
University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.

National prohibition commends itself to me as well advised, especially during war.

F. WAYLAND AYER,
President of the Eastern Mfg. Co., president of N. W. Ayer & Son, president of the Keystone Type Foundry, etc., Philadelphia, Pa.

Dr. Prince A. Morrow, the founder of the Society of Sanitary and Moral Prophylaxis, of which I am on the advisory board, told me that if we could do away with alcohol, enforce national prohibition, we would practically solve the question of venereal disease, and my experience warrants the truth of his assertion, as about every case brought to my attention was addicted to alcoholism. As member of the American Public Health Association, president of a hospital, and interested in hygiene and especially sanitary and moral prophylaxis, I have had some opportunity for observation.

A. B. FARQUHAR,

We believe in the present national crisis the manufacture and sale of liquor should be prohibited so far as is possible with reasonable financial remuneration for money invested.

HARRY B. FRENCH,
President Smith, Kline & French Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

National prohibition is not only desirable but practically essential. There is no question as to its saving grain for food nor of its efficacy in the partial prevention of venereal diseases. The experience of France, Russia, and Great Britain as to the increase of productive efficiency is absolutely convincing.

Heartily favor national prohibition during the war.

DR. JOSEPH MCFARLAND,
Professor of Pathology and Bacteriology, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.

I believe that national prohibition during the war is of tremendous importance to our country. It should be made effective immediately. It would safeguard our young soldiers against the many temptations that will otherwise assail them and impair their value as soldiers and their physical and moral natures as citizens thereafter. It would be a long step toward saving and stabilizing our serious food question and would enormously increase the Nation's efficiency in productive capacity. This also expresses the views of all officers and directors of Exchange National Bank present in meeting to-day.

No scheme of national armament or defense will be adequate unless it includes national prohibition.

The sustenance of the whole people, together with the efficiency of our workers at home and safety of our soldier boys abroad, will demand it.

Above all else the immediate and effective establishment of complete national prohibition will impress the people that the Government at Washington is in dead earnest about this war.

HARRY H. WILLOCK,

DWIGHT C. MORGAN,
President Allegheny River Mining Co.,
Kittanning, Pa.

National prohibition is by far the most important question before the country to-day in connection with a vigorous and efficient prosecution of the war. To allow this country to go into war carrying the enormous economic load now imposed on it by the manufacture and use of liquor would be a crime, and no time should be lost in stopping it. The results of prohibition in Russia and of partial prohibition in England demonstrate this, but we should not wait for months to follow, but should utilize their experience and act promptly and vigorously.

I am in favor of national prohibition during the war.

J. P. LICHTENBERGER,
Professor of Sociology, University of Pennsylvania.

All war facilities are valueless without the strength of body and intellect to use them. From the standpoint of national peril national prohibition is the first and most sensible as well as logical step. It conserves food products and prevents the destruction of intellect as well as the bodies of our citizens by the use of liquor. If there ever was a time in the history of our country when we need men with 100 per cent efficiency it is now, and national prohibition is the longest step in advance toward its realization that the country can take.

Manufacturing alcohol wastes foodstuffs and drinking it wastes men. Their brains are deadened, and their animal passions released, therefore, and venereal diseases have been and always will be the common consequence of even moderate drinking. National prohibition would conserve our resources and increase our efficiency enormously.

A. HOLMES,
Dean of the State College of Pennsylvania.

My judgment is that the unlimited use and abuse of malt and distilled liquor are a most baneful factor in our national welfare, and undoubtedly in the coal regions is responsible for at least a loss of 40 per cent in the economy of our coal production, and responsible for practically all the loss of life and limb in our mines in the last several years. I am speaking now of the nongaseous mines.

WM. J. FAUX,
Logan Coal Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

EDWARD L. WATSON,
President Providence Mutual Fire Insurance Co., Providence, R. I.

Even the moderate drinker can not but agree to prohibition as a war measure, and the facts as laid before our people by the commissioners recently arrived in this country from abroad setting forth as they do the chances of a bread famine throughout the world, are sufficiently convincing to make any intelligent person think seriously of the waste there will be to the world if the unrestricted manufacture of malted liquors is allowed to continue on the same scale as heretofore.

The millions of bushels of grain now being consumed in the United States by manufacturers of liquors, which is a waste of hundreds of millions of loaves of bread, should be stopped and national prohibition proclaimed immediately. The sacrifice in revenue is more than counterbalanced a hundred times by the increased savings of the people and their ability to subscribe for Government loans. We are now expending two and one-half billions dollars a year for intoxicating liquors in the United States—an amount sufficient to finance the $7,000,000,000 loan in less than three years. The great European war has cost $66,000,000,000 to date. The people of the United States at the present rate will expend that much for intoxicating liquors in half of a lifetime.

Conserve the Food Supply, Promote Efficiency, and Save Manhood by Enacting War-Time Prohibition Now.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. RANDALL,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 21, 1917,

On the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill contains a half-hearted suggestion that war-time prohibition of the liquor triffic might help to conserve the food supply of the country. In spite of the well-known fact that the official advisers of the administration have reported that $146,000,000 in food products are annually destroyed by manufacturers of alcoholic liquors, in spite of the fact that the already frugal housewife has been advised to put her family on short rations, and in spite of the fact that world starvation is alleged to be before us, I am astounded that a great committee of this House should fail to bring us a square and honest declaration against further waste of our food supplies by the distillers and brewers.

Mr. Speaker, I shall at the proper time submit the following as a substitute for section 13 of this bill:

SEC. 13. That whenever the President finds that the use of foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of alcoholic beverages shall result in any reduction of the available supply of food he is authorized and directed to prescribe and to give public notice of the prohibition of the use of foods, food materials, and feeds in the production of such beverages. Whenever such notice shall have been given no person shall use any food, food materials, or feeds in the production of alcoholic beverages. In order to further conserve the supply of foods which may otherwise be used in the production of alcohol or distilled spirits to meet Government requirements for the manufacture of munitions and other military and hospital supplies, the President is authorized and directed to commandeer for redistillation for all such purposes, any or all distilled spirits in bond at the date of the approval of this act, and to determine and pay a just compensation therefor.

Any person who willfully violates any provision of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. Speaker, if the Members of this House will turn to that portion of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD wherein the petitions deposited in the basket are recorded, they will find that nearly nine-tenths of them day after day are appeals for war-time prohibition.

GRAINS USED FOR LIQUORS WOULD FEED 10,000,0000 HOGS.

Ten million hogs could be raised in the United States every year with the grain and cereals used in making distilled liquors and beers, according to Prof. M. E. Jaffa, consulting nutrition expert of the State Board of Health of California. If these products were used for feeding cattle or dairy cows, they would satisfy about one and one-half million animals for one year. The by-products from the manufacture of these liquors and beer will feed about 5,000,000 hogs, but since the residue alone is not relished by pigs grains or mill by-products must be supplemented.

Prof. Jaffa says further: "The total amount of grain used for the manufacture of alcohol is 2,183,775,852 pounds. About 500 pounds of grain, supplemented by pasture, is necessary to raise an 8-month hog weighing about 200 pounds. If this were devoted to pork production, it would satisfy the requirements of upward of 4,000,000 hogs. If the cereals used for beer were similarly applied, over 6,000,000 hogs could be raised. If the grains now used for the production of distilled spirits were used for human food, there were be rendered available about 800,000 tons of edible meal, the remainder—bran, etc.—being used for cattle, hog, and poultry feeds. The corresponding estimated figure for the cereals now used for beer would be approximately 1,200,000 tons. In other words, if the total amount of grains now used in the manufacture of distilled spirits and beer were used as human food, there would be produced about 2,000,000 tons of edible meal. If this were all wheat flour, it would correspond to 3,000,000 tons of bread, or 6,000,000,000 1-pound loaves of bread—one loaf per capita per day for two months for the entire United States."

BREWERS DEPRIVE MEAT GROWERS OF BARLEY.

From a prominent ranch owner in my own district in California, I have received the following significant communication:

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 28, 1917.

Hon. C. H. RANDALL, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: To the present demand for a cessation of the brewing of barley and the distilling of grains at this time of demand for such grains for food, permit me to add some facts.

With others, I am developing ranches in this county. During 1916 on my Antelope Valley ranch we produced over 225 hogs. We pasture them on alfalfa and feed some barley, and later on, the last two months, feed mostly barley, as the packers will not buy hogs fed on alfalfa alone, and in fact it is not a balanced ration, but grain and alfalfa together is. Last year at threshing time we tried to buy barley of the ranchers in the west end of the Antelope Valley, where they grow grain exclusively, and found it impossible to do so. Parties said to be buying in the brewers' interests would follow the thrashers and pay a price far above the open market. In fact it is a feature of a rancher to set a price and hold for that. These parties anticipating the market, would see when they could meet him, drive to his ranch and get it. The result was hundreds of tons were taken past my ranches to Lancaster and shipped to the breweries and we had no chance to get it.

The market started at $1.35 per 100. I got all a friend had for $1.70 and of another friend about 200 bags at $2.15, and then bought milo maize shipped from Imperial Valley at $2.25 per 100 to finish out the last 150 hogs. Before buying the last barley we seriously considered the killing and burying all of our pigs under 75 pounds, as we could see no profit in keeping them until February at the prices of grain and alfalfa hay—the latter we had of our own raising. We finally kept and fed them, with little margin in doing so, as we could not get within 2½ cents per pound of the Chicago price for them in Los Angeles. We will have 80 to 100 pigs this year, and, owing to the light crop of grain and the present high price for barley, we are of the opinion it will be better to kill them when they come and fatten the sows and quit the business at this juncture. This looks unpatriotic, but if the beer interests take our barley we will be obliged to do it, as without the grain we can not sell them. I trust these facts will help you in the interest of food raising against its useless waste in brewing and distilling.

Your friend, A. E. CLUTTER.

Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I printed in the RECORD several hundred telegrams from leaders in every avenue of world progress urging conservation of food and other benefits to be derived from war-time prohibition. To-day I add others of the same tenor:

The final adoption of national prohibition is inevitable. By all means do it now. It is foolhardiness to weaken our powers by indulgence in drink. The Nation has no right to waste food materials in the manufacture of liquor. The world has not a pound to spare.

EDWIN D. STARBUCK,
Professor Philosophy State University of Iowa, Iowa City, Iowa.

National prohibition is not the main issue at present. If enacted and enforced would undoubtedly result in saving food materials and promoting industrial efficiency.

W. E. STONE,
President Purdue University, Lafayette, Ind.

National prohibition is, in my judgment, absolutely essential for preservation of food supply, for its helpful influence in preventing disease and for maintenance of officers and men of Army and Navy at their highest possible efficiency, both in camp and field. Congress should not hesitate to pass a national prohibition law as a war measure, and should under no circumstances increase the hold of the liquor traffic upon the economic situation by levying more taxes upon the liquor business.

JOHN T. STONE,
The Maryland Casualty Co., the Board of Casualty and Surety Underwriters of the United States, Baltimore, Md.

Urgently favor national prohibition during war, saving food waste and promoting health and efficiency.

CHARLES SISSON,
President Hope Webbing Co., North Brookfield, Mass.

National prohibition would be the most effective measure of preparedness to conserve the physical and mental health of our soldiers and save for bread the cereals now worse than wasted by the brewers.

L. S. STARRETT,
President the L. S. Starrett Co., Makers Fine Mechanical Tools, Athol, Mass.

Heartily in favor of national prohibition during war.

VIDA SCUDDER,
Professor English Literature, Wellesley College, Mass.

Very much favor carefully planned movement for prohibition during war.

DAVID SNEDDEN,
Professor of Education, Columbia University, New York, Ex-Commissioner of Education for Massachusetts.

I favor national prohibition during war.

E. O. SUTTON,
General Manager of the Knox Motors Corporation, Springfield, Mass.

Considerable evidence here of sentiment favorable to prohibition of beverage sale of alcohol during war.

E. O. SUTTON,
General Manager Knox Motors' Associates, Springfield, Mass.

The United States saloonless and sober would be mightier and readier to meet any foe, even with its present military resources, than it would be with the very maximum of armament and the retention of the saloon with all of its attendant vice and waste. By all means make the total elimination of liquor and its illicit allies the foremost feature of national preparedness. Modify so that it shall run "Trust in God and keep the country dry."

JAMES SCHERMERHORN,
Publisher Detroit Times, Detroit, Mich.

In response to the President's call, I have organized facilities for the financing and harvesting of 800 acres of food crops, all of which are under way and progressing well. This effort on the part of so many is useless if the brewers and distillers are going to be permitted to continue the consumption of food products.

I am not an abstainer, but I recognize we are at war.

"A bushel saved is a bushel raised."

R. J. CALDWELL,
Cotton Manufacturer, New York, N. Y.

I favor national prohibition during war. It will release millions of bushels of grain for food.

MARY K. SIMKHOVITCH,
Head Worker Greenwich House, New York.

I am heartily in accord with national prohibition during war.

H. L. SHUTTLEWORTH,
President Shuttleworth Bros. Co., Carpet Manufacturers, Amsterdam, N. Y.

There should be a national prohibition to conserve food products.

FRED W. SNOW,
President Ramapo Iron Works, Hillburn, N. Y.

I most emphatically favor national prohibition during war.

A. J. STONE,
Vice President Erie Railroad, New York.

Believe the manufacture of grain or food products into beer or alcoholic beverages should be forbidden during the war. The liquor interests should be given the option of disposing of their stocks of grain or surrendering them to the Government within a specific time. In case of surrender to Government the value should be appraised and paid for. The Government could then make disposition as seemed best.

H. A. CARHART,

I emphatically approve national prohibition during the war. Never was there so great need for conservation of energies and foodstuffs. Useless waste should be prevented. I know of no one act of the Government that could be more productive of good to the country than national prohibition during the war.

R. E. SHANAHAN,
Superintendent of the Craig Colony for Epileptics, Sonyea, N. Y.

Heartily in accord national prohibition during war to conserve for food grains used in manufacture of liquor and for promotion of national productive efficiency.

GEORGE W. SISSON, Jr.,
President Racquette River Paper Co., Potsdam, N. Y.

Strongly advocate prohibition during war on economic grounds. This alone should justify such action, although other benefits will undoubtedly result from prohibition during war crisis.

CHARLES STELZLE,
Social Service Engineer, New York City.

I have always been a strong advocate of national prohibition; in order to avoid wastage, conserve our foodstuffs, and promote efficiency it is imperative that immediate action be taken.

ROLLAND H. SPAULDING,
Ex-Governor New Hampshire, Manufacturer Rochester and Tonawanda, N. Y.

Favor national prohibition at all times, but more particularly during time of war.

BIRD W. SPENCER,
President People's Bank & Trust Co., Passaic, N. J.

I think national prohibition for the duration of the war of the utmost importance to the Nation.

ROBERT SIMPSON,
President Phoenix Linen Co., Clifton, N. J.

National prohibition desirable to conserve food and labor wasted in manufacture and sale of liquor. Millions in money now spent for intoxicants would be saved. Thousands of men made useless or inefficient by drink could be reclaimed for useful occupations. A sober nation is a most important step toward preparedness.

R. H. SCOTT,
President Citizens' National Bank, New Philadelphia, Ohio.

We should have national prohibition during the war in order to attain greatest efficiency possible, and to save for food such grains as are used in the manufacturing of liquors.

WM. S. STEARNS,
The Stearns & Fisher Co., Lockland, Ohio.

National prohibition during war would be most desirable from both economic and moral viewpoints. Would strongly urge it.

DANIEL SELTZER,
General Manager Ohio Cultivator Co., Bellevue, Ohio.

Would stop foolish waste of food by prohibiting making and sale of liquors. We can not ask anyone to conserve food until this enormous waste is stopped.

J. HAMMOND SMITH,
University of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

National preparedness in the present crisis should not stop short of nation-wide prohibition of the liquor traffic. We must recognize now the wisdom of doing everything to strengthen the hands of those who fight, as well as conserve the physical resources of the people. With the tidal wave of public sentiment rising higher and still higher against the liquor traffic, our entrance into war should mean its final overthrow. Every consideration justifies action by Congress to this end as a war measure.

CHAS. C. STOLL,
President C. C. Stoll Oil Co., Louisville, Ky.

Strongly in favor of national prohibition during war and any other time. The Middle West would regard it as an outrage if, after their strenuous endeavor to increase the production of food supplies and to economize in the use of food, vast quantities went into the manufacture of liquor. To get the full cooperation of the Middle West, prohibition of the manufacture of liquor and competent plans against venereal diseases are necessary.

I believe that though it would work hardship on some, the best interest of the Nation would be greatly helped by prohibition.

ERNEST THOMPSON SETON.

Alcohol impairs every human faculty.

Alcohol, even in small quantities, attacks all the vital organs, the nervous system, and the blood.

It is held that 30 per cent of the insanity in the world is the direct or indirect result of alcohol.

The ultimate effect of alcohol upon the heart is to depress, and, in continued doses, to paralyze the heart.

Injuries to the drinking man heal more slowly, are more liable to infection, bring on inflammation, and are likely to cause delirum tremens.

Serious injuries to the drinking man, such as broken limbs, often bring on delirium tremens, and 50 per cent of the cases of delirium tremens which follow injuries result in death.

Alcohol is the proximate cause of much of the crime committed in America.

The liquor traffic is responsible for a large proportion of the misery among the working classes.

It has been proven by the most careful experiments, and completely confirmed by actual experience in athletics and war, that alcohol—

1. Slows the sense of sight.
2. Confuses prompt judgment.
3. Spoils accurate shooting, throwing, catching, kicking, etc.
4. Slows all physical movements.
5. Hastens fatigue.
6. Lessens the resisting power of the body to disease and exposure.
7. Increases shock from wounds and injuries.

Statement of Position of Grain Dealers on Food Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. BORLAND,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, much has been said in this debate about "food gamblers" and "food pirates" which may give the impression that all those business men engaged in the handling of food products are included in this sweeping condemnation. Manifestly this is not so. There are very many high-minded and patriotic men engaged in necessary and legitimate lines of handling grain and other food supplies, and whose functions in the economic machinery of the country can not and will not be dispensed with. I take pleasure in inserting here, under unanimous consent, a letter from Mr. George S. Carkener, president of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, explaining the position of grain men toward the food-conservation bill. It is well worth reading, especially by those whose ideas of a grain exchange are a little hazy.

BOARD OF TRADE OF KANSAS CITY, MO.,
PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
Kansas City, Mo., June 21 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM P. BORLAND,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BORLAND: The grain trade is receiving a lot of unjust, unfavorable, and undeserved criticism in connection with the hearings in Washington concerning the proposed food-control legislation. In press reports from Washington we are classed as food manipulators realizing a profit of something like $250,000,000 during a short period. As an instance, it was stated that flour was selling for $5 a barrel over and above its legitimate value.

The grain trade is most anxious to cooperate with the Government in every possible way to conserve food supplies. To my knowledge there has been no official action of any of the grain exchanges in the country having as its object any interference whatever with the President in his present plans. I feel perfectly safe in saying that the large majority of the grain men in the country are sufficiently patriotic to practically give up their business, if necessary, during the period of the war, if after careful study of the matter it is found necessary; and that by being eliminated the cause would be advanced and great masses of the people in this country and abroad materially benefited.

There no doubt are individuals in the grain trade who are opposed to the food-control bill and who are using their influence against its adoption. It has generally been conceded that the grain exchanges offer the most satisfactory and economical medium for handling the surplus grain in the country. To my mind food control, especially with reference to wheat, is very necessary for this year, due to the shortness of the crop.

The causes for the recent high prices are well known and can be confirmed by anyone who will take the trouble to make proper investigation, and are:

First and most important: The heavy unrestricted buying of grain, particularly wheat, by our foreign allies. Their maximum holdings of cash wheat and futures in this country being variously estimated by informed people to range from thirty to fifty or sixty million bushels (all and more than our total surplus), in addition to the heavy buying in this country by foreign neutral Governments.

Second. The housewife buying and storing of supplies, principally flour, due to the panic caused by reports published by the Government indicating a very short wheat crop which might result in almost a famine condition in this country; and Third. To the very unsatisfactory transportation facilities offered by the railroad companies during the past six months.

It is probably true that the average price of wheat from the farms for the closing crop year would not average much over $1.40 to $1.50 per bushel. It is also true that a very large per cent of this grain was made into flour or exported at a price in line with the price mentioned above, plus only a reasonable margin of profit to the grain man or miller. During the last two and a half to three months of the crop year flour did sell in the market at $12 to $15 per barrel, but that price was justified by the price of wheat during that time, and the reason for that advance has been explained above.

The grain trade had absolutely nothing to do with the advance in wheat prices from $2 a bushel up to $3.25 to $3.50 per bushel. In fact, after wheat crossed $2 per bushel there was practically none of the stock in this country owned by either grain dealers or millers, they having either contracted to sell the grain or flour for domestic or export use, or had the unsold part of their stocks hedged in the futures. And the congested holding in this country of one interest representing the foreign Governments was almost altogether responsible for these very high prices. They were certainly not anticipated by grain men either in the country or in the terminal markets.

There were no doubt country elevators and farmers who made an unexpected profit out of this advance. This was due to the railroad situation. Practically every bushel of wheat in this western country would have been moved from the farms and from the country elevators at from $1.50 to $2 per bushel had the railroad companies been in position to furnish the necessary equipment.

The Federal Government has made thorough investigations concerning the operations, margin of profit, etc., in connection with the grain and milling interests, and anyone taking the trouble to investigate the result of those investigations will see that the Government agents came to the conclusion that the profits of the middleman in the grain business, and, as a general rule, in the flour and milling business, was small as compared with the risk and the amount of capital necessary—a very much smaller per cent of profit on the cost than is usually made by operators and manufacturers in other lines.

I hope the matter of control can be settled as promptly as possible. We will run into a very serious situation unless the grain and milling interests are advised promptly what their status is going to be for the coming year.

One of the matters of greatest importance is that of seed for the large area in this western country that did not raise anything in the way of a wheat crop. The last few days we have had some serious and unfavorable reports from the best wheat area in Kansas. They are to the effect that the very high temperatures experienced about 10 days ago has shriveled the wheat badly, so that in some sections they claim a reduction of 30 to 50 per cent in the prospective yield. This is in the section where previous to that time we had the best prospect for a good yield.

My last information indicates that Mr. Hoover's plan is to use the exchanges on the basis of a minimum of profit to the grain and milling interests, which I think is perfectly satisfactory to a large majority.

I hope you will pardon the length of this letter. I am trying to explain our position, as we do not like to be considered unpatriotic, nor do we like to be classed as extortionists who are taking blood money from the people in this country and from the unfortunates in the countries with whom we are allied in this war.

To me it seems unwise and absolutely unnecessary to antagonize the grain interests at this time, when it is of the utmost importance that we work in harmony.

Pardon me for taking so much of your time.

With best wishes and kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours, very truly,

G. S. CARKENER.

Government Control of the Necessities of Life.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. CARY,
OF WISCONSIN,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, in the forty-first chapter of Genesis we read the following verses, so applicable to conditions to-day that I beg leave to quote briefly from the Book of Books:

And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, In my dream, behold, I stood upon the bank of the river:

And, behold, there came up out of the river seven kine, fatfleshed and well favoured; and they fed in a meadow:

And, behold, seven other kine came up after them, poor and very ill favoured and leanfleshed, such as I never saw in all the land of Egypt for baldness:

And the lean and the ill favoured kine did eat up the first seven fat kine:

And when they had eaten them up, it could not be known that they had eaten them; but they were still ill favoured as at the beginning. So I awoke.

And I saw in my dream, and, behold, seven ears came up in one stalk, full and good:

And, behold, seven ears, withered, thin, and blasted with the east wind, sprung up after them:

And the thin ears devoured the seven good ears: and I told this unto the magicians; but there was none that could declare it to me.

And Joseph said unto Pharaoh, The dream of Pharaoh is one: God hath shewed Pharaoh what he is about to do.

The seven good kine are seven years; and the seven good ears are seven years: the dream is one.

And the seven thin and ill favoured kine that came up after them are seven years; and the seven empty ears blasted with the east wind shall be seven years of famine.

This is the thing which I have spoken unto Pharaoh: What God is about to do he sheweth unto Pharaoh.

Behold, there come seven years of great plenty throughout all the land of Egypt.

And there shall arise after them seven years of famine; and all the plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt; and the famine shall consume the land;

* * * * * * *

Now therefore let Pharaoh look out a man discreet and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt.

Let Pharaoh do this, and let him appoint officers over the land, and take up the fifth part of the land of Egypt in the seven plenteous years.

And let them gather all the food of those good years that come, and lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh, and let them keep food in the cities.

And that food shall be for store to the land against the seven years of famine, which shall be in the land of Egypt; that the land perish not through the famine.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Good Book states further that Pharaoh found Joseph's advice good and followed it—to the great benefit of the land of Egypt in troublesome times that followed.

This is probably the first record of a systematic plan of food conservation, but ancient history is full of similar examples, showing that wise rulers and thrifty nations thousands of years ago took the trouble to look ahead and provide for the proverbial rainy day.

We read that in ancient Babylon immense storehouses were built in which a food supply sufficient to last 20 years was maintained, allowance being made for increase of population.

Ever since then nation after nation has followed these ancient examples; and now to-day, in this tragic period of world history, this great country of ours has awakened to the necessity of looking ahead and we are considering a set of bills to regulate the production, distribution, and consumption of the necessities of life.

But, Mr. Speaker, the sad and somewhat sickening feature of our experience with this world-old problem is the humiliating fact that instead of starting to conserve our resources in the past years of plenty, we have waited, blindly, foolishly, carelessly, until the lean years are upon us and we are face to face with a situation that was ably described in an editorial in the New York American of April 11, 1917, which I will insert here:

The distinguishing weakness of our national character is that we seldom trouble to look ahead. The country has been threatening war and approaching food famine for three years, and in all that time not one single thing has been done to prepare for either emergency. Here we are with both staring us right in the eyes.

This country is not going to have enough food to go around this winter, and it is lunacy to keep on shipping away thousands of tons of food, to be eaten abroad, or to be sent to the bottom of the sea by submarines.

No man in this country is better acquainted with real food conditions than is J. Ogden Armour, the head of the Meat Trust. His agents know just how many pounds of food there are in the country at any given time, and just where every pound is to be found.

This is what Mr. Armour had to say last Monday:

"If immediate and radical steps are not taken to increase and conserve the food supply of the United States, this country will find itself next fall and winter in as bad a state, so far as food is concerned, as any of the warring nations of Europe.

"The food shortage is world-wide. Because the time is so short and the situation so dangerous, I favor Government supervision and control of food production and food prices. They have been forced to come to that in Europe. Let us do it before we are compelled to do so."

There are less than six weeks of seed time. Anybody who knows anything at all about Washington and its methods knows right well that nothing will be done during these six weeks to increase next winter's food supplies above the ordinary crops. And reports already in from the winter grain regions forecast short crops.

The storage warehouses are cleaned out. The meat and canned goods are gone. There are no reserves, and the acreage in seed will not supply our own actual needs this coming winter.

Yet with war on our hands and plans to call 2,000,000 men away from production, responsible representatives of the Nation at Washington are going about declaring that nothing—not even our crying military needs—must be permitted to interrupt the steady flow of food supplies to England.

Two years ago this newspaper foresaw these conditions clearly and began to recommend an embargo upon foodstuffs for our own country's protection. We urged this measure of preparedness, as well as every other measure of preparedness, upon the administration and the Congress.

We got laughed at for our pains. There were not even wanting blockheads stupid enough to suspect that our real anxiety for our own country's welfare concealed a dark plot to help Germany! There absolutely were dunces with heads thick enough and brains muddled enough to reach that dull and despicable conclusion.

Here we are, however, with matters exactly as we foretold they would be, and the best solution of this pressing and dangerous problem that Cabinet members can find is to keep on shipping away as much of our remaining food supplies as ships can be loaded with—yes, and to use our own sorely needed ships to increase the fatal drain.

We say again—and we have a right to speak, since we alone predicted and warned the country of these conditions and urged preparation for them—we say that every shipment of food and military supplies from this time on is a blow at our own safety, and that if we do not stop this fatal drain upon our resources the country will be face to face with hunger and with possibly worse disaster.

Now, our earnest suggestion to the Congress is that it imperatively refuse to permit the further drainage of our food supplies and our military supplies and our money supplies to Europe.

We insist that none of these things, at this eleventh hour, when the huge armies are already locked in the final death grapple, can have any decisive effect one way or another upon Europe's conflict.

If the allies are to win, they will, and they must, win with what preparedness they have, for all we can send them now can not possibly change the result.

On the other hand, if the Teutons are about to win, we need every ounce of food and every ounce of preparedness, and ten times as much, right here at home, in order to meet that peril.

We feel deeply the things we now say. There is only one country to us. That is the dear country of our birth and our heart's affection. We have no animosity toward any people. But we would rather see Europe sunk in the sea, if that were the alternative, than to see this America of ours helpless under the sword of an invader.

We appeal to you, Members of the Congress, to say whether or not time and the conditions that have arisen have not vindicated and justified every argument and forecast we have urged upon you and upon the Nation since first the guns began to thunder across the seas.

Have we not been right? Have we not been American? Have we not loyally and patriotically spoken the truth and urged the procedure that would have saved our country from its present perilous predicament?

If this is so, as you know it is, and if our judgment, therefore, is now entitled to consideration, we urge you not to weaken our country's preparedness, not to give away our money by shiploads, not to squander our men and our food reserves upon Europe, but resolutely and determinedly to oppose all such proposals, and earnestly and with all possible haste to speed to the utmost limit the construction of ships, of plants, of guns, the manufacture of ammunition and aircraft and all other war equipment, and to enforce the most thorough conservation of our far too small reserve supplies of food.

Gentlemen of the Congress, for our safety's sake let us think of America.

This was written on April 11, 1917, over two months ago.

And so we have been considering in both Houses of Congress a set of bills on Government food control, each one of them giving the executive branches of our democracy such wide and sweeping powers and conferring such autocratic rights upon the President and his Cabinet that the legislation might well be entitled as "An act giving the American people permission to live or die by administrative authority!"

And the sad, sad feature of the whole matter is that to-day the need is so urgent, the situation so desperate, that we are compelled to pass even such undemocratic measures, and democracy may have to die in her stronghold that the people may live. And bad as it is to place control of the necessities of life in the hands of a Federal bureaucracy, it would be still worse to leave them where they are now, controlled by an arrogant and unscrupulous aristocracy of wealth that is neither responsible to the will of the people or obedient to the laws of God or man. And as I am going to vote for this measure, many of whose provisions I do not approve, I wish to state briefly some of the reasons for my vote, some of the things that should have been done and were not and some of the things that have been done that might better have been left undone.

In the first place this country ought never to have been placed in the position we are in to-day. The last 25 years have seen the development of the most perfect system of cold storage ever devised. Had this system been used for the benefit of the people, prices of foodstuffs could have been always regulated and abnormal fluctuations in food values, such as have occurred over and over again, could have been reduced to a minimum.

But the cold-storage system has been used from the beginning as a means to inflate values, to keep down competition, and to bleed both producer and consumer. It is not necessary to go into details or give figures to prove the case. The facts are so well known that everybody is familiar with them, and the question of legislating on this proposition has been in the minds of a number of Members for years. Ever since I have been in Congress I have been trying to get some action that would correct the known evils of the storage business, but I regret to say I could never get a bill or a resolution further than a pigeonhole in the committee.

What the manipulators have succeeded in doing to the people of America is seen in the following, prepared by a company engaged in general marketing of foods. This table enumerated 60 items in the food budget of the ordinary family, showing the difference in retail prices April, 1914, and April, 1917. The total increase on all the items was 5,119 per cent, the average of the entire list being 85.32 per cent. The smallest increase was rice, 12 per cent; the largest, cabbage, 400 per cent. The company that prepared this table operates on the chain-store plan, makes no deliveries, cuts its overhead to the minimum, buys in enormous quantities, and plays for quick turnover and small-margin profit. It is a "people's store."

Of the 60 items enumerated, 12 are specifically mentioned in the Department of Commerce table entitled "Monthly Average Export Prices of Principal Domestic Articles," based on the actual cost, or the value of articles at the time of exportation at the ports from which shipped, for unit of quantity stated. The most recent table available is that for February, 1917.

Selecting the 12 items common to the market table and to the Government table, a comparison of the price increases shows that the American public is being gouged, not by the small-profit market, but by the price-boosting food speculators. And the increase in overhead charges will by no means account for the increased per cent at which the market is obliged to sell its goods when compared with the increased per cent export price.

The following are the 12 articles common to both tables, with their increased per cent selling price, market, and export:

My worthy colleague, Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania, in the RECORD of June 19, 1917, told a very interesting story of wheat manipulation, and told it so well that I will insert a portion of his remarks here:

Can anyone doubt that such despoilers are operating to defeat the Nation in war. I submit that the empty flour barrel, either in home or store, which can not be refilled save by paying a monstrous tax to greed, is not an incentive to patriotism. These gamblers in the people's food are making the liberty loan doubtful. They are impairing the taxable strength of the Nation. They are poisoning the patriotic impulse of many citizens. They are sowing bitterness and strife and enmity, and breeding discontent and anarchy. They are furnishing aid and comfort to the enemy. They are double-dyed traitors, for they are waging war on the United States as dangerous as the German submarines. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I admit that I feel strongly on this question. During the Sixty-third Congress the Rules Committee of the House, of which I was a member, held extended hearings on certain resolutions dealing with grain exchanges and boards of trade in this country. We had before us members and officers of the Chicago Board of Trade and similar organizations. I shall never forget some of the facts brought out at that hearing. Since then, whenever I hear these food speculators referred to as gamblers, I feel that an apology is due the poker players of the country.

Little bootblacks will shoot craps; lovers of the ponies will play the races; others like shaking dice or playing faro or roulette, and in any of these a man can limit his loss by stopping the play. He can choose his own companions and has reasonable assurance that in the ordinary gambling den the cards are not marked nor the dice loaded nor the ponies doped. He also knows that if he keeps away from the game he will not lose his money.

But in the great gambling game in foodstuffs the men who have nothing to do with the gambling are the chief losers—the farmers who produce the food and the consumers who eat it.

It is said that there is an excuse for those who bet on horse races, since horse raising develops magnificent horses. But no such excuse can be made for those who bet on the price of the people's bread. That kind of gambling develops nothing but dangerous fortunes for the few and equally dangerous suffering and privation for the many. This gambling is with the farmer's load of wheat, with the flour barrel of the miller, and the loaf of bread in the poor man's pantry, and it has an oppressive influence upon them all.

It was stated at that hearing that more wheat is bought and sold on the Chicago Board of Trade than reaches Chicago in a year. That means that the price of food was being fixed by deals in "shadow" wheat, for the prices are fixed by the blackboard where the gambler's quotations are posted.

The sacred "law of supply and demand" has no bearing upon their operations. In 1909 there was a bumper grain crop in this country, yet the price of grains averaged 10 cents more a bushel that year than in 1911, a year of greatly lessened production. The price was not fixed by the supply and demand, either of this country or the world. It was fixed by board of trade gamblers, who juggled figures on a blackboard in their gambling dens and thus levied tribute on every American family.

The extent of that tribute can be realized by the further fact brought out at the Rules Committee hearings, that every time these manipulators change the price of grain 1 cent a bushel they thereby change values to the extent of $50,000,000. If they drop the price 1 cent they lower the value of the farmers' product by $50,000,000, or a drop of 10 cents means $500,000,000. Then, when the bulk of the grain has left the farmers' hands, they reverse the process and by every additional cent on the price they increase values to the consumer a full $50,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, here is what S. H. Greely, of Chicago, a member of the Chicago Board of Trade for 20 years, said before the Rules Committee:

"Although the board of trade deals in 25,000,000 bushels of wheat a day, Chicago does not receive on an average more than 25,000,000 bushels of wheat in a year.

"I know what trading in grain is. I know what future trading is. I have been in it. I was brought up in it; bred in it from youth. No man on the board of trade that knows anything will deny that in the wheat pit alone, on an average, every day in the year the total amount of the purchases plus the total amount of sales in the futures will total at least 25,000,000 bushels a day, from 9.30 in the morning until 1.15 in the afternoon. There are those who have boasted that they have traded in 20,000,000 a day—a single firm. I, myself, although I have been a little dealer, what you might almost term an "insignificant trader," have many a day traded in 500,000 to 1,000,000 bushels and never thought much about it at the time.

"I did not handle the wheat, and there are men in the business today trading in millions upon millions of futures, tens of millions of futures, hundreds of millions of futures, firms that do it every year, that do not know what the color of a warehouse receipt is; they never saw a carload of grain. Mr. Canby, the president of the Chicago Board of Trade, is sitting here to-day, and I will challenge him to show by his records where he ever handled 10 carloads of grain since he has been a member."

Now, what does that testimony mean. It means that both producer and consumer are robbed by men who never perform a single act of service in handling food supplies. It means that prosperity is denied those who have toiled faithfully for it and is diverted to those who do not labor, but destroy.

I can subscribe to the truth of every word here quoted, for a long experience as telegraph operator on the Chicago and Milwaukee Boards of Trade gave me a full and complete insight into this most iniquitous method of gambling. What the wheat gamblers have done since the great war began is too well known to need repeating here, but some people have forgotten the beginning of the boost in wheat prices. On August 28, 1914, a few weeks after the war started, I introduced a resolution calling for an embargo on wheat. I was abused and villified. I was accused of being pro-German; the chamber of commerce of my own city denounced me; the wheat gamblers of Chicago sent men and money into my district to defeat me. I had but one object in mind, and that was to protect the American people from the rapacity of the food speculators at that time and to conserve a supply of breadstuffs for the time of famine, which even then showed signs of approach. To-day, with millions of bushels of wheat lying at the bottom of the ocean, with cargo after cargo that we ship over now being sent to the bottom, with the allies we must feed clamoring for instant help, and with our own people already feeling the pinch of insufficient food supply, the wheat gamblers and food speculators still continue their unholy orgy of inflating values, lopping off huge profits from both producer and consumer, playing both ends against the middle, and gambling with loaded dice always.

They succeeded in getting one enormous bond issue through Congress and the moment it is put through and a few hundred millions are loaned to the allied powers the gang fall over each other trying to get first whack at the pot and the kept press naively announces to the people that this money will "stay in this country."

In this country! Yes; in the same old bulging pockets that belong to the same old gang that have been waxing fat on the profits on munitions of war to slaughter the manhood of Europe and will now wax fat on the hunger and starvation of the men, women, and children of America.

To curb these conscienceless exploiters of the necessities of life I would vote for a worse bill than any of the food bills now pending.

But I think it desirable to call attention to some of the defects in the proposed bills, and as the execution of these laws will be in the hands of administrative officials not directly responsible to the people I deem it both proper and wise to call attention to certain facts connected with the administration of similar measures in the past and would most solemnly warn the people that the old, old copy-book maxim, "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," still holds good.

In the first of the food bills passed by the House some weeks ago the first working section of the bill authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and find out just what is or what is not needed, and so on, and in a short time we will have a lot of reports that nobody reads or could understand if they did, and the bewildered layman wonders what in the name of everything good, bad, and indifferent the statistical bureaus of the Government have been doing in the last 20 years.

We appropriate millions for the Agricultural Department and millions more for the Department of Commerce, with an expensive and supposedly well-equipped Census Bureau, and now, when we need vital information quickly, we have to give them a lot of money so they can find out what they ought to have known years ago. How much information they have on tap for Washington officialdom to get wise on nobody knows, but people are apt to wonder about the accuracy of Government information when they read, as we all did some time ago, in that lively little daily paper, The Official Bulletin, one head of a department states that we are on the verge of starvation, and another head of a department assures us that we have enough and to spare of everything we need.

Let us, however, examine some other provisions of the various food bills. The first bill carried a provision to buy seeds and see that they were properly distributed at as low a cost as possible. I hope there will be enough seed left before next planting time, but I have heard on good authority that a great deal of seed grain has already been milled, and if much time is taken in investigating, there will be a limited supply by the time the department gets ready to buy.

This may sound like unnecessary carping at executive tardiness, but just let us examine an analogous case. You all recall the bill to provide a nitrate plant, that was pending over a year ago. It was a vital matter, a matter of the most supreme importance to this country, whether we stayed at peace or went to war. Senator UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, in his usual logical manner made a statement of the situation which is full of suggestion and should be carefully read, inwardly marked, and digested by everyone interested in the question of food production and control. I will append here a part of this notable speech:

There was a time in the history of the past when new fields and virgin soil of new countries were open to the production of a greater supply of foodstuffs. The new fields of tropical countries will not produce the foodstuffs that the people of the northern latitudes demand, and when it comes to the latitudes in which corn and cotton and wheat and cattle can be produced there are comparatively no new countries left and no new fields to plow.

Mr. President, a half century ago the Empire of Germany could not adequately feed her own people. When this war was declared—I do not mean by the United States but when the European war was declared in August, 1914—the German Empire, with poor land, rock-ribbed hills, was producing within 10 per cent of an adequate food supply to liberally feed the people of that country. What is the story that is told to-day? That Empire, without rich land, an Empire to a large extent of barren soil, surrounded by a rim of bayonets, cut off from the world to a large extent for its food supply, has been able to maintain its armies and its people, if not with an adequate food supply, yet with sufficient food to maintain them on the battle fields for nearly three years. You do not have to go far afield to find out how the result has been accomplished. Any man who will look conditions in the face will read it in the recent history of the past.

Fifty years ago Germany inaugurated a system of intense fertilization of her land. When this war came on she was importing more fertilizer in proportion to her population than was any other country in the world; she was using more fertilizer on her fields than was any other country in the world; and in her production of crops of wheat, of barley, and of potatoes, and other food products she was producing more per acre than the great continent of America, with its fertile fields and productive soil. That is the way we must furnish an adequate supply of food to our people.

There is in the far West to-day some soil that as yet is not worn out; the soils in the arid regions of the Rockies may possibly last for centuries to come; the plains of Nebraska, of Iowa, and the Dakotas may last for decades yet to come before intense fertilization is needed; but every man who is familiar with the conditions in the New England States, in the Southern States, and even to-day in the Middle Western States recognizes the fact that the cultivation of food products can not continue long to be profitable to the farmer unless he is given fertilizer to renew worn-out soil so as to enable him to double and treble his crop production, as he can do with adequate fertilization.

More than a year ago a bill was pending on the floor of the Senate, which the Senate passed after much debate—and I said then much of what I am saying to-day—providing an appropriation of $20,000,000—for what purpose? To supply this country with fertilizer in time of peace and powder in time of war. War is here, and it is said that we must appoint a general manager of our food supplies in order to keep this country from want. Yet no action has so far been taken to supply the nitrogen necessary to provide an adequate supply of powder in time of war and fertilizers in time of peace.

I do not wish to say anything that is unjust or unfair in this matter. The President of the United States, in whose hands this great power was intrusted, of course, has not the opportunity nor the time to exercise the power himself, and nobody expected him to do so. He delegated it to a committee of his Cabinet officers, who, after some deliberation, went to work to solve the problem. In the midst of their attempt to solve the problem the burdens and the cares of this war were cast upon their shoulders, and they have delegated the labor to a committee of chemists to find out whether the farmer needs the fertilizer and whether the Government needs the powder and what is the best method by which they can be produced.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator has the names of the chemists to whom he refers I wish he would read them to the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not at hand the list of that particular board of chemists, but I have a list of a board appointed some days ago by the Council of National Defense to consider questions related to the one we have under consideration. I will say, however, that the board of chemists that have been appointed are able, distinguished men in their line of science, but I also want to say that they are about as far removed from the farmers of this country as the North Pole is from the Equator.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon an interruption, I find some consolation in the Senator's illustration, for if it takes a food dictator as long to get into action as it has taken the other department to establish the proposed nitrate plant, then the war will be over, and most of us will be gathered to our fathers before there is any attempt made to fix the price of anything.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator is right. I listened with great interest to his able address this afternoon, and I am in accord with most of the things he said. The time has come for some action in this matter. The responsibility is here. We have handed on our responsibilities to other people long enough, and they have not acted. The responsibility rests with the Committee on Agriculture. We have delegated our power; we have delegated to some one else the opportunity to act, but no action has been obtained.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that the responsibility for the failure to build the nitrate plant rests on the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We recommended that bill and cordially supported it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, sir; I did not say that at all. The Committee on Agriculture did its part, and for the failure to secure any definite results up to this date they are no more responsible than are other Members of the Senate; but when you trust a man once and he fails you, it is his fault; if you trust him the second time and he fails you, it is your fault. If the Committee on Agriculture proposes now to merely delegate power without providing effective legislation, it will be their fault and no one else's when the failure comes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask the Senator if anything in the bill reported from the committee carries the suggestion of a food dictator?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but I say the time has come for Congress to do something affirmatively. If the Government wants powder, we can say, "Go and produce that powder," and those charged with responsibility will have to produce it. If we believe that a nitrogen supply in this country is needed, we can stop leaving it to the discretion of somebody else, and say that action must be taken; provide the money and specify how it shall be used to produce the desired result. Then we will have a determination of the question.

I regret that it is left for me to make this speech this afternoon. I think I have as much patience as any other man; I have been patient for an entire year, but I know that if an enemy of this country was able to drive us off the seas, we could not fight a battle with a first-class power for six months for the lack of an adequate nitrate supply, and I know that if we want the people of this country to have cheaper food, we must give our farmers an opportunity to raise cheaper food, so they can sell cheaper food, and sell it profitably.

There is but one way out, and you can read it in the history of the world. The essential thing for producing cheap food is rich land, and when rich land has been depleted and worn out that which takes the place of rich land is fertilizer; but other Senators know, as I know, that when we had a bill here a year ago to provide a fertilizer supply in this country some of the great interests placed themselves, like lions, across the path, and they are still there. It is not to their interest that present supplies should be increased or that new methods should be made use of to bring about cheaper fertilization.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say that I cordially agree with the Senator. We really had a right to have the nitrogen plant erected long before this time, and if anybody has been a "slacker" it is not Congress; but the Senator suggests that the Committee on Agriculture can remedy the difficulty in some way. I want to say as one member of that committee that I have suggested to the authorized agency created by us months ago that we were entitled to action, and I complained at the delay. As the Senator seems to think the committee has some way to press the matter, I should be glad to have him suggest the way, because I, individually, as one member of that committee, have been urging action and have felt that there was cause for serious grievance that nothing had been done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will be delighted to suggest a way. I do not think there is any difficulty in suggesting a way. I think if this bill is recommitted and the committee will send for the men who have been put in charge of this matter and ask them what they are doing and whether they are going to do anything, and if they have not done anything and do not intend to do so, then for the committee to write in the law a definite plan of procedure, what shall be done, we will obtain results. If they will make up their minds as to the process which should be adopted to furnish this country with cheap fertilizer and the nitrogen that it needs and when and where that process should be installed, we will soon start a great reform in our agricultural development. There are Members on the floor of the Senate who will sustain the committee when they bring in a report of that kind.

Now, this is no new story.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this nitrate question is a much more important question in its relation to food production than most people imagine and I wish here to touch a little on some of its peculiar features, which have many angles.

The wheat crop has been steadily decreasing since 1914, in spite of rising prices, not only in this country but in Canada as well. The reason for this is obvious. As the Senator from Alabama so aptly remarked, nitrate fertilizers are absolutely necessary, and ever since the war began the wheat-producing countries of the world have been deprived of their one great need—chemical fertilizer—and the greatest source of supply for chemical fertilizer was eliminated by the blockade of English allies in the beginning of the war. An idea of the amount of fertilizer we imported from Germany before the war may be gathered from the following table:

Fertilizers.	Value in 1913.	Value in 1914.
Bone dust	$132,203	$281,517
Guano	28,457	36,968
Kainit	2,154,977	2,554,567
Manure salts	1,775,007	2,696,671
Muriate of potash	6,781,181	7,834,895
Sulphate of potash	1,751,661	1,827,763
All other substances	743,855	1,550,856
Total	13,347,341	16,803,237

These imports were stopped by the English blockade, and the wheat crops of both the United States and Canada have shrunk ever since. Thus a move to hamper our enemy has hurt not only us, but has substantially lowered the amount of breadstuffs available for export to our allies not only from the United States, but from Canada as well. This is a condition that, of course, can not be remedied now, but there is another phase of the fertilizer question that could and should be remedied at once, and I am in hopes that when the President gets the power this legislation will give him he will take some steps to change a condition that I will refer to briefly. In his speech on food control, May 21, 1917, in the Senate Senator UNDERWOOD said:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the Government of the United States, by its authorized officers, has stated before a committee of the other House within the last week that we could not afford to send ships to Chile to bring nitrogen here for fertilizer purposes, and yet a year ago a great organization that was driven out of this country, that produces nitrates just as they are being produced in Germany to-day, stated before the Agricultural Committee of the Senate that if the Government would give them an opportunity to use cheap water power they would be willing to guarantee that the cost of fertilizer to the farmers in this country would be reduced one-half. Now, that is in the record. Go and examine the record of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. REED. What was that company?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was the American Cyanamid Co., an American company that has been compelled to do business on the other side of Niagara Falls by the laws of our own Government, and the refusal of our own Government to give them an opportunity to do business on American soil.

You will note in the beginning of these remarks that the Government states it can not furnish ships to bring nitrate fertilizer from South America. The German ships that used to ply between South American and United States ports have been driven from the seas; the English ships are busy elsewhere, carrying supplies to England, getting sunk by submarines, and so forth.

There is one line of ships that has been trying to develop a carrying trade between our ports and those of South American countries, and had this company been allowed to pursue its honest and legitimate business there would not be the shortage in fertilizer that exists to-day. I refer to the American Trans-Atlantic Co., a corporation whose officers and stockholders are all American citizens engaged in a strictly American enterprise. For some reason that has not been explained as yet this company has been blacklisted by the Government of our English allies, and a means of securing freight service between this country and South America is interfered with, American commerce crippled, and the very possibility of our rendering effective aid to our allies is just that much damaged. I introduced a resolution calling on the Secretary of State for information on the subject, which I will append here:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 91) calling upon the Secretary of State for information as to the ships of the American Transatlantic Co.

Whereas grave and serious questions as to the rights of American shipowners are involved in the following advertisements of the American Transatlantic Co. that have appeared in the New York Commercial, of May 14, 1917, the Washington Post, of May 15, 1917, and the New York Evening Post, of May 11, 1917:

To the public: $10,000 REWARD!

For the better part of two years malign influences have worked hard to discredit this company.

The most recent instance of the activities of these influences centered about the detention of three of our steamers at St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, where they put in to replenish bunkers on their way to Buenos Aires.

The ships were detained at that port until the manifests were examined in Washington. They were then promptly released and proceeded on their way

During this time the crew of one steamer became troublesome and the captain discharged a number of them.

Then the world was told by newspaper stories, emanating from the discharged members of the troublesome crew, that our ships had been secretly giving aid to German submarines.

The story would have been interesting had it been new. The fact is, however, that it was an old lie invented by the malign influences that have sought and are still seeking to drive this company out of the steamship business.

A few months ago these influences caused to be circulated a statement that three of the ships of this company were to deliver gold to a German raider in the South Atlantic. Without making an attempt to verify the truth of that statement the Associated Press sent it broadcast throughout the country and a number of newspapers published it. We protested to the Associated Press, and we threatened legal proceedings against some of the newspapers, whereupon we promptly received retractions of the false charges.

Our troubles date back to the time when we first purchased these ships in 1915 and applied to the United States Commissioner of Navigation, E. T. Chamberlain, for American registry. All of our ships were always under neutral flags, and were therefore without question entitled to American registry.

For reasons of his own the commissioner was opposed to augmenting the American merchant marine by adding these 11 steamships, having an aggregate cargo capacity of 62,000 tons. He delayed issuing registry and published a statement that our ships were not entitled to the American flag.

In the meantime one of our steamers, which was purchased from its former Norwegian owner for delivery to us at the port of Marseille had arrived there and surrendered its Norwegian papers. The ship was then temporarily without a flag, and was for that reason seized by the French Government, and although the American Government soon afterwards issued American registry, and although Secretary Redfield pronounced the statements of his subordinate, Mr. Chamberlain, as unauthorized and unsanctioned by the United States Government, this ship is still held.

Soon thereafter the British Government seized three additional ships belonging to this company and blacklisted the remaining seven ships. These ships were seized solely on suspicion cast on our enterprise by the United States Commissioner of Navigation and by American steamship men, competitors of this company.

The ships never committed any overt act.

We permitted attorneys for the British Government to examine all of our books, records, and files.

They found nothing against us. Their contention as disclosed in the pending price court proceedings in London are based solely on the statements of the United States Commissioner of Navigation.

The State Department in official communications to Great Britain held that the seizure of our ships was illegal and requested their release. This was ignored like many other requests our Government has made to Great Britain.

British enmity against our ships has increased because they are carrying cargoes between North and South America for blacklisted firms. Great Britain does not seem to realize that this is a matter of necessity, as other cargoes are not offered to blacklisted ships.

The result of all this is that the 22,000 tons of cargo capacity of the four seized ships has been lost to the American Merchant Marine since 1915, while the efficiency of the remaining 40,000 tons has been greatly reduced, to say nothing of millions of dollars loss to us.

Knowing that the American people love fair play and are unwilling to be made the dupes of the malign influences that are eager to drive a competitor out of business by foul methods, we decided to print this advertisement that the public may be cautioned against the fake stories that are being put out against us.

This is an American company employing only American capital, officered and operated by Americans whose patriotism in every sense is the equal of and perhaps better than that of those who have set the lies against us afloat.

Cunning and unscrupulous as are the influences behind the conspiracy against us, we do not think they can longer escape the punishment they deserve.

To this end we therefore offer a reward of $10,000 for evidence that will result in the conviction of any person or persons distributing false statements concerning our company or the operations of our ships.

We will pay also the sum of $50,000 to any person or persons who will prove that any of our ships have delivered supplies to a German submarine or raider, or that this company has in any manner deliberately violated the laws of the United States or international law.

And

SHALL ALL AMERICAN SHIPS BE PUT IN DANGER OF BEING SEIZED?

To the public:

In the New York Times of Saturady, May 12, the British consulate at New York is quoted as having said that the ships of this company are being kept on the British black list because the British Government believes that a German citizen is a beneficiary owner of the vessels. The paragraph containing the above said also that if the British Admiralty made good its claim to the ships Kankakee, Hocking, and Genesee on the ground of German ownership it would mean that the United States could seize the other seven ships of our line.

Now, we shall not discuss the allegation of German ownership further than to say that, being false, such ownership of course can not be established.

But were the allegation true the statements attributed to the British consulate would not be less incorrect, for the reason that the Government of the United States has notified the British Government that where the ship is shown to belong to a corporation her nationality is that of the country in which the corporation has its corporate existence, regardless of the ownership of the shares of the company.

The Government of the United States has notified the British Government further that it can not accede to the contention of the British Government that the vessels are owned wholly or in part by the enemies of Great Britain, since it seems clear that they belong to the American corporation; the ships having been transferred to the corporation by regular bills of sale from their neutral owners.

Moreover, the State Department has pointed out to the British Government that the position of the Government of the United States in the matter is corroborated by article 57 of the London convention, which article stipulated that "the neutral or enemy character of vessel is determined by the flag she is entitled to fly."

This article 57 was adopted by the British Government without modification or amendment by the Order in Council of October 29, 1914.

It remained the law of Great Britain until its adoption was repealed by the Order in Council of October 20, 1915.

The vessels of our fleet were acquired and granted American registry while article 57 was yet in force as the applicable British law.

In other words, the Government of the United States has declared to the British Government that our ships had a right to fly the American flag and has protested the acts of seizure by Great Britain as not only illegal but in contradiction of British law, and has further declared that the vessels ought to be set free.

In view of the foregoing we deemed it wise to publish this statement, not in our own behalf alone, but in behalf of every American steamship corporation.

Surely every American steamship corporation has a vital concern in the outcome of Great Britain's contention as to ownership of shares in this company.

For should the British claim be allowed to prevail there would be the danger of seizure of American ships of such steamship corporations as International Mercantile Marine, United Fruit, Pacific Mail, and Atlantic, Gulf and West Indies, because Germans or citizens of other enemy countries may own shares in those corporations or may at any time acquire shares in them in the open market.

AMERICAN TRANSATLANTIC CO.,

And

Whereas the majority of the stockholders of the American Transatlantic Co. are American citizens and have invested their money in American ships with the expectation that their property rights would be protected by the Government of the United States at all times and under all circumstances against the aggressions, real or fancied, of any foreign governments: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State is hereby requested and directed to report to the Congress within a reasonable time what steps have been taken by the Government of the United States to protect the ships of the American Transatlantic Co. from the aggression and the interference of any foreign Government, either at sea or at any foreign port, while engaged in legitimate trade.

I have received no reply, the ships of the company are still blacklisted, and I will now show what bearing this has on the food question. I insert here a part of a letter received from Mr. Wagner, the president of the company. You will note that several of the ships carried nitrates:

In addition to the matters stated in our letter of May 23 and as a specific instance in regard to the nitrate shipments, would refer to our steamer Allegemash. We are prepared to show that Messrs. D. B. Dearborn & Co., of New York, a prominent brokerage firm, requested an offer of a freight rate to carry nitrate on our steamer Allegemash from Chile to the United States, to be consigned to the United States Government. They said they required a firm offer in order that Messrs. D. J. Baker & Bro., of New York, who represented the sellers of the nitrate to the United States Government might communicate with London to assure the approval of our ships, and these brokers intimated that this was because the ships were blacklisted.

We might also refer to our experience with the firms of Wessel, Duval & Co. and W. R. Grace & Co., both of New York. These firms have refused to even discuss with our freight brokers the question of using our ships to carry nitrate from Chile to the United States.

So we see that the United States can not furnish ships to bring fertilizer from South America, our allies will not let private American citizens operate ships to bring fertilizer to this country, the Government will not give an American firm the opportunity to manufacture nitrates, the chemists appointed to investigate and report on the best methods of making nitrates are still investigating, and in the meantime the farmers are doing without fertilizer, the grain crops are shrinking, bread and flour are getting dearer, and the Department of Agriculture is probably gathering materials for a new report. So much for the fertilizer situation.

If Mr. Hoover, the able mining engineer, whom the President appointed as food dictator or director, or something like that—if this Mr. Hoover is the administrative Hercules that so many people apparently believe him to be, I would respectfully suggest that the nitrate and fertilizer problem is an Augean stable for him to begin on that needs an overhauling badly and quickly.

And, Mr. Speaker, I submit that if the administrative powers we are going to grant and the money we are going to appropriate is not going to give us any quicker results we are going to be worse off than we are now.

The really important thing to do right now is to pass drastic legislation at once to curb the unholy gambling in foodstuffs; to make laws with teeth in them that will put a few wheat kings, corn kings, onion kings out somewhere near the ex-Czar of Russia and keep them there.

And while we are curbing the food pirates we should pay some attention to other gamblers in the necessities of life. Fuel, for instance, is as much a necessity as food and should properly be linked with food in this legislation. There is every indication that the big coal barons are getting ready to have their inning. The accompanying circular from a reputable coal dealer in Washington clearly illustrates the game that is being played:

J. MAURY DOVE CO.

Washington, D. C., May 21, 1917.

DEAR SIR: This company regrets that it has not as yet been in position to fill in full all orders tendered it by its customers, and wishes at this time to set forth clearly its position in the matter, hoping thereby to secure the cooperation of its customers.

The company has facilities to handle in full many times the orders at present on its books, and its inability to do so has been due entirely to the fact it has been impossible to secure from the producing companies more than 15 per cent of its customers' demands. The company is using every effort to avoid the proposition of buying "premium coal," meaning by that, coal which can be purchased for immediate shipment by the payment of 50 cents to $1 per ton over the regular prices, depending on market conditions.

We consider the prices of "premium coal" as uncalled for and unwarranted, but in order for us to maintain our position in this matter it will be necessary that our customers extend to us the fullest cooperation and leniency with respect to their orders which we now hold and which have not been delivered. Unless we receive this aid from our customers we will probably be forced to go out and purchase this high-priced coal, which would necessitate charging the amount of the premium that we would have to pay to the customers' accounts, our margin of profit being so small that it would be impossible for us to absorb this extra charge.

While we may not be able at the present time to fill your entire order, there is no doubt we will be able to do so long before the advent of cold weather, or before you begin burning coal.

Your immediate needs can be taken care of.

Very truly, yours,

W. HAMILTON SMITH, Manager.

There is plenty of coal mined and ready, but the old game of holding back stock to raise prices is in plain evidence, and unless something is done, and that very soon, the coal barons will be getting their full pro rata of the one hundred and odd per cent increase in the cost of living. The same is true of every other necessity of life, food to eat and fuel to cook it, and if we are going after one class of robbers why not make a good clean up and go after them all?

I have indicated a few of the reasons why I will vote for this bill. I have indicated a few directions that I hope will be taken in administering the law. The people are watching both legislative and executive branches of the Government as they never watched them before. If we legislate foolishly, if we pass laws that do not correct the evils of to-day, we know that the day of reckoning will come for us to-morrow. And if the executive branch of the Government does not carry out those laws and by prompt, patriotic, and impartial administration give the people relief, it will be an evil day for that branch of the Government.

Submarine Warfare.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. KUHIO KALANIANAOLE,

OF HAWAII,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Mr. Speaker, the Territory of Hawaii has officially honored John Davis, Ekela Kaohi, Charles Kanai, Julian Macomber, and Henry Rice, the five sons of Hawaii who perished on the night of April 1, 1917, when the Aztec became a victim of the ruthless submarine warfare waged by the Empire of Germany against the world.

News of the sinking of the Aztec came on the eve of the declaration of war. The people of the island Territory were deeply stirred. The legislature, in session, by resolution set aside Sunday, April 27, 1917, as the day on which the Territory officially memorialized those of its sons who had lost their lives in their calling, the peaceful navigation of the high seas.

Mr. Speaker, there will be countless tales of American heroism before peace comes again to the world, but I deem it my duty to now inscribe forever in the records of the Congress of the United States the story of these five brave Hawaiian boys and the honor that was paid to them by the people of their islands.

The Commercial-Advertiser and the Star-Bulletin, the leading newspapers of the Territory of Hawaii, tell the story well, and I will read their reports to show the real American spirit of the Hawaiian people.

The narrative of the memorial services in the Commercial-Advertiser follows:

To do honor to John Davis, Ekela Kaohi, Charles Kanai, Julian Macomber, and Henry Rice the five sons of Hawaii who perished on the night of April 1, 1917, by the ruthless submarine warfare being waged by Germany against the world, the Legislature of Hawaii held a memorial service in the capitol grounds yesterday morning at 10 o'clock. There was an attendance of several thousand people when the service commenced.

Seated on the speaker's platform, erected in front of the makai steps of the capitol and appropriately decorated with the United States and Hawaiian flags, together with black and white drapings, were Gov. Lucius E. Pinkham, Brig. Gen. Frederick S. Strong, Brig. Gen. Samuel I. Johnson, and other officers of the Army and Navy, Mayor I. C. Lane, members of the legislature, and relatives of the deceased men.

With the Stars and Stripes prominently displayed, the National Guard and the Naval Militia attended in dress uniform, while the local Boy Scouts did good work as ushers. The Hawaiian Band, pupils of the normal school, and members of the Young People's League were present and rendered a number of musical and vocal items. The anthem "Old Hundred," the dirge "Saul," and "Nearer My God to Thee" were the selections given by the band, while the children sang "Hail Columbia," "Recessional," and "Hawaii Ponoi."

CHILLINGWORTH SPEAKS.

Charles F. Chillingworth, president of the senate, with a few introductory remarks told the object of the memorial service. "We are here," he said, "in accordance with a concurrent resolution adopted by the two houses now in session, to do honor to the five brave lads who gave up their lives, not in the heat of battle but nevertheless for their country."

Invocation by the Rev. L. B. Kaumeheiwa, chaplain of the house of representatives, and scripture and prayer by the Rev. Akaiko Akana, chaplain of the senate, were given, following which Representative Lorrin Andrews delivered an oration, in which he laid special stress on the American flag and what it meant. In part he said:

"There is a flag floating over this building which symbolizes to all of us that which we hold most dear. It was conceived in a struggle for liberty against oppression. It presided over the birth of the greatest Republic that the world has ever seen, and it has always represented honor, freedom, and justice.

SYMBOL OF FREEDOM.

"What the cross is to the Christian as a symbol of his faith in the God he worships, the flag is to the patriot as the symbol of the land of his birth and adoption.

"The Egyptian of old looked up to the representation of the sacred emblem on the flag he followed and freely suffered his life blood to flow on desert sands for the sake of his country.

"The Greek soldier gazed upon the bird of wisdom—the owl—on the flag borne by his legion, and on the monument at Thermopylæ is inscribed the words:

"'Go, stranger, and in Sparta tell
That here, obedient to her laws, we fell.'

"The Roman pointed to the eagle on the flag of the Cæsars and said to the stranger who obstructed his passage in his world conquest: 'Stand out of my road. I am a Roman citizen.'

"In the cross of St. George, the Englishman hears the morning drumbeats of Britain making music around the world.

"The Frenchman looks at the tricolor, and his breast swells with pride. He sees in it liberty, fraternity, and equality.

"What shall be said of the flag we venerate—the flag for whose sake the young men whose death we commemorate to-day gave their lives? What memories does it evoke? What hopes does it inspire? It has been cristened 'The flag of freedom.' It has been sung as the 'Star Spangled Banner.' It has been known in our hearts by the familiar name of 'Old Glory.' When we look up at it waving in the breeze—more majestic and imposing than any other flag ever created—we feel its living presence in our hearts. We feel that it is the incarnation of liberty regulated and protected by laws, the embodiment of the power and majesty of the mightiest of earth's nations.

MESSAGE FLAG BEARS.

"Our flag represents all that is best and wisest in human government. It represents the fruition of the seed that was planted ages ago when the monotones of the Mediterranean chanted first the cradle songs, and later the requiems of republics long since dead, but whose immortal principles still survive.

"Our flag represents the 10 messages of thunder that were delivered on Mount Sinai. It represents the philosophy preached by Socrates in the city of the violet crown. It represents many of the sublime teachings of the Savior of mankind. It represents the Pandects of Justinian and the principles of the common law. It represents the right of religious and personal liberty and freedom of speech. It represents the right of self-government and the right of the people to regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to their organic laws.

"Is it any wonder that the young men of the Nation love and venerate our flag and what it means to them? It meant so much to the young men whose memory we honor to-day that they were willing to go down into the valley of the shadow of death. It should mean to us who survive them that the cause for which they laid down their lives shall be sacred to us; that we should renew our pledges to our country and consecrate our lives anew to the principles of justice and liberty upon which it was founded, and to which it owes its existence.

HAWAII ALWAYS READY.

"This is not the first time that the young men of Hawaii have shown their willingness to give their lives for their country. In the dark hours of the Civil War, when it looked as if national life would be blotted out and our flag disappear from the nations of the world, the young men of Hawaii heard the call of liberty and traveled to the mainland, there to shed their blood for the sacred principles of liberty and equality of all mankind, regardless of race.

"When the Nation was threatened in the Spanish War, the young men of Hawaii were among the first to volunteer, and in the jungles of the Philippines, fought with savages to carry out our ideas of civilization and progress.

"Whenever the flag has called, wherever it has pointed, the young men of Hawaii have been ready to follow. They have not hesitated. They have not asked reasons and their devotion to their country has been as sincere as those whose ancestors fought at Bunker Hill, and now a new war threatens our country, and lo, the young men of Hawaii have been among the first to lay down their lives.

"These five men were not trained fighters. They were simple folk—light-hearted boys, personally known to many of you who honor their memory to-day. They were our people. They belonged to us. They were part of the life of this little community, and now they have passed away forever.

"They did not go out determined to slay. They had no grievance or rage against their fellow men. They were engaged in the peaceful pursuit of commerce, bravely and fearlessly, as befits American citizens, traveling the seas, the highways of the nations which have been sacred ever since the days of the Greek explorers.

MEET CRAFTY FOE.

"And there they met an enemy as crafty and ruthless as any since the days when barbarians waged warfare for massacre and plunder. An enemy which did not seek to meet armed foes, but preyed upon the defenseless when in the most unprotected place—the wide ocean. An enemy which cared not how many innocent women were widowed or how many children left fatherless; which did not strike an equal foe, but only dared to slaughter the unarmed and defenseless.

"The details of what occurred when the ill-fated Aztec was struck by a torpedo of the German submarine are meagre, but one of the officers reports that the men were called to quarters and not one flinched; that each took his place as calmly as for an ordinary drill, but that the sinking of the vessel was so sudden that they passed into the whirling waters before protection could be assured. This was no act of warfare. It was deliberate and downright murder.

PROOF OF OUR RIGHT.

"If there were need to show that the war our country has engaged upon is a just one, deaths such as these would be a complete proof that the God of justice and mercy must be on the side of our country in this terrible conflict. American citizens want no conquered provinces or plunder, but they do demand that our flag shall be respected and that our rights shall be preserved and that no foreign tyranny shall terrorize and dictate to the world.

"These Hawaiian boys are the first from these islands to give up their lives for these principles. It may be that many of us here, before this war is over, may follow in their footsteps. It may be that this ruthless and brutal tyranny will desolate the homes and shrines of our people; but here to-day in commemoration of their death, let us resolve that they shall not have died in vain and that the people of these islands shall shrink from no sacrifice, shall hesitate at no danger which shall interfere with our devotion to our flag, our country, our principles and our God."

The Star-Bulletin's story follows:

With prayer and song, with band music and with oratory, tribute to the membory of John Davis, Ekela Kaohi, Charles Kanai, Julian Macomber, and Henry Rice, the first Hawaiians to lose their lives as a result of ruthless submarine warfare against all humanity by the German Empire and other central powers, was paid yesterday morning at the capitol grounds. There were times tears were shed freely among the 2,000 or more people in the audience. There were times when the spirit of patriotism was roused to fever heat in fervor. There were times when humanity rose up and cried out against the affronts that have been offered, but there were no times when there was manifested a spirit of vengeance or of vindictiveness. Regret that such happenings might be in this age and determination that they must cease were the ruling sentiments. The dead were eulogized as heroes who lost their lives while maintaining the right of the principle that the seas are free to all.

About a pavilion platform that was decorated with the Star-Spangled Banner and the flag of Hawaii and with mourning bands in black and white more than 2,000 gathered yesterday morning. On the platform were Gov. Pinkham, Gen. Strong, Capt. Clark, Gen. Johnson, President Chillingworth of the senate, Speaker Holstein of the house, Senator Desha, Representative Andrews, Rev. L. B. Kaumeheiwa, Rev. Akaiko Akana, Rev. H. H. Parker, Mayor Lane, and members of the families of the dead Hawaiian heroes of the Aztec. Back on the capitol balconies were consular representatives of Great Britain, Spain, China, Japan, France, and other nations of the world, and hundreds of others. To the left of the stand were students of the normal school, who furnished choral music, and to the right on a similar stand were members of the Young People's League. In front there were 3,000 chairs for the general public, and gathered about were soldiers of the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Naval Militia, and everywhere, always making themselves useful, were the Boy Scouts. Overcast skies made the day ideal for such an out-of-door morning meeting.

That the Hawaiians died in the service of their country—in upholding American right of legitimate commerce at sea—was emphasized by the presence on the platform of the heads of the military and naval service in Hawaii, and there was a solemn martial atmosphere to the gathering to remind even casual spectators that this was a memorial service in war time.

The relatives of H. J. K. Rice present were: Mr. and Mrs. William B. Rice, parents; F. S. Rice, brother; W. S. Rice, brother; Mrs. Thomas Treadway, sister; Mrs. C. K. Macfarlane, half-sister.

Relatives of Julian Macomber: Mr. and Mrs. C. G. Macomber, parents; Miss Emily Macomber, sister; C. G. Macomber and George Macomber, brothers.

Relatives of Ekela Kaohi: Mrs. Heia Kahuila, mother; J. K. Kaohi, brother; Mrs. Emmaline Saffray, Mrs. Emily Campbell, Mrs. Lizzie Mendiola, Miss Emalia Kaohi, nieces; Joseph K. Kaohi, jr., Master Benjamin Kaohi, Master William Kaohi, Master Edward Kaohi, nephews.

DESHA MAKES SPLENDID SPEECH.

Senator Stephen L. Desha made by all odds the most striking address of the day, in the opinion of those of the audience who understand both English and Hawaiian. Long famous as "Hawaii's silver-tongued orator" in the native tongue, his address yesterday was rich with the eloquence, the sympathy, and the fire which are characteristic of his public utterances.

He pointed out that the Hawaiians lost with the Aztec went calmly into the face of danger, knowing their steamer might be sunk by a German submarine, and that they have died as Americans should die in warfare—bravely and unflinchingly. As he dwelt with sympathy on the loss of the families of these young men many Hawaiians were moved to open emotion. He paid a striking tribute to the flag, and declared that the highest form of patriotism is the doing of duty fearlessly and intelligently.

MUSIC AND ORATORY MINGLE.

Following the playing of "Old Hundred" and the dirge from "Saul" by the Hawaiian band, President Chillingworth of the senate told of the occasion that had led to the gathering and the holding of the memorial services. He paid brief but glowing tribute to the memory of the martyrs of the Aztec.

The rendering of "Hail Columbia," "Hawaii Ponoi," and the "Star-Spangled Banner" by the normal-school students was especially beautiful, impressive, and appropriate.

NOBLE SENTIMENTS ROUSE PATRIOTISM.

Full of the spirit of patriotism, insistence on the rights of humanity, condemnation of a conduct that is murder and not war, touched with delicate and tender sentiment for those whose lives went out in the maelstrom of sea into which they were thrown by the sinking of the Aztec when she had been torpedoed, was the oration of the day delivered by Representative Lorrin Andrews.

Andrews first dwelt on the beauty of the American flag, the meaning of their flags to other nations, the great beauty, the nobility of the sentiments the Star-Spangled Banner holds for the native-born or adopted citizen of the United States, how it embraces the best of all sentiments that other banners may represent to other nations. With such a flag, standing for and representing such principles and ideals in the face of murder masquerading as war, fighting innocent women and children and noncombatants, attacking all humanity, there was nothing to do but rise and fight until tyranny should be banished from the world, he declared. Americans must fight for their flag, their land, their liberty, their wives, their families, and for their God was his closing peroration.

EULOGY IS ORATORICAL MARVEL.

The oration of Senator Desha was more in line of a eulogy of the five drowned Hawaiian heroes of the Aztec. It also was full of patriotic thought and sentiment. The modulation of his voice, his gestures, his expression, the vibration of his words, gave to those of his audience who did not understand the Hawaiian tongue at least some idea of what Senator Desha was saying. Later he told something of each of the drowned Hawaiians, and, turning to members of the families of the dead men, he had words of sympathy and condolence for them. Senator Desha's speech was a marvel of eloquence and of oratory. It thrilled his hearers who understood Hawaiian and made those who did not wish for a knowledge of tongues.

The singing of the "Star-Spangled Banner" was a fitting finale to the meeting, which dispersed after the benediction pronounced by Rev. H. H. Parker.

William Wond, another Hawaiian boy, has lost his life for the principle of universal freedom of the high seas. He died a victim of the submarine when the steamship Rockingham was ruthlessly torpedoed. His name should be added to the roll of honor that Hawaii has set up for the five brave lads of the Aztec.

Mr. Speaker, two thousand and odd miles out in the Pacific are the islands that constitute the Territory of Hawaii. Our fame for a beautiful, wonderful country is world wide. But Hawaii is more than a playground, a retreat for the tourist. It is the western frontier of our Republic. We Hawaiians guard the western doorway. While Hawaii stands our coast line from Alaska down the long stretch to the Panama Canal Zone is safe from successful invasion or attack.

Mr. Speaker, in this time of preparedness, while the Nation is spending billions for the successful prosecution of its war, when we are training our soldiers, enlarging our Navy, and making preparations for our coast-line defense, I deem it my duty to invite your most serious consideration to the question of the defenses of the Hawaiian Islands. I have said that while Hawaii stands our Pacific mainland coast is safe from invasion, but much must be done by both the Army and Navy to bring the fortifications and military establishments and the naval base on the Island of Oahu up to that perfection of efficiency that a genuine preparedness program should demand. While much has been done, taken as a whole, the fortification of Oahu is yet in its infancy. We need military roads, more forts, the biggest guns, a submarine base, a fuel-oil station, more barracks, an aeroplane fleet, a fleet of up-to-date warships with its destroyers and submarines with permanent station in Hawaiian waters repair shops, and gun shops. Such a preparedness program is an investment for the entire Nation.

Geographically and strategically Hawaii is of untold value to this union of States; but, Mr. Speaker, it is ever so much more valuable than nature has made it, for every Hawaiian stands willing and ready to do his utmost and face death itself for American liberty. There are many more Hawaiian boys who will go unflinchingly to their end while doing their duty, as the six whose story I have already brought to your attention.

In numbers we Hawaiians are few. But since the declaration of war the Hawaiian people have entered in the spirit of the times with such whole-souledness and unselfishness that their action has brought a distinctive letter of praise from Gen. William A. Mann, of the General Staff of the Army, who as head of the Bureau of Militia Affairs has first-hand control of our endeavors on a war basis. It is proper that this letter should go into the RECORD, and I shall read it at this time:

WAR DEPARTMENT, MILITIA BUREAU,
Washington, May 26, 1917.

Hon. J. K. KALANIANAOLE,
House of Representatves.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your esteemed letter of May 19, 1917, in which you request information relating to the National Guard of Hawaii and to the disposition to be made of it during the existing war.

I am of the opinion that in view of the necessity for not interfering with the labor problem within the Territory the National Guard contingent should not be utilized or called into Federal service unless some unforeseen emergency arises.

The loyalty of the Hawaiians has been marked in their response to the plans of the adjutant general of the Territory to increase their National Guard contingent to a total of four regiments of infantry, four companies of coast artillery, one company of engineers, one troop of cavalry, and one company of signal corps.

If these organizations were raised to full war strength, the Territory would maintain probably a larger quota of National Guard to its total population than any other State or Territory in the United States.

I feel, however, that the patriotic desires of the National Guard authorities have exceeded the possibilities of the Territory as far as furnishing the desired number of men, and it would be better if the number of National Guard units were reduced.

The commanding general, Hawaiian Department, has recommended a reduction of the National Guard forces of Hawaii to a total of two regiments of infantry, one troop of cavalry, one company of engineers, one company signal corps, and two companies of coast artillery. I am of the opinion that the suggested reduction will provide ample forces and best meet the interests of all concerned.

Very truly, yours,

WM. A. MANN,
Brigadier General, General Staff, Chief Militia Bureau.

Perhaps it will be well to interpret this letter of Gen. Mann's. To begin with, there are approximately 125,000 persons, after exempting Asiatics, who are citizens of the Territory, and this number includes men, women, and children. The people of the Territory, with their increasing militia program, intended to bring 10,000 militiamen into the service of their country. It is the final judgment of the War Department, however, that the interests of the Nation will be served best by the turning of the activities of the greater number of these Hawaiian men into food production.

To interfere the slightest with the food production of the islands at this time would invite disaster to many on the mainland, as well as to the citizens on the islands and the force of 10,000 regulars of the United States Army who garrison the island of Oahu and the great naval base at Pearl Harbor. The War Department has cut down the National Guard to approximately 3,000 men. When they are to be called into service is for the Federal Government to say. And when the summons to arms comes, Mr. Speaker, the men of Hawaii will not be found wanting.

The question of food is the vital question in the islands to-day. Hawaii, with its sugar, rice, and so forth, feeds many on the mainland. But Hawaii has been importing many articles of necessity in the food line. To meet the changed conditions Hawaii has now a food commission, created by its legislature, and this food commission is striving to make Hawaii's civilian and military population independent of the mainland producers. Under the direction of the food commission the movement to till the soil is widespread. The Hawaiian school children have even startled their elders by the wonderful progress they have made in successful gardening. Into this movement the Hawaiians have entered without reservation, for in all things at all times the people of Hawaii can be depended upon to do "their bit."

To help their fellow citizens on the mainland in these troublesome times is the main object of all Hawaiians. Mr. Speaker, they will fight and they will plow until victory comes to our country and peace to the world. And while they plow and while they fight each and every Hawaiian will have always in his mind Hawaii's motto, "Ua mau ke ea o ka aina i ka pono," which, translated, reads: "The life of the land is established in righteousness."

The Food Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. C. BASCOM SLEMP,
OF VIRGINIA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is what is known as the second "food bill." The first of these measures authorizes a survey of the food supply and the ascertainment of the food possibilities of the Nation.

A large sum of money, all that was requested by the Secretary of Agriculture, will be appropriated for this purpose. I voted for this food measure. The bill now before the House, the second bill, is the food-control bill, so called. Vast and hitherto unknown powers are to be given to the President of the United States and through him to the food controller. I shall support the bill, and in doing so I wish to define my attitude toward all legislation affecting the conduct of the war.

I voted for the declaration of war, and I favor the adoption of every measure that will make for efficiency in the conduct of the war. To me this war can not be conducted successfully without a concentration of authority. Congress can not conduct the war. It will not even be in session more than half the time. Congress can not select the leaders; can not appoint the officers of the Army. Its power and its duties are practically limited to providing the machinery by which the Executive can efficiently manage the many details of the great war. I wish to give the President such powers as he requires. I will not vote for any measure that will handicap him in the least. I think Congress should select a committee of its Members to be associated with Executive management in order to bring about the best possible cooperation between these two branches of the Government—one to provide the machinery; the other to execute.

But apart from this I believe authority should be concentrated, and the President only recently selected by the people is the one man to have it. Whether he will exercise to the best advantage the great powers given him I do not know, and no one else knows. We can hope he will be wise in the selection of his subordinates, and we can hope that in these selections merit alone will obtain. He has a great opportunity to bring to the active aid of the country men of all shades of political opinion, as is being done in England, and not confine patriotic activities to partisan adherents.

Personally, I am glad he has selected Mr. Hoover as food controller. Mr. Hoover is undoubtedly the best-informed man on this subject on the American Continent to-day, and I for one feel safe in risking this important matter with him. The particular details of this food measure I think are right. I believe the farmers ought to be guaranteed a minimum price for their products. If the war should be suddenly brought to a close, after farmers in their efforts to do patriotic service had gone to great expense in producing larger crops than usual, the loss consequent upon a fall in price ought to be borne by the Government and not by the farmer. This bill does not operate until after the food—wheat, corn, and so forth, as the case may be—has left the producers' hands.

The bill strikes at the fellow who hoards food supplies for the purpose of speculation, and this sort of fellow ought to be struck at. I think prices of foodstuffs are getting too high and these high prices are going into the pockets of food speculators and gamblers, with very little benefit to the farmers.

It ought to be stopped and the only way to stop it is through governmental regulation and through the selection of good, strong, unselfish men to administer the law. The people, of course, will hold these officials to strict accountability in their conduct and will expect honest treatment with an absence of favoritism and partisanship.

I hope the administration will be successful in its conduct of the war. I think the war is a holy one; I think the war will have to be fought out sooner or later by us. If I made any comment on the war, I would say that I do not believe our troops should be sent to Europe hastily. I believe we should await the reorganization of Russia, Greece, and Roumania, and with the full coordination and cooperation of all our allies on all our fronts, an end to this frightful calamity can be brought about in the year 1918.

This is an unusual bill, but it is designed to meet unusual conditions. It is drastic, but this is a time for drastic measures. We are in war, and it becomes necessary to confer war powers. Such measures as these food bills and other legislation conferring broad powers upon the President are the contribution of Congress toward successful prosecution of the war. We never before have been confronted with a like situation; we are sailing on an uncharted sea. We can not be too careful, nor can we be too particular. Because we face new questions is no reason why we should shrink from doing new things. We must now do things that we would not dream of doing in peace times. If in the doing we make some mistakes, it is better to err on the side of precaution and preparedness rather than not to have tried at all, and we can correct mistakes in the light of experience. In this spirit this war legislation is and ought to be conceived and enacted. When peace returns with victory we can again pursue peaceful methods and restore our equilibrium and the checks and balances of the Constitution, essential in a republic for the conduct of its domestic affairs when the world is tranquil.

Food Supply of the World.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY Z. OSBORNE,
OF CALIFORNIA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 22, 1917.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, under the general permission to Members to extend remarks in the RECORD on the conservation of food and fuel bill (H. R. 4961), I present the following telegram from the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, unanimously favoring the passage of the pending bill:

LOS ANGELES, CAL., June 21, 1917.

H. Z. OSBORNE, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

In consequence of the enormous increase in cost of food supplies and inability to control prices, either through moral suasion or local legislation, the board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce unanimously favor the passage of the food-control bill now before Congress, and respectfully ask that you use your good offices to that end.

L. D. SALE,
President Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce.

FOOD SUPPLY OF THE WORLD.

Mr. Speaker, on the 20th instant I addressed a letter to Mr. Herbert Hoover requesting information as to the present food supply of the world. Mr. Hoover responded as follows:

WASHINGTON, June 21, 1917.

Hon. H. Z. OSBORNE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. OSBORNE: In response to your letter of the 20th I am arranging to have Dr. Alonzo E. Taylor bring to you personally in printed form the information which you desire in regard to the food conditions of the world at the present time. Dr. Taylor is probably better informed on this matter than any person in this country, and I am sure can give you any specific information you may want. Dr. Taylor will bring this material to you some time before noon to-day.

Faithfully, yours,

HERBERT HOOVER.

Later the same day Dr. Taylor handed me the following reply, making a clear and succinct statement on the food conditions of the various countries of the world. It will be found most interesting and suggestive to Members of the House in connection with the consideration of this most important bill:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., June 21, 1917.

Hon. H. Z. OSBORNE,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. OSBORNE: In the absence of Mr. Hoover, I am requested to prepare a brief statement illustrating the conditions in staples in the food supply of the world. It must be clearly borne in mind that the world represents a definition in transportation rather than in geography. At present Autralasia, India, and the interior of Russia are outside of the world.

There is supposed to be somewhere in the neighborhood of 150,000,000 bushels of wheat in Australasia. It is practically unavailable to us or to Europeans on account of scarcity of tonnage. India is supposed to have a surplus of some 60,000,000 bushels of wheat. Since shipping from India has to come via the East Indies to our western coast or go around South Africa to France, this is practically out of the world. Russia was a large grain-producing country. No one knows whether there is a large amount of stored grain in the interior of Russia or whether there is none. Unofficial information, through diplomatic channels, leads to the tentative conclusion that the stores that have accumulated and should be available have probably been dissipated and in large part undergone decomposition. Russia possesses no facilities for permanent storage of large amounts of grain. The Russian revolution was preceded by food riots due to the inability to transport food from the interior to the large cities. There was certainly not such scarcity of food in Russia as to lead to food riots, per se, and the scarcity was a matter of transportation. On the other hand, there is no evidence that were peace to be established to-day large amounts of grain would be found sound and available in the interior of Russia.

The wheat crop of practically all South America has been a relative failure and there will be no possibility of securing any material amount of either wheat or corn from Argentina this year. Argentina, Australasia, India, Algeria, and interior Russia always furnished grain to the United Kingdom, France, and Italy. This year they can furnish none.

We had a bumper wheat crop in 1915 and a small crop (640,000,000 bushels) last year. The drain for large exports has reduced our excess so that at present, according to the best available information, there are about 100,000,000 to 110,000,000 bushels of wheat carry-over in the United States and Canada. The winter wheat is the lowest in many years. The forecast for total wheat in this country on June 1, was 656,000,000 bushels. Unofficial, but supposedly well informed opinion in Canada places their wheat forecast at 250,000,000 bushels safely, up to as high as 300,000,000 in the event of continuation of favorable conditions. In other words, a reasonable forecast of the wheat crop for this year in North America in the absence of untoward climatic conditions, plus our present carry over, ought to yield somewhere in the neighborhood of 1,000,000,000 bushels of wheat. Allowing for seed and a carry over of 50,000,000 bushels, with our normal consumption, this would leave for export not to exceed 250,000,000 bushels of wheat.

The crop forecasts in oats, barley, and rye of June 1 indicate a yield in these three of about 170,000,000 bushels in excess of the relatively low crops of last year. On the basis of acreage the yield in corn and rice will be large. We are relatively short on corn all through the country. The stocks of rye and barley are fairly depleted. We have still a reasonable plenty of oats.

The winter wheat crop in France and England, just as in Germany, was badly injured by cold weather late in the spring. There has been an increased acreage in the United Kingdom, but no such increase in France and Italy. In France and Italy both, the grain crop has suffered from inefficient labor, inefficient fertilization, and untoward climatic conditions. A careful summarization of the grain needs of the United Kingdom, France, and Italy for the next year indicates that they will need to import about 550,000,000 bushels of wheat or other supplementary cereals and about 450,000,000 bushels of feed grains. These figures are on the basis of war-time needs. It will be impossible to secure all these and in all probability the figure could be shaved in toto 100,000,000 bushels without danger of serious results.

Since, as previously explained, the other available sources of grain are closed, all of the grain that is to be secured by our allies must come from North America.

In brief, they will need twice as much wheat as we will have to export. Oats, rye, barley, and rice can be used as direct substitutes; oats and corn as indirect substitutes. We will apparently have no difficulty in supplying the corn and oats required as feed grains if the forecasts be not nullified by untoward climatic conditions. It will be necessary in covering the bread needs of our allies for them to accept as much wheat as we can send and for the balance, rice, rye, barley, corn, and oats. It will be necessary for us in part to hold our wheat consumption to a lower level than our present luxurious level, and to consume cereal substitutes in excess of our past practices. Thirty million people in the South already consume nearly half of their cereals in other form than wheat. If the people of the North would follow this practice during the next year to the extent of consuming one-third of their cereals in other states than wheat, this would set free a sufficient amount of wheat to cover the minimum needs of our allies in a satisfactory nutritional manner.

It is difficult to give definite figures as to other staples. The meat supply of the world is low. The beef and pork production of England, France, and Italy is low. The beef production of Argentina will be low. The beef and pork production of this country can probably not be enlarged during the present year, though it ought to be maintained. It is therefore necessary in order that our allies be permitted to enjoy a normal meat ration that excessive use of meat and waste in meat should be eliminated in our country.

The world is short in fats. Less vegetable fat is produced in Italy and France than normally. Our allies used to import large amounts of vegetable fats from distant Tropics. Conditions in tonnage have made this importation restricted in amount. We are importing less vegetable fats than normally from the Tropics. Even though our fat production be held to normal, since the vegetable-fat production of Italy and France is below normal and fat importation from the Tropics is below normal, it becomes apparent that we face a fat stringency, and this is all the more inevitable when we consider the enormous use of glycerin in the manufacture of munitions. In other words, the industrial use of fat is increased at a time when our supply has been diminished.

The world is short on sugar. Russia, a large sugar producer, is out of the calculation. England imported in peace time large amounts of sugar from Russia, Germany, and Austria, some from Belgium and Holland. Holland produces a little beet sugar now. Belgium practically none. The French production is reduced. The cane sugar of Java finds difficulty in reaching a market. Even with a normal sugar production in Cuba, along the Gulf, over our beet-sugar region, from the Sandwich Islands, and from the Philippines, we could not expect to meet the normal sugar demands of the United Kingdom, France, Italy, and North America. It is believed that through adequate organization our sugar affairs may be so administered as to permit of an adequate and reasonable use of sugar by everyone, but it is perfectly plain that if such organization is not obtained sugar will become a medicine ball of speculation.

These various contemplations indicate the available food supply of the allied nations is probably reduced to something like 75 per cent of the normal. The unit between use and waste of foods is probably in the neighborhood of 25 to 30 per cent. In other words, we are reduced close to the level of actual need. Under such circumstances we will have enough if it is properly conserved and administered. It will not be enough if through lack of organization, such as is proposed in the second Lever bill, the limited supplies of food are left open for hoarding, speculation, and extortion.

On the other hand, it is fairly clear that the available food supply of the central empires is reduced to about 65 or 70 per cent. They, too, are reduced to the point of actual need. They had made many mistakes in the administration of their food affairs, but these mistakes have been during the past six months in large part repaired, and the organization of food administration in Germany is to-day upon an efficient and effective plane. If they manage with their 65 or 70 per cent better than we manage with our 75 per cent, we will lose If we manage as well as they, this will be an immense factor in our fate. It must be clearly and definitely borne in mind that properly analyzed the food situation in the United Kingdom, France, Italy, and North America, considered as a unit, will on the 1st of October be in no better state than the food supply of the central empires. From that time on it is a question of efficiency in organization and administration of our food supply, using this term in its broadest sense.

Very truly, yours,

A. E. TAYLOR,
Assistant to the Secretary.

Georgia's Property Progress, 1865–1915.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON LEE,

OF GEORGIA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend my remarks for the purpose of inserting in the RECORD an address of the Hon. Martin V. Calvin, of Marietta, Ga., former secretary, now president of the Georgia State Agricultural Society. Mr. Calvin is one of the best thinkers and statisticians in the South. This address was delivered at Athens, Ga., August 2, 1916.

The address is as follows:

GEORGIA'S PROPERTY PROGRESS, 1865–1915.

Secretary Calvin said he would like to speak to Chancellor Barrow's splendid address if no one else wished to occupy the floor.

Mr. Calvin remarked that as soon as he saw the subject on which Chancellor Barrow proposed to address the convention to-day, he determined to collate a few unquestionable facts illustrative of the manner in which, and the extent to which, Georgia had been builded up in a material way between the years 1865 and 1915; more particularly during the 42 years immediately following the end of the War between the States.

Mr. Calvin spoke by charts which he had prepared, explaining in detail the intensely interesting and valuable figures and facts set forth on each of the three charts he used. Here is the statement of unchallengeable facts:

An array of interesting facts.

SOME COMMENTS.

It was not till 1889—a lapse of 24 years—that Georgia's total property equaled the property on the digest (exclusive of the value of the slaves), in 1860 with a small amount in excess.

Statement.

1889—Total property on the digest and railroad property	$380,189,314
1860—Property on the digest exclusive of value of the slaves	370,038,046

It was not until 1890 that the property on the digest, exclusive of railroad property, equaled the same class of property in 1860.

1860—Property on the digest (not value slaves)	370,038,046

A CONTINUOUS STRUGGLE FOR THE MASTERY.

Three times in a period of 34 years after the Civil War Georgians builded property values on the digest till they equaled approximately the values on the digest of 1860:

This was accomplished first up to 1890, then 1895, then 1899. At high tide of each of the periods, a panic produced a notable shrinkage in values, whereupon

GEORGIANS AGAIN PUT THEIR SHOULDERS TO THE WHEELS.

It was not until 1907, a period of 47 years, that Georgia's total property equaled the grand total of 1860.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. FRANK JAMES,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that no "constitutional lawyer" has been able to show any good argument—legal or otherwise—why this very important "food-control" bill should not become a law. Had time permitted, I intended to show that President Lincoln had "constitutional" objectors to many bills that he desired to pass in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

I sometimes think that when some people can not find any good reason for opposing a bill on its merits, then they try and find some "legal" or "constitutional" objection. Have seen many a bill attacked on constitutional grounds when the "constitutional lawyer" disliked to take a chance of committing political suicide by attacking the bill on its merits.

Very seldom does a constitutional lawyer hold up the Constitution before us unless he wants to oppose a bill which the people want and ought to have. The Constitution is often used against the people but seldom for them.

The fathers of the Constitution were patriots and they certainly never intended that it should be used against the preservation of their country or that it could be so twisted as to give any encouragement whatever to the enemy. Still the Constitution was used against Lincoln in sixty-one when he wished to preserve the Union, and was used daily by men who were afterwards expelled from Congress for disloyalty or treason. The Constitution has been used time after time since against the interests of those who need protection.

I hope that I shall never become such an expert on "constitutional law" that I shall ever be so able to interpret the Constitution as to forbid it to do anything necessary to preserve it.

I hope that I shall never become such a constitutional expert that I shall be able to interpret it that the Constitution was intended to give the benefit of every doubt in favor of the enemy and against my own country.

I hope that when it comes to giving the benefit of the doubt to the man who is going to be robbed and the robber that I will not become such an expert on constitutional law, that I will give the benefit of the doubt of any law to the robber instead of the man who needs protection.

I presume everyone here remembers the fate of a former Member of this House, one Vallandigham, of Ohio. He was arrested by the Union military authorities in 1863 for treasonable utterances and banished to the Confederate States; went from Wilmington to Bermuda and thence to Canada, where he remained until after the war. He was strong on the "Constitution"—so strong was he that he could always interpret the provisions of the Constitution in such a way that his country got the worst of it. If one interpreted the Constitution according to his views, this country had no right to do anything except sit calmly by and allow the Union to be disrupted.

Talking about violating the Constitution, why this man Vallandigham had the martyred President violating the Constitution every half hour.

We think Lincoln a great man now, but he was not great to some of the men who sat in the special session of the Thirty-seventh Congress in 1861. Men there, under the guise of violation of the Constitution, tried to hamper the President at every step; but there were men—real men—in that Congress who saw through the wiles of the men who tried to use the Constitution as a shield to cover up their hatred of their country.

On July 10, 1861, the same Vallandigham stated, in part:

Holding up the Constitution, and standing here in the place and with the manhood of a Representative of the people, I propose to myself today the ancient freedom of speech used within these walls.

Then he proceeds to criticize the message from President Lincoln, using in part these words:

It was his duty as an honest Executive to make that information full, impartial, and complete, instead of spreading before us a labored and lawyerly vindication of his own course of policy, a policy which has precipitated us into a terrible and bloody revolution.

Then a little later he states:

Why did he not forthwith assemble Congress and throw himself upon the wisdom and patriotism of the Representatives of the States and of the people instead of usurping powers which the Constitution has expressly conferred upon us?

A little later in the same address he states:

Abraham Lincoln took the oath of office to support the Constitution, and delivered his inaugural—a message, I regret to say, not written in the direct and forward language which becomes an American President and an American statesman, and which was expected from the plain, blunt, honest man of the Northwest, but with the forked tongue and crooked counsel of the New York politician.

After condemning for calling out the militia, he uses the words to describe the great Lincoln:

It may be, indeed, that with wicked and desperate cunning the President meant all this as a mere wedge to that which was to drive the oak asunder.

Later this brave defender of the Constitution says—this was in regard to President Lincoln calling out the militia:

But whatever may have been the purpose, I assert here to-day as a Representative that every principal act of the administration since has been a glaring usurpation of power and a palpable and dangerous violation of that very Constitution which this civil war is professedly waged to support.

Who remembers Vallandigham now with anything but scorn, and who does not think Lincoln one of the greatest men who ever lived? As was said then, "The Union must and shall be preserved," so some of us, who are using the Constitution daily for and not against this country, say, "The United States must and shall be preserved." It was never intended by the fathers of the Constitution that when anything came up between your country and the enemy that the doubt was always to be decided in favor of the enemy against your own country. They had men in those days who thought of country first and technicality afterwards, and, thank God, the majority of this Congress are built along the same lines.

Later, in criticizing the President for calling for men, this defender of the Constitution states:

Without once saying to Congress, "By your leave, gentlemen." Beginning with this wide breach of the Constitution, this enormous usurpation of the most dangerous of all powers—the power of the sword—other infractions and assumptions were easy, and after public liberty private right soon fell.

One step more, sir, will bring upon us search and seizure of the public mails, and, finally, as in the worst days of the Russels and Sydneys of English martyrdom, of the drawers and secretaries of the private citizen, though even then tyrants had the grace to look to the forms of the law, and the execution was judicial murder, not military slaughter.

Sir, the rights of property having been thus wantonly violated, it needed but a little stretch to invade the sanctity of the person, and a victim was not soon wanting.

Sir, however necessity—the tyrant's plea—may be urged in extenuation of the usurpations and infractions by the President in regard to public liberty, there can be no such apology or defense for his invasions of private right.

Sir, the power and rights of the States and the people and their representatives have been usurped; the sanctity of the private house and of private property has been invaded, and the liberty of the person wantonly and wickedly stricken down; free speech, too, has been repeatedly denied, and all this under the plea of necessity. Sir, the right of petition will follow next—nay, it has already been shaken. The freedom of the press will soon fall after it.

There are some politicians who before election will do anything to cater to the newspaper men and after election is over think it smart politics to denounce everything that a newspaper advocates, until a few months before the next election, and then show the previous servility. They had the same class in those days, because the Vallandigham goes on to state: "And let me whisper in your ear that there will be few to mourn over its loss, unless, indeed, its ancient, high, and honorable character shall be rescued and redeemed from its present reckless mendacity and degradation." As some people now seem to blame the newspapers for the war, including the Lusitania and the sinking of other boats seemingly, so then the people of the stripe of Vallandigham evidently blamed the newspapers for the war.

Then the great defender of the Constitution continues:

Freedom of religion will yield, too, at last, amid the exultant shouts of millions who have seen its holy temples defiled and its white robes of a former innocency trampled now under the polluting hoofs of an ambitious and faithless or fanatical clergy. Meantime national banks, bankrupt laws, a vast and permanent public debt, high tariffs, heavy direct taxation, enormous expenditure, gigantic and stupendous peculation, anarchy first and a strong Government afterwards, no more State lines, no more State governments, and a consolidated monarchy or vast centralized military despotism, must all follow in the history of the future, as in the history of the past they have, centuries ago, been written. Sir, I have said nothing, and have time to say nothing now, of the immense indebtedness and the vast expenditures which have already accrued, nor of the folly and mismanagement of the war so far, nor of the atrocious and shameless peculations and frauds which have disgraced it in the State governments and the Federal Government from the beginning. The avenging hour for all these will come hereafter, and I pass them by now.

I have finished now, Mr. Chairman, what I proposed to say at this time upon the message of the President. As to my own position in regard to this most unhappy Civil War, I have only to say that I stand to-day just where I stood upon the 4th of March last; where the whole Democratic Party and the whole Constitutional Union Party and a vast majority, as I believe, of the people of the United States stood, too. I am for peace—speedy, immediate, honorable peace—with all its blessings. Others may have changed; I have not. I question not their motives nor quarrel with their course. It is vain and futile for them to question or to quarrel with mine. My duty shall be discharged—calmly, firmly, quietly, and regardless of consequences. The approving voice of a conscience void of offense and the approving judgment which shall follow "after some time be past," these, God help me, are my trust and my support.

Another man who used the "Constitution" to cloak his opposition to every measure that would help his country win the war was Senator Trusten Polk, of Missouri, who was expelled from the Senate on January 10, 1862, for "disloyalty."

Under date of July 10, 1861, in criticizing President Lincoln, we find him using these words:

Congress has declared no war. The Constitution of the United States says that Congress shall be authorized to declare war, and yet, sir, though Congress has declared no war, we are in the midst of a war monstrous in its character and hugely monstrous in its proportions. The war has been brought on by the President of the United States, of his own motion and of his own wrong, and under what circumstances?

A little further he states:

I know, sir, that this conduct is justified on the score of necessity. This plea of necessity is the tyrant's plea the world over, and has been in all ages the tyrant's plea for the prostration of civil liberty, and will continue to be so.

A little further, in talking about the Merryman case, he states:

Sir, I undertake to say that in the history of England, in the time of the Tudors and the Plantagenets, a case more flagrant than this can not be found; and this is not a single case.

Then he states a little further:

The sanctity of the home has been violated by the force of the bayonet.

The President of the United States has involved this country in a war, notwithstanding the provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution says that Congress shall have the power to "raise and support armies." The President of the United States has raised armies. The Constitution says that Congress shall have the power "to provide and maintain a navy." The President of the United States has attempted to provide a navy. It also says that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it," and that not even by the Congress of the United States. Yet the President has suspended the writ of habeas corpus.

Then he names a few more violations of the Constitution by the President; in fact, as I have stated, according to the views of some of these men who cloaked their hatred to the country under the guise of the defense of the Constitution, President Lincoln was accused every half hour or so of violating the Constitutiton.

A little further Senator Polk states:

More than that, while these acts have increased the power of the President on the one hand, they have taken away powers that belonged and were appropriated by the Constitution to the legislative and to the judicial departments of the Government, so that there has been a usurpation of powers that belonged to the legislative and executive branches of the Government.

Another man who used defense of the Constitution to conceal his treason was Congressman Henry C. Burnett, of Kentucky, who was expelled from Congress on December 3, 1861. When asked by Congressman McClernand after he had attacked the increase of the Army, the question, "Will you vote for a volunteer force to put down this rebellion?" he replied, "Not for one man." Still no more wordy defender of the Constitution served in the Thirty-seventh Congress. Strong on the Constitution, was the gentleman from Kentucky, but weak on love of country.

Still another man strong on the Constitution but weak on loyalty was Senator J. C. Breckinridge, also expelled from the Thirty-seventh Congress, December 4, 1861.

He said in part on July 16, 1861:

I think the Chief Magistrate of the country—and I have a right in my place to say it—should be rebuked by the vote of both Houses of Congress.

Then follows column after column of his belief in violations of the Constitution.

Under date of July 16, 1861, Congressman Henry C. Burnett, of Kentucky, said in part:

I enter here my solemn protest against his flagrant and repeated violations of the oath he took on the 4th of March last; against his dangerous usurpations of power and open defiance of the law.

This defense of the Constitution sounds good from a man afterwards expelled for disloyalty to his country.

Senator Breckinridge in another speech on July 25, 1861, says in part:

The conduct of the war up to this time has not been characterized by any purpose to maintain the supremacy of the Constitution: on the contrary, it has been deliberately trampled under feet in every step of the procedure. I have undertaken to show, and other gentlemen have undertaken to show, that the Constitution has been deliberately, frequently, and flagrantly violated. While they stand unanswered, I maintain that the war, in its inception and its progress, is not to maintain the Constitution, but is in derogation of that instrument. It is not enough to tell me that it has been violated in the first instance by others. The adhering States of this Union have the right to demand that the Constitution shall be the measure of Federal action; and the violation of the Constitution (conceding the point) by any number of individuals, or any number of States, does not justify the Federal Government, in opposition to the rights of loyal and adhering States, in violating that instrument.

I believe the prosecution of this war for 12 months, if waged successfully, will be the grave of constitutional liberty upon this continent.

Peace, sir, peace is what we want for the restoration of the Federal Union, and the preservation of constitutional liberty.

If anyone wants to interpret the Constitution, so that we can not do this thing and the other thing which becomes absolutely necessary to save the country from destruction, they are welcome to their ideas. Personally, I prefer the sentiments of Senator Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, who uttered these words in reply to the constitutional lawyers of that time:

What are we going to do to the President? "Impeach him," I think, said the gentleman from Delaware. I say again, if the President had been charged by the Constitution, and by the laws upon your statute books, to do these things, and he had done them, I should have said he had done well; that he had been good and faithful. But, sir, if it be true that he stepped clear outside of the jurisdiction which the Constitution imposed upon him, if he threw himself clear outside of the battlements of the Constitution, and at the greatest personal risk to himself did battle for its preservation, and saved whatever was sacred and valuable inside the walls, I say it was not merely the work of a faithful magistrate; it was the work of a hero. Give him not mere approval; give him thanks. If there is any gratitude in the Republic, let it be spoken here now. Sir, I do not know how it is with other Senators upon this floor, but I confess myself to be astounded at those Senators here who profess such unbounded veneration for your statutes as simply the expression of the will of the people that they will stand by the statute, while the very power which enacted them is being thrown down and trampled in the dust. That seems to me an excess of veneration for the legislative power. I desire that all our magistrates and all our men shall observe the Constitution, and shall observe the laws; but I do not ask any one of them to bind himself so closely and indissolubly to the forms of the one or the other that he must perish with them both. Never any one of them designed to so fetter the whole that they could put forth no single exertion which was necessary to save the whole. When the country is at peace, I hold the President, as the highest citizen in it, as well as the First Magistrate, to the duty of exhibiting the highest evidence of attachment and conformity to the laws; but when the disregard of a form or a precedent is demanded, in order to save the essence and the soul of the whole, the form must give way to the substance.

This was good, sound doctrine in '61, and it is good, sound doctrine now.

Conservation of Food.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WHITMELL P. MARTIN,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. MARTIN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, this bill has caused me no little concern, and while I shall cast my vote in favor of the measure, I do so because the administration and the leaders of both branches of Congress, who have made a thorough investigation of food conditions in the country, insist that just at this time it is a military necessity.

We are informed that it is just as much a military expedient as raising the Army or building up our Navy. That it is just as important to feed our allies as it is to assist them by supplying soldiers, arms, and ammunition. God forbid that I should cast a vote in this or any other Congress that would in the slightest degree cripple the country in the prosecution of this war, upon the successful termination of which depends the freedom not only of this country but of the world.

But the establishment of a food administrator in a free country is almost staggering and can only be excused as a measure of stern necessity.

The power and authority given in this bill relative to the production, the conserving, the control, and distribution of food products is almost unlimited, and unless those in authority carry out the provisions both wisely and conservatively, there is grave danger that the very purpose of the bill may be defeated.

The danger lies in the administration of this law, and for this reason I have sought to secure as much information as possible from those best informed and who will assist in enforcing its provisions. From this source I am informed that it is the purpose to stimulate production and that the minimum price will only be used to encourage the farmer to increase production by guaranteeing him a fair and adequate profit on his produce. I have been assured that there is no danger of the minimum price being made the maximum price, and that the farmers and producers will not be molested, except to stimulate and arouse them to increased activity.

By this means it is hoped this production of food products will be so stimulated as to effectively reduce the high cost of living.

Those provisions in the bill looking to the elimination of all unnecessary charges between the producer and the consumer, and which propose to prevent monopoly and the hoarding of food products and to punish those who engage in this nefarious practice, meet with my most hearty approval. This is no time for speculation or to grow rich upon the wants, the suffering, and the hunger of human beings, and those who in this perilous hour engage in this practice should be made to feel the strong arm of the law.

But if this country and our allies are to be supplied with the necessities of life, it must be done by the farmer, and if he is not interfered with and is but let alone he will respond patriotically to his country's call and produce food in abundance.

This House has been assured by those in charge of this bill and by those who will be in charge of its administration, that no injustice will be done the farmer. The President, who is the Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy, has by letter stated that this bill is necessary as a war measure. Relying upon these assurances and believing it to be my duty to support a measure which the administration states is an absolute necessity as a war measure, I shall cast my vote for this bill.

The Lever Food Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY I. EMERSON,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the Haserot Co., of Cleveland, Ohio. It contains some very good suggestions:

CLEVELAND, June 21, 1917.

Hon. HENRY EMERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We note that, in accordance with section 5 of the second revision of the Lever food bill, it is proposed to license certain type of firms engaged in the distribution of food products, but that "retailers" are exempt from this provision. It has become increasingly difficult for us to draw the line between the "wholesaler" and the "retailer."

Unless all who engage in the distribution of food products come under the same provisions, or unless a definition is incorporated in the law which will indicate the type of merchant who is not subject to its provisions by a definition more specific than is conveyed in the word "retailer," then the operation of the law will be unsatisfactory and lead to many misunderstandings.

We therefore beg that you will exercise your good offices to the end that it may be made definite and certain and define the dealers who shall be exempt. We suggest that the line be drawn either at the gross amount of annual sales or at the gross amount of capital invested and used, whether borrowed or owned in the business.

We thank you in advance for the courtesies of your attention, and subscribe ourselves,

Yours, truly,

THE HASEROT CO.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD E. ROBBINS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 22, 1917.

On the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the committee, section 11 of this bill contains provisions which aim at injurious speculation in food, feed, and fuel products and provides that the President, when he finds it essential in order to prevent undue enhancement or fluctuation of prices or unjust market manipulation or the publication of unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries, which are called evil practice, may wholly or partly prevent the same, and any willful violation of the section is prohibited and a fine not exceeding $10,000 and imprisonment not exceeding four years imposed.

This section fails to declare these evil practices misdemeanors under the criminal law, and it seems the only power to stop this is the suspending power of various boards of trade. It is well known that speculation in fuel does not exist, but speculation in feed and food products not only exists, but is the controlling method in the country to-day which results in high prices being made.

There exists a method in the stock exchanges of Chicago, New York, and other large cities, which is carried out by ramifications all over the country in brokers' offices and bucket shops, whereby wheat, oats, corn, and provisions are sold in the future, by what is known as "futures" or "short sales," whereby no actual corn, wheat, or provisions are delivered, but it is merely a species of betting that the price will advance or decline up to a given date. Fortunes have been made and lost in the maelstrom of speculation, and no wonder that prices have been advanced and profits made by this method of manipulation without any regard to the actual cost of the article or the necessities of the people who consume these necessaries.

Just now the dealing in these futures has suspended entirely in the New York and Chicago exchanges, because if they would open at this time wheat would be advanced to $5 or $6 a bushel and flour to $20 to $30 a barrel.

The reason they were closed was that France and England had bought large quantities of wheat and flour during the winter, under what was termed the "May option" or "May futures," and when the 1st of May came the wheat and flour was not in existence, to be delivered, the agents of the French and British Governments closed out their deals on the 1st of May at a profit of $15,000,000, so it is stated. This money was immediately reinvested in September options, and the agents of these Governments, it is asserted to-day by those who claim to know, own at least one-third or more of the new crop of wheat. It was this large investment in May options that caused the exchanges to close their "future dealings" for the present altogether. Hence the necessity of passing this food-control bill immediately and inserting therein a clause prohibiting the optioning, by this iniquitous form of speculation, of our grain products, which is responsible entirely for the present high price of wheat flour to-day. I introduced this amendment, which reads as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 11, line 13, after the word "transaction," insert "including buying, selling, or dealing in food, grain, or provisions by the method commonly known as 'futures' or 'short selling' where the article bought or sold is not delivered at the maturity of the contract."

This would prohibit absolutely a species of speculation that has been known to the business community and is a curse to the consuming public. It is asserted and not disputed that the May options of the French and British Government agents were closed out at $2.48 a bushel, and at the time they were closed wheat had gone to $3.10 a bushel in the Chicago exchange, and it was to prevent it from going to $5 by these dealings in "futures" on the exchange that it was stopped.

But we are facing a more serious situation. The wheat crop of the United States for the coming year is estimated at approximately 750,000,000 bushels. It is now asserted that England and France own for September and December delivery, bought under this method of "futures" or for "future delivery," approximately 250,000,000 bushels. As it requires 600,000,000 bushels to feed our own people, it can be readily seen that we are going to be short 150,000,000 bushels of the amount of wheat necessary to furnish our people with bread through the coming year, and this has all been made possible by this iniquitous, villainous, and outrageous method of dealing in "futures" permitted by the grain exchanges of Chicago and New York.

There is no need of concealing these facts. It is better that we know them and prepare in some measure to meet this critical situation. If these facts are true, and investigation seems to confirm them, then there is an actual shortage that must be made up for the coming year in some way or our people will starve.

This report is further confirmed by the fact that they are now harvesting wheat in Texas, thrashing it from the shock and selling it at $2.40 per bushel to the agents who are buying to make good these foreign purchases under these "future options" for delivery in September and December.

If this method proceeds unrestrained, the American crop will soon be all bought up and the American people will soon be without wheat. Therefore, this amendment should be adopted and put in this bill. As it was not inserted in the House, it may yet be inserted in the Senate, and more drastic provision added to the bill to permit the President to establish an embargo and only permit sufficient wheat to be exported in order that our requirements may first be cared for.

Mr. Speaker, there has been much talk about feeding the American people on corn and our allies in Europe on wheat. If something is not done, and done quickly, that is just what will happen, because existing conditions make such result inevitable. It may be that Mr. Hoover, who has lived for the past several years in England, is more familiar with living conditions abroad than here and thinks the American people can eat corn, and our allies in Europe should have wheat.

It has been asserted in this debate on the authority of Dr. Wiley that corn is not good for the American children. Be that as it may, the rule of self-preservation appeals to me, Mr. Speaker, and I believe this situation is so imperative that it demands the passage of this bill and the establishment by the President of an embargo forbidding the exportation of wheat and other food products, whether bought under "futures" or not, until the wants of the American people and Armies are first provided for.

There is another trade evil with reference to food products that demands immediate legislation and correction in the United States that this bill, if properly administered, will regulate. That is the cold-storage business.

During the summer season eggs, fruits, meats, and so forth, and all manner of perishable commodities are stored in cold-storage houses. This bill, so far as price fixing is concerned, excepts them from its provisions, and the farmer receives no consideration for his "perishable products."

Even during the recent high prices, it was shown on investigation that carloads of potatoes were held on the sidings until they decayed rather than send them to market and thereby reduce prices. Warehouses were full of eggs, yet the price was unreasonably high and at the present time the high price of butter, eggs, and meat is in a large measure traceable to the manipulation and control of the cold-storage houses and their agents and operators, aided by the food speculators who are exacting from the public unreasonable and unjustifiable profits. This bill proposes to regulate this whole system, and it is for the purpose of giving complete relief that I am urgently advocating the passage of this legislation without delay.

If it corrects either of these evils, and I regret the amendment for dealing in "futures" was not adopted, it will be an act of Congress that people without regard to party will regard as a step in advance taken for the protection of their rights.

When these matters are properly regulated, the middlemen, who are extorting outrageous profits between the farmer and the consumer, will find his opportunity for exploiting, plundering, and robbing taken away, and a better day will dawn for the American farmer and producer and the American consumer alike, and the small retailer and those of moderate means will be set free from that conscienceless band of speculators, who oppress those classes of our people who can least afford to be plundered and robbed.

A Brief for the People.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. BLACKMON,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a brief for the people by John Morgan Burns.

The brief is as follows:

TAX GREED AND LAWLESSNESS OUT OF OUR TARIFF SYSTEM—VEAZIE BANK v. FENNO, MUNN v. THE STATE OF ILLINOIS, McCRAY v. THE UNITED STATES—THREE NATION-MAKING DECISIONS OF THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT—A BRIEF FOR THE PEOPLE.

[By John Morgan Burns.]

The real relationship which the manufacturer of a tariff-protected product in the United States bears toward his employee and the American people is that of a trustee. Congress should declare this relationship and make him accountable for the manner in which he administers the largest trust funds ever committed to the care and keeping of a private citizen—amounting to more than $2,000,000,000 a year. The only practical, constitutional way to bring about a fair system of accounting on the part of the protected manufacturer is to be found in the imposition of a conditional excise tax laid upon the privilege of manufacture and sale.

If Congress has the power—and with judicial sanction it has exercised that power almost since the birth of the Government—to tax all its citizens for the benefit of six or seven million men, women, and children who work in manufacture, it follows that Congress has the right to employ its excise taxing power to insure that the billions of dollars taken out of the pockets of the people by the manufacturers shall reach the wage earners, in whose name and for whose benefit the import tax is levied and maintained. (Veazie Bank v. Fenno.)

If the dairy interests of the country may come to Congress and persuade it to lay an excise tax, to handicap or destroy a palatable rival food product (oleomargarine), and the Supreme Court of the United States upholds the constitutionality of such a tax, laid for such a partisan purpose, surely these six or seven million men, women, and children who work in the protected mines, mills, factories, and sweat shops of the United States, may justly and constitutionally insist that Congress employ its excise taxing power to force their employer, the manufacturer, to give them a fair share of the fabulous sums of money which Congress, by virtue of its tariff duties, permits him to extort, in their name and for their benefit, from the pockets of all the people. (McCray v. The United States.)

A BRIEF FOR THE PEOPLE.

Whether or not there shall be a protective tariff system in the United States is a question about which wise and honest citizens may, have, do, and will differ. But if a protective tariff system is maintained in the United States largely for the benefit of the wage earner engaged in the business of manufacture, whether or not the 7,000,000 men, women, and children who toil in the protected industries shall receive a fair portion of the proceeds arising from such protective system is a question about which honest men can not differ.

If we lay import duties in order to guarantee the manufacturer a reasonable profit, whether or not he shall be restricted to the taking of a reasonable profit out of his business is a question about which honest men can not differ. In a series of articles, of which this is the first, the author offers to the public a practical, constitutional plan of legislation which will make the protected manufacturer fairly and fully account to the American people for the manner in which he exercises the invaluable special privilege which he enjoys under the protective tariff laws of the United States.

Each article contains a complete discussion of a distinct phase of the plan.

In a bill entitled "To increase the revenue, and for other purposes," introduced by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House July 1, 1916, Title III, imposing munitions manufacturers' tax, a vital principle of my plan legally to restrain the manufacturer of a tariff-protected product or commodity from extorting an unreasonable profit out of his business, either by charging the consuming public too much for his wares or by skimping the pay envelope of his wage earner, is recognized and applied in a small way.

This is the first time in the history of the Ways and Means Committee of the House that an effort has been made to make the payment of an excise tax laid upon the privilege of manufacturing payable according to the profit derived by the manufacturer out of the manufacture and sale of his product.

The proposed tax casts upon the manufacturer the burden of proving that his net profit per annum is less than 10 per cent. It goes still further and specifically enumerates all the charges which properly constitute the expense of carrying on the business, and, upon the principle of exclusion, precludes the manufacturer from padding his expense account, and also from claiming any profit whatever on account of watered stocks, bonds, or other fiat or fictitious values.

The Republican platform of 1908 said, in its paragraph on the protective tariff system:

"In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries."

After studying and brooding over the tariff problem for several years, it finally dawned upon me that the great flaw, the big weak spot in the practical operation of our protective tariff laws lay in the fact that no legislation had ever been provided by the Congress under which, through which, by virtue of which, it was possible to ascertain which manufacturers were making and pocketing an unreasonable profit. Again, even when it became obvious that certain tariff-protected manufacturers were making an unreasonable, enormous, and frequently fabulous profit, no legal method had ever been devised by which, as a matter of law, they could be restrained from extorting and pocketing such unreasonable, exorbitant, and fabulous profit.

I participated in the campaign of 1908, speaking for the Democratic ticket in New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey, and I personally know that, led by the Democratic presidential nominee, the Democratic speakers railed at the Republican Party for having declared through their platform that it was the aim and purpose of Republican tariff legislation to guarantee a reasonable profit to the manufacturer in contradistinction to every other class of business in the United States. The Democrats should have gone further and railed at the Republican Party because they have permitted manufacturers to make not only a reasonable profit but an unreasonable, exorbitant, and frequently fabulous profit.

That party should have charged that the Republican Party, having first erred in attempting to use the taxing power to insure the manufacturer a reasonable profit, more grievously erred in its failure to safeguard its tariff legislation in such a way as to prevent the manufacturer from making, taking, and getting away with unreasonable and conscienceless profits. Through the Republican Party the manufacturing interests have made Congress exercise its constitutional power to lay very high and sometimes prohibitory tariff duties upon imports, and as a result thereof some manufacturers, by depressing the price of labor and by lawless trusts and combinations perfected between the suns, have continuously reaped enormous profits taxed out of the pockets of all the people.

At his request Congress protected the manufacturer from foreign competition. It is unbelievable, it is inconceivable, that an otherwise astute American public intelligence failed to discover that in the same line in the Constitution in which the power to lay an import tax is found is also found the power to lay an excise tax; that the consuming public should have failed up to the present time to insist that Congress, having already protected the American manufacturer from foreign competition by the imposition of an import tax, should go one step further and protect the wage earner in the "protected" mines, mills, and factories, as well as the consuming public, from the greed and rapacity of the manufacturer. That Congress has power to do so is unquestionable and unquestioned among those familiar with the Constitution and the decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

The Constitution of the United States says, Article I, section 8, paragraph 1:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; * * *."

Ponder over this illustration: Once upon a time the product of American steel mills was protected by an enormous ad valorem duty. The world by the operation of this tariff law was shut out of the American markets for the benefit of the mill owners, their wage earners, and the general welfare. The whole citizenship of the United States, including the wage earner who worked in the steel mills, was cut off from the markets of the world in so far as the purchase of these products was concerned, and left absolutely at the mercy of the mill owners, as to what prices they should pay for these steel products, and also the wages which the workmen of the mill owners should receive.

Congress should at that time have gone one step further, reasoning thusly: "We have cut the people of the United States off from the markets of the world; the wage scale of the workman in the steel mill is left entirely in the discretion of the protected mill owners; we, the Congress, did this because we desired to build up manufacturing in the United States, to insure steel-mill owners a reasonable profit, and to guarantee that the wage earners in the protected business of manufacture in the United States shall receive decent wages; however, we desire that at the same time the American people shall be kept in a position where they may buy the products of these steel mills at a price which will subserve these economic considerations only.

"Therefore, to insure this result, Congress does lay upon the manufacture of steel products an excise tax as large as the import tax, payable only upon the happening of the following conditions: First, if it appears that the steel-mill owners are making and trying to get away with an unreasonable profit; second, if it appears that the steel-mill owners are combining or trying to combine in price fixing or wage fixing, or otherwise, for the purpose of stifling competition among themselves, and thereby thwarting the practical working out of the theory and principles upon which, according to the advocates of protection, the doctrine of protection rests."

In other words, Congress should have used and should now use its excise taxing power to prevent the protected manufacturers from abusing and prostituting the special privilege and self-aggrandizing opportunity conferred upon the manufacturers by the laying of an import tax; also to carry a fair share of their profits into the pay envelope of their wage earners and to protect all the people from the manufacturers' greed and avarice.

Had this been done, American manufacture would have been freed from undesirable world-wide competition and would have flourished; the manufacturers would have been very prosperous; but they could not then boast that they had taken billions of dollars out of the pockets of the consuming public and at the same time kept a fair share of it out of the pay envelopes of their host of employees.

The facts in the case show that thousands of tariff-protected manufacturers have been and are now making, taking, and keeping an unreasonable and exorbitant, a conscienceless, and in many instances a fabulous profit out of the protected business of manufacture. Congress should now use its excise power to make these manufacturers, as a matter of law, leave every dollar in excess of a reasonable profit in the pockets of the people by lowering the prices of their wares, or, if they persist in taking it out of the public purse, either make them put all the profit in excess of a reasonable profit in the pay envelopes of the six or seven million men, women, and children who toil for them in their protected industries or pay it into the Treasury of the United States.

Let Congress lay upon the privilege of manufacturing tariff-protected products a conditional excise tax fully as large as the tax laid upon such importations; make this excise tax payable at the end of the year, unless the manufacturer appears and affirmatively proves to the satisfaction of some court or commission established by law for that purpose that he has not made an unreasonable profit, or, if so, that he has put all of that profit in excess of what is reasonable into the pay envelopes of his wage earners; second, that he has not violated the antitrust laws of any State or of the United States.

It is obvious, in the first place, that this legislation would keep the foreigner out. Then the Republican cry, largely founded in truth, that the wiping out of tariff duties or the lowering thereof by the Democratic Party in power, thereby placing American markets and American workmen at the mercy of European or foreign competition, would lose its potency, efficacy, and every vestige of verity as a winning political shibboleth. Second, the legislation would not directly affect two-thirds of the manufacturers in the country, because it is statistically true that two-thirds of them are struggling for existence, or certainly at least not making an unreasonable profit.

The proposed plan does not embrace an attempt to fix prices or wages, does not attempt to fix the wage scale, does not attempt to dictate in advance, as the Interstate Commerce Commission dictates rates that railroads shall charge, and does not prescribe the manner or method in which the manufacturer shall conduct his business. It merely puts the manufacturer under bond, brings his entire business under direct competent Federal scrutiny—not control—and makes him disclose his profits at the end of the year. If they are found to be unreasonable, the taxing power takes hold of the unreasonable portion of the profits and covers them into the United States Treasury for the benefit of all the people, the victims of unjust prices, and gives Congress an opportunity to render justice to underpaid employees.

Is it constitutional? It is clearly so upon two distinct grounds. The plan of proposed legislation comes squarely within the definition of the constitutional principle laid down by the United States Supreme Court in the famous and very far-reaching decision in Veazie Bank against Fenno. In that case Congress laid an excise tax of 10 per cent upon State-bank notes intended for circulation. In the decision Chief Justice Chase, speaking for the court, said:

First, that the tax was not a direct tax, and therefore was not subject to the rule of apportionment; second, that it was an excise tax, and fully complied with the rule of uniformity; third, that the act levying the tax was clearly within the power of Congress, and that the destructive effect of the tax or the congressional intent to destroy a State bank as an institution was not subject to judicial review; that Congress may exercise its taxing power unwisely, oppressively, even to the point of destruction, and that the motive of Congress in laying the tax, or the manner in which Congress exercised it, and the effect which followed the imposition of the tax were not question for the court.

But the court went further and upheld the tax on another and distinct ground. It said:

"Having thus in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it can not be questioned that Congress may constitutionally secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation."

In other words, Congress having clear constitutional authority to coin money, fix its value, to emit bills of credit, and in a general and comprehensive way to establish and maintain a national currency system, it follows that Congress needs must have and does have the power to protect that currency system or policy from every form of interference or obstruction from any and every source.

Now Congress has the clear constitutional power to lay import duties or to tax imports. The tariff system, whether established and maintained for protective or for revenue purposes, has been and is one of the great fiscal policies of the United States; has been and is one of its chief sources of revenue. Congress, having the undisputed and indisputable power to establish and maintain this great revenue-breeding national policy,

* * * it can not be questioned that Congress may constitutionally secure the benefit of this great tariff system or policy to the people of the United States by appropriate legislation.

Wisely and accurately has the Supreme Court held that Congress, by appropriate legislation, may protect the exercise of one of its enumerated powers from abuse or prostitution or from the greed or avarice of any or all classes of its citizenship. If Congress has the power to lay import duties, to provide revenue, or otherwise to provide for the general welfare, Congress needs must have, and the Supreme Court has said that Congress does have the power to protect its tariff system or policy from every form or species of private exploitation, from every interference, or obstruction which tends to divert it from the accomplishment of the great public purposes for which the advocates of protection tell us it was instituted.

If Congress has the power—and with judicial sanction it has exercised that power almost since the birth of the Government—to tax all of its citizens for the benefit of six or seven million men, women, and children who work in manufacture it follows, as sure as night follows day, that Congress has the right to employ its excise taxing power to insure that the billions of dollars taken out of the pockets of the people by the manufacturers shall reach the men, women, and children, the wage earners, in whose name and for whose benefit the import tax is levied and maintained. (Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 75 U. S., 533–556.)

This decision was rendered in December, 1869, and on kindred subjects has been frequently cited and followed by the Supreme Court. It is to-day the fixed and settled law of the land.

The legislation I propose also comes squarely within the definition of the constitutional principles laid down by the United States Supreme Court in McCray v. United States (195 U. S., p. 27 to 64, inclusive).

In that case Congress, in compliance with demands of the dairy interests of the United States, laid an excise tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent upon the manufacture of oleomargarine, and a superexcise tax of 10 cents per pound upon the manufacture and sale of colored oleomargarine. This is the boldest assertion as well as the boldest application of the taxing power ever made by Congress.

The facts show that the colored oleomargarine was not unwholesome or in any way deleterious to health. The court took judicial notice that Congress, in the imposition of the 10 cents per pound excise tax, did not seek and did not expect revenue. It is patent to him who runs that the purpose and motive of Congress in levying the tax was to drive colored oleomargarine out of the markets of the United States as a competitor with butter.

This case was decided May 31, 1904. The opinion was written by Mr. Justice White, the present Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court. Four members of the court dissented. The dissent is important because it attests beyond controversy that every economic and constitutional phase and angle of the question were considered by the court

In a sweeping way the majority held that Congress's power to lay an excise tax was unlimited as to amount; and that the motive or purpose of Congress in laying the tax was not subject to judicial inquiry; that it was not a question for the court whether the exercise of the taxing power was wise or unwise, or oppressive or destructive. It further held that, because colored oleomargarine resembled butter, it was possible to practice a fraud upon the public in the sale of oleomargarine, and that this fact justified Congress in confining the tax to oleomargarine alone. In other words, that the mere fact that a fraud might be perpetrated brought the tax squarely within the doctrine of classification.

It is interesting to read the brief prepared by Mr. Solicitor General Hoyt, of the United States, because the majority decision approved and adopted every legal and constitutional contention therein made. In this brief will be found, stated in a succinct and convincing manner, the argument and authorities which abundantly support the conclusions of the court. This case has become the very foundation stone upon which the comprehensive taxing power is based. It has been invariably followed and approved by the court.

From the language used by the court is gathered the impression that the court itself questioned the morality and the justice of the tax imposed by Congress. This is disclosed by the headnote, fully supported by the text, which reads as follows:

"The judiciary is without authority to avoid an act of Congress lawfully asserting the taxing power, even in a case where to the judicial mind it seems that Congress had in putting such power in motion abused its lawful authority by levying a tax which was unwise or oppressive."

If the dairy interests of the country may come to Congress and persuade it to lay an excise tax, to handicap or destroy a palatable rival food product and the Supreme Court of the United States upholds the constitutionality of such a tax, laid for such a partisan purpose, surely these six or seven million men, women, and children, who work in the protected mines, mills, factories, and sweat shops of the United States may justly and constitutionally insist that Congress employ its excise taxing power to force their employer, the manufacturer, to give them a fair share of the fabulous sums of money which Congress, by virtue of its tariff duties, permits him to extort in their name and for their benefit from the pockets of all the people.

Surely the consuming public may justly and constitutionally insist that Congress, through the exercise of its excise taxing power, shall force the manufacturers to deliver to these millions of men, women, and children—wage earners—a fair share of the fabulous sums of money wrung from the public by the manufacturers. Surely the American wage earner and the American consumer, constituting 99 per cent of the country's population, may honestly and constitutionally insist, yea demand, that if Congress is going to continue to cut them off from the markets of the world through the practical operation of a protective, or, for that matter, a revenue tariff, Congress shall at the same time protect them from the greed and rapacity of the manufacturers through the operation of an effective conditional excise tax upon the privilege of manufacture and sale.

Justice demands this legislation. It is moral, honest, constitutional, and absolutely necessary. The American people may have a tariff system, may keep the foreigner out of American markets, may stimulate and promote the growth and development of the manufacturing interests, may insure good wages to the men, women, and children employed in manufacturing establishments—may do all these things and at the same time may restrain the manufacturers from exploiting the tariff laws to increase their fabulous wealth.

Give the manufacturer his reasonable profit. Deal liberally with him in fixing the percentage of profit that he may earn and take, but be sure that, as a matter of law, he shall be restrained from taking more. Put the manufacturer under bond and penalties, as is every other trustee known to the Anglo-Saxon system of jurisprudence. Make him leave the money in the pockets of the people, or, if he persists in taking it out of the pockets of the people, make him put it in the pay envelope, where in morals, law, and good conscience it belongs; or in lieu of that make him put it in the Treasury of the United States.

Comprehend the decision in Munn v. State of Illinois, reported in 94 U. S., p. 113. That case is a clean-cut declaration of the vast power which the State exercises over private property in order to insure the general welfare.

It should be remembered that my plan operates against lawlessness and unreasonable profits alone. It taxes unrighteous acquisitions, not the struggle to make a living. It taxes results, not experiment. It saves American markets for American manufacture in so far as world-wide conditions make it advisable. But at the same time it keeps the manufacturer from levying exorbitant tribute upon the American people for rendering the services of a trustee.

It is not based upon the spirit of vengeance or revenge. "It seeks no indemnity for the past, but merely provides security for the present and future." It gives the manufacturer everything that the boldest advocate of protection claims he should have as the recipient of invaluable, extraordinary governmental favor.

In this article the author demonstrates that the Constitution, as construed by the United States Supreme Court, has conferred plenary power upon Congress to make the manufacturer tote fair with both his employees and the people.

In succeeding articles the author will demonstrate the moral and economic necessity for immediate congressional action.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. GARLAND DUPRÉ,
OF LOUISIANA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, June 25, 1917.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include resolutions of the Louisiana League for Woman Suffrage passed on the 18th day of June, 1917.

The resolutions are as follows:

Whereas we women of the South are being called upon for service and for sacrifice in war, and are responding to the call with true nobility of spirit and purpose; and
Whereas we realize how unjust it is that we are discriminated against, as are women from many other sections of our country, merely on account of sex: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we women of the Louisiana League for Woman Suffrage, meeting this 18th day of June, 1917, at New Orleans, call upon our President and the Congress of the United States to cause to be passed quickly as a war measure the Susan B. Anthony amendment allowing the States themselves to pass upon the measure so that the women of the Nation may feel themselves part of our great country in its time of greatest stress, and in a position to protect their children, their homes, and themselves in the event of their men being called away in great numbers; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, to the party leaders in both Houses of Congress, and to the Louisiana delegation, with the request to Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL that they be read into the record of the Senate, and to Representative GARLAND DUPRÉ that they be read into the record of the House; and be it finally

Resolved, That the Louisiana Members of the United States Senate and National House be urged to do all in their power to have the amendment passed immediately as a war measure.

Mrs. W. J. O'DONNELL,
President Louisiana League for Woman Suffrage.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLEMENT C. DICKINSON,
OF MISSOURI,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, the Lever food-control bill seeks to meet extraordinary conditions resulting from a world war. The food and fuel of the country must be conserved and used for the benefit of those entitled thereto. The producer and the consumer must be protected from the speculator and those who hoard and manipulate for selfish purposes the products of the soil and mine to satisfy their own greed. The country knows that great criminals have successfully sought to corner and hoard the products of the toil of others, in order that unearned money might be gathered by those who have not produced these necessaries.

Full authority by law should be given and a courageous prosecution under the law by the Department of Justice to the end that these criminal acts and conduct may cease. An honest administration of this law can do injury to no honest man or honest business. Food products have been controlled and withheld from use in order to enhance prices, sometimes destroying large quantities of food in order to increase the market price of the amount held and to be released by speculators for sale only when prices have been advanced enormously by cornering the market.

I hope this measure, when enacted into law, will help the situation, and that the food products of the country will be released thereby from the control of speculators and that the people will be protected from their extortions. There is no attempt in this measure to fix the maximum price of food products nor to interfere with the natural law of supply and demand.

In section 5 of this bill the farmer and the retailer are exempted from the provisions of the bill and should be. The farmer is entitled to the fruits of his labor and fair prices for the products of his farm and the retail merchant to reasonable profits on the goods sold to his customers. This bill meets a much-needed demand, and the Committee on Agriculture is entitled to great credit for its careful preparation, a large share of which credit is due to its very able chairman, Mr. LEVER, and I have cheerfully given my support to it, and I hope and believe that it will accomplish great good. If it has any defect in it other than the one that I will refer to, relating to common carriers, I feel sure they are minor defects and will in no way interfere with the administration of the law. That this great measure will be administered honestly and courageously by the President and Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, appointed to administer this measure and who serves without pay, I have not the least doubt; and I commend the same to the honest judgment and approval of the people of the country who believe in fair dealing and desire honest treatment. The great President of the United States and his trusted agent, Mr. Hoover, and his associates, who are giving their services without pay in the administration of this patriotic measure, are entitled to the confidence and support of the American people, for whose benefit this legislation is being enacted. I am willing to trust Woodrow Wilson, your President and mine.

I did not agree with the committee in seeking to exempt common carriers, and I offered an amendment to section 5 to strike out the words "or to any common carrier." My motion to strike out these words was opposed by the chairman of the committee and the words were permitted to remain in. In support of my amendment I stated that it was with some reluctance I offered any amendment to the bill, but that I knew of no good reason and no sufficient reason had been assigned for exempting common carriers or railroads from the provisions of this section of the bill.

It is familiar to the country that some common carriers or railroads have permitted or lent the use of their sidetracks and cars for long periods of time for the hoarding and storing of large quantities of food and fuel products, thereby lending aid to speculators who have sought to hoard the necessaries of life. The railroads are the great distributing public agencies of the country, and when they receive products of the farm and mine they should be forbidden from storing these products in their cars on their sidetracks or permitting the same, at the behest of large concerns or of their own will, bringing congestion instead of distribution.

At least the seal of approval should not be put on their conduct by exempting them from such evil practices. Great shipping interests have potent influences with the railroads of the country. Besides, many railroads own and control great coal mines and ship their own products over their own roads. And many parties speculating in food products own and control interests in the railroads, and absolute freedom of action ought not to be granted by the provisions of this bill to the railroads, and the President of the Nation be told that he must hands off as far as common carriers are concerned.

The bill does not even leave it to the discretion of the President, but by this very provision, which I sought to strike out by my amendment, the same evil practices are invited. Food products have been allowed to rot on the sidetracks of some of the great railroads instead of being sent to the market, while small shippers throughout the country were pleading for cars to send their stock and grain and other products to the market, losing their deserved profits, while large speculators were holding their products by aid of the railroads on sidetracks, shortening the supply in the markets and preventing small shippers from reaching the market because unable to secure cars. This action has inured to the benefit of the big shippers and speculators, hoarding products of the farm and mine.

By exempting the railroads the hand of the hoarding speculator is strengthened. With freedom of action on the part of common carriers to lend their services and aid to those who hoard the necessaries of life, this evil practice is liable to continue. Railroads may by the terms of this bill continue to be particeps criminis in these great crimes against the public. The evil practices will not end unless some positive authority be given to end them. Admitting the wrong done, the railroads themselves have not fixed penalties to remedy the evil. The Interstate Commerce Commission, by inaction, apparently consented to it, if it has authority to act. The Department of Justice, with full knowledge of the facts, has not seen fit to act in the premises; and now comes this great Committee on Agriculture, in this great bill, which seeks to take from the speculators control of food and fuel and inserts a provision by which these great criminal speculators can continue to use the railroads for storing and hoarding purposes, and the railroads or their managers, having a common interest with those who use the railroads, are protected from any interference by this exemption.

The chairman of the Agricultural Committee suggests that the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House should deal with it. Suppose it does not, and suppose no other agency does, and this committee forbids interference by the President under the exemption in this bill, have you not offered to great interests a continual avenue of escape for their evil practices?

In opposition, it has been suggested that the railroads might not take out the license provided under this bill and the commerce of the country would stop. With any such defiance of the law the President would immediately take over control and operate the railroads during the war, as by law he is authorized to do. It has also been suggested that if my amendment should prevail and the Interstate Commerce Commission should refuse to grant the railroads a 15 per cent increase on freight rates, that the President might be authorized by this amendment to increase freight rates. Wild, indeed, is any suggestion of this kind. Nor would it by any means follow, nor grant any such power.

The failure to exempt the railroads from the provisions of this food-control bill would give no such authority to the President, and no man for one moment would believe that such action on the part of the President was possible.

Having great regard for the high character and ability of the members of this committee, and believing that they were prompted by no tender regard for these great corporate interests, that as common carriers control the commerce of the country, I regret that they were willing to place these common carriers, the great distributing agencies of the country, above and beyond this law and to say to the President of the United States, by this exemption, You must not, in the execution of this measure, lay your hand upon these great interests, for they are permitted by this measure to do as they will. I have confidence in the honesty of purpose of said committee, but speak here of the apparent effect of their action in making this exemption. I do not believe it was the desire of the committee that the railroads should be relieved of their duty to do their part in speedily helping to distribute impartially the products of the country, but I fear that by attempting to shift the responsibility they have made a mistake. I hope it may be corrected before this measure finally becomes a law. Notwithstanding this apparent error or mistake made by the committee, I hope the evil practices heretofore pursued or permitted may cease.

The act is entitled, in part, "An act for controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," and in its provisions it seeks equitable distribution and to facilitate the movements of foods, feeds, and fuel and to prevent scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, manipulations, and private controls, affecting supply, distribution, and movement. Let the avenues of commerce—the railroads—do their full duty by the public and the speculator will be less able to rob the public.

This food-control bill is a great measure, and, in my judgment, is worthy of generous support, and as stated by the President—

> The object of the measure is not to control the food of the country, but to release it from the control of speculators and other persons who will seek to make inordinate profits out of it, and to protect the people against the extortions which would result.

When it becomes a law I hope the evils complained of will cease; and if not, that vigorous prosecutions may result, to the end that the full purpose of this proposed law may be accomplished.

Certain prohibition amendments have been placed in the bill forbidding the use of foods, and so forth, in the production of alcohol or of alcoholic beverages, with certain exceptions, which I voted for, and I insert herein sections 14 and 14a relating thereto:

> SEC. 14. That no person shall use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of alcohol, except for governmental, industrial, scientific, medicinal, or sacramental purposes, or of alcoholic beverages. Any person who willfully violates this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.
> SEC. 14a. That the President is authorized, if, in his opinion, it is necessary to conserve necessaries, to require any person having control of alcohol and distilled spirits, to turn over to the Government for use or redistillation, such proportion of said alcohol or spirits as the President may deem necessary to meet the requirements of the Government in the manufacture of munitions and other military and hospital supplies in so far as such use of redistillation would dispense with the necessity of utilizing products and materials suitable for food and feeds in the future manufacture of alcohol or distilled spirits for the purposes herein enumerated. Upon the failure of the person to comply with the President's requirement, the President is authorized to requisition and take possession of the alcohol and distilled spirits required to be turned over and to pay for same a just compensation to be determined by the President. And if the price so determined be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid the amount prescribed by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation for such spirits or alcohol, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

My vote in support of these prohibition features or amendments was in accord with my votes heretofore cast in Congress and in my own State on prohibition matters. Absolute national prohibition could not be written in this bill, as an amendment thereto. Only by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States can national prohibition be secured, and to amend the Constitution a joint resolution must pass both Houses of Congress by a two-thirds majority and then be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States of the Union. Only such amendments as were relevant or related to the subject matter of the bill could be added as amendments thereto.

This vote, however, shows the sentiment here in favor of temperance legislation, and is in accord with the action of Congress, when last winter it voted to put the saloons out of business in the District of Columbia, and to forbid the further granting of license to sell intoxicating liquors in the city of Washington, the Capital of the Nation. It is in accord with the dominant sentiment of Congress, which passed a law forbidding the shipment of intoxicating liquors into prohibition States, and that forbids the advertising of intoxicating liquors by papers circulating in dry territory. It is in accord with the large majority sentiment in the State of Missouri, outside of the city of St. Louis, and especially in accord with the sentiment in the sixth district of Missouri, which I have the honor to represent.

When the country needs food to meet the demands of war conditions, it is especially appropriate that the grain of the country be conserved for the purposes of food rather than for the production of alcoholic drinks. The prohibition States are rapidly increasing and the time seems not far distant when national prohibition will be the established law of the land. In any event, Congress is responding to the growing sentiment of the land. Let the States and people thereof do their part and temperance and temperance laws will dominate the country.

"Hands Off, Uncle Sam."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. W. LARSEN,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the privilege granted in relation to the food bill, I desire to extend my remarks for the purpose of inserting in the RECORD a very timely editorial appearing in the Cochran Journal, of Cochran, Ga., June 21, 1917. The editorial relates to proposed legislation detrimental to the production of one of our greatest food products, and suggests the necessity for organization to protect the interest of the producer. It is as follows:

"HANDS OFF, UNCLE SAM."

It seems to us that there is every reason why the farmer should get 25 or 30 cents per pound for cotton this fall. The causes contributing to this condition are perfectly natural and should be allowed to take their legitimate course without interference from the Government. If the price of cotton was a result of an illegal combination to boost the price for the benefit of a few, as it is in the case of many other products, it would be a different proposition. The old and ever potent law of "supply and demand" is doing the work.

By our commercial journals, and the very best sources of information we can obtain, we are informed that the demand for staple cotton goods is far in excess of the supply. Prices for cotton goods continue to rise and contract sales are continuing on a large scale for Government purposes. In the early part of the war, during the fall of 1914, the cotton exchanges were closed and cotton dropped to a low level. It seemed for a while that we were not going to have any market at all for the South's principal crop. Our people were in distress, absolutely panic-stricken. Ruin and bankruptcy stared us in the face. Mass meetings were held all over this country. In this emergency the Government was appealed to for help. They refused to interfere in any way. Conditions have been reversed. The world is demanding cotton, and more cotton. Uncle Sam wouldn't help us when we needed it, and now we don't need him he should keep his finger out of our pie.

There has been a suggestion from leading manufacturers that the Government should take the crop in hand and place an embargo on foreign shipments, ostensibly as a war measure, but really to depress the price. It is such a pity that our farmers are not thoroughly organized, so they could make a universal demand on our Congressmen to keep on guard.

The cotton manufacturers are organized. The farmers are not. There is an unprecedented demand for cotton goods at rising prices. Spindles are turning day and night. The factories are prosperous, and we believe it would be unwise and unjust for the manufacturers to make any movement that would depress the price of cotton.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. CARY,
OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 26, 1917.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I wish to insert a resolution which I have just received from the Wisconsin State Council of Defense, wherein they state that investigation reveals that the American people are threatened with an entirely inadequate available supply of coal for the coming winter and with prices even more exorbitant than those now charged for that necessity. The following is the resolution:

Whereas investigation reveals that the American people are threatened with an entirely inadequate available supply of coal for the coming winter and with prices even more exorbitant than those presently charged for that necessity; and

Whereas investigation and authentic data conclusively establish that neither inadequacy of supply nor abnormally high prices can be justified as resulting from a lack of the existence of the undistributed and unmined product, but, on the contrary, conclusively establish that both are due essentially and entirely to a failure of production and proper distribution under the prevailing plan of control, operation, and manipulation; and

Whereas proper control of the price of this commodity to the consumer will not of itself avert the crisis that menaces the people. The available supply throughout the Nation must be augmented. Intensified production and proper distribution must be combined with control of prices if this crisis and the accompanying distress is to be averted: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Wisconsin State Council of Defense, That the Council of National Defense be, and is hereby, respectfully memorialized to recommend to and urge upon the President of the United States and the Congress the immediate assumption of control by the United States Government over the coal mines in the United States and the operation of these mines by the Federal Government pursuant to such plan as is necessary to assure an adequate supply of coal, and to perfect arrangements for the proper distribution thereof at reasonable prices, allowing to the owners of the mines a reasonable return for the coal mined and for the use of equipment and facilities.

I was also in receipt of a similar resolution from the school board of Milwaukee, in which they urge that immediate steps be taken to prevent this continued uprising in the price of coal. I presented this matter to Mr. Hoover, who will be the food administrator for this Government.

I wish to call attention to another letter which I wrote Mr. Hoover in regard to conditions existing in the District of Columbia:

At a social meeting of the small farmers of Prince Georges County, Md., held last week, one man made the statement that he drove 20 young hogs to the Bennings Abattoir in the District of Columbia a few days ago and that he was offered only 4½ cents a pound for the lot and that on his way home he paid 35 cents a pound for pork chops. I also know of a case of a farmer bringing in several barrels of kale and several boxes of head lettuce to the market, and could not sell either at 15 cents a barrel or 15 cents a box to the market people. He brought them back home and fed them to his hogs; and so many other such cases could be cited. I sincerely hope that this information will be of service to you. Should you want these people, I can tell you how they can be reached. All this right under our nose in the city of Washington.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 26, 1917.

Hon. HERBERT C. HOOVER,
Food Administrator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HOOVER: Since writing you yesterday I have learned of a few more interesting food conditions around Washington and which I am pleased to give you.

One Francis McKonkey, a farmer in Maryland near the District line, brought kale to the market and was unable to get enough to pay for picking, so has plowed it all under now. Another case in Virginia where they have allowed peas and strawberries to rot or dry up, because it does not pay to pick them. One man says it costs $1.10 a bushel to pick peas and market them and the best offer he could get at the market was $1.25 a bushel, and yet the grocers are charging 70 cents a peck; this is $2.80 a bushel. I understand that the least kale sells for is 25 cents a peck, and last year the farmers around the steel plant plowed under their kale, canteloupes, and cucumbers; it would not pay to pick them for the prices they would get at the markets. You might wonder why these farmers don't sell to the little grocers instead of taking them home and feeding them to the hogs. I understand that the small grocer is afraid to buy from the farmers for fear that they will be blacklisted by the large markets. I think that this is a matter that ought to be looked into.

Why not allow these farmers, they being producers, to peddle their porducts to the consumer direct and not hold a high license over his head in order to do so?

In the city of Milwaukee, my home town, and in fact many other cities, they are only too pleased to permit farmers to deliver direct to the consumer. This also ought to be looked into.

I shall try and keep you posted on such matters as soon as I can get a line on same.

Hoping that this is the kind of information you want, I am,
Yours, very truly,

WM. J. CARY.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM,
OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 26, 1917,

On the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted Members of the House to extend remarks in the RECORD I include a letter received by me from the Baltimore Federation of Labor, as follows:

BALTIMORE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Baltimore, Md., June 25, 1917.

Hon. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I am directed to respectfully advise you that the Baltimore Federation of Labor is very anxious to see the Lever food bill passed before July 1, as we feel that this measure will eventually be the means of lifting the burden of the high cost of living from the workingman and his family.

We sincerely trust that you use your influence in behalf of its passage. Accept our kindest regards.

Respectfully, yours,

HENRY F. BROENING,
Secretary Baltimore Federation of Labor.

Food and Fuel Control.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD COOPER, OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. COOPER of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to represent in this House a district in West Virginia that produces almost one-half of the coal produced in the State, and, as you are aware, West Virginia is second only in the production of coal to the great coal-producing State of Pennsylvania. Any law written upon the statute books in any way affecting the fuel supply of the Nation will, of necessity, be felt in the district I represent in this House.

There are about 1,000 coal mines at this time in the State of West Virginia engaged in the production of coal, and many of them also in the manufacture of coke. Over 79,000,000 tons of coal were produced and over 2,000,000 tons of coke manufactured for the year 1916.

There are over 80,000 men directly engaged in the mining of coal in West Virginia.

The very life of the State depends upon the coal industry. Over $70,000,000 are annually paid out in pay rolls by the coal companies operating in the State. The welfare of the towns, cities, and villages is tied up and dependent upon the success of the coal business. Every single railway, except a branch of the Baltimore & Ohio Railway Co., was built into the State for the purpose of engaging in the transportation of coal, coke, and lumber. Over 400 lives are sacrificed annually in the coal mines of West Virginia in order that heat, power, and the light which reflects in this Chamber to-day may be given the Nation.

We do not deny the fact that during the past six months money has been made in the mining of coal in West Virginia and elsewhere, but we make the assertion that prior to 1917 if the banks of the State had called upon the coal companies of West Virginia to meet their obligations many of them would have been forced into bankruptcy. Year after year I have known managers of coal companies to be forced to go to the bank and borrow money to meet their monthly pay rolls. Confidence only in the superiority of West Virginia coal led them to continue to operate their properties and meet their pressing obligations.

A coal mine operating in West Virginia to-day, after an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and after years of unproductiveness, succeeding at last in placing the mine upon an earning capacity of 20 per cent to 30 per cent, must pay its income tax, its capital-stock tax, and its excess-profits tax before it will be allowed to pay a penny in dividends to its stockholders. The stockholders of a plant years ago went into a wilderness and by foresight, nerve, and energy risked all, and uncovered to the world the possibilities hidden away in the hills and mountains awaiting man's thrift and industry to uncover them. The property has been worked for years, the value of it reduced to the extent the coal has been mined—you can not mine your coal and have it, too.

In making fair allowances for fair earnings on the capital stock of such corporations it is necessary to figure the life of the property, and unless the dividends earned will pay a fair return on the capital invested and return the capital itself within the life of the property the investment would be considered a poor one, indeed. The danger of explosions in coal mining, which may at any moment wipe out forever the investment of the stockholders in a coal mine, must be taken into consideration when the question of fair earnings is considered. Surely a man who has been braving all, risking life, property, everything to make his business a success should be given equal and fair consideration by his Government.

We do not feel the coal business should be singled out for regulation by the Government any more than the steel business should be regulated. And it might be well to consider the regulation and fixing of the price of a bale of cotton if you are to fix the price of a ton of coal. Personally I have no great objection to a maximum price being fixed on the ton of coal, provided the price is fixed at the point of production and provided the price is fair and makes due allowance on account of a state of war, increased cost of production by reason of labor costs, and cost of mining materials, and the present inefficient labor supply, as the labor supply is not as efficient as it was prior to the war. With a constantly decreasing efficiency in the man power employed at the mine by reason of the increase in wages paid by the operator a condition will result finally in the factor which will fix the maximum production of a coal mine. If a miner can to-day in six hours earn, by reason of the increase in wages, as much as he earned prior to the war in eight hours, he will not, in my opinion, work longer than six hours, and will thereby reduce the production of all the mines in the country to that extent. Instead of an increased wage scale tending to increase production it will decrease production.

Failure of the fuel supply is not the result of failure to develop coal property. It is rather the failure of the railway companies to keep abreast with coal development and furnish the needed equipment to move the coal. Thousands of acres of the best coal in the world await development in West Virginia. Only 2 per cent of the available coal of West Virginia has been mined. The coal supply of the State has scarcely been scratched.

It has been clearly demonstrated within the past year that after all production and consumption regulate prices. Whenever an article is scarce the article is high; potatoes are scarce and potatoes are high. Corn is scarce and corn is high; wheat is scarce and wheat is high, and even coal has not increased in price to the consumer much more than wheat has increased, and part of the increased cost of coal is due to the fact that everything which goes into the production of a ton of coal has increased in value, in many cases much more than 100 per cent. I deny the assertion that any attempt has been made by the coal people to restrict the output of coal. In my State, which is the second largest coal-producing State in the Union, the production of coal increased last year over 15,000,000 tons. The production has not decreased, but the consumption has increased faster than the production, and this in the face of the fact that the coal operators have expended millions in the improvement of their plants and the opening of new operations.

I believe I can state the reason for the present shortage of coal. You will remember in 1914 the coal production of the country was in bad shape. Business all over the country was at a low ebb. While the cotton growers were pleading with the people to buy a bale of cotton to keep their business from being destroyed many of the coal operators were pleading with the people to buy a ton of coal to keep their mines from closing down. Many mines closed, and not until after the war was declared did they reopen. As soon as the war came and the munition plants started to work there was an instant demand for fuel. Heavy contracts were taken by the coal people from the allies, many of the contracts at low figures. Soon plants started their mills on three shifts of eight hours each. Immediately these plants consumed three times the amount of fuel they consumed when working on a single shift, and the demand for coal became more heavy. The manufacture of munitions required the service of thousands of railroad cars, both to haul the rough material to their plants and to transport the finished material to the seacoast. In a short time a serious car shortage occurred, and the mines suffered the loss of the coal cars which should have been kept in the coal trade. Mines capable of loading 20,000 tons per month were reduced to a tonnage of 15,000 tons per month, as the car service was restricted. Prices of coal immediately increased. The plant which had contracted for its supply to run on an eight-hour basis and was attempting to run its plant 24 hours a day went into the market and offered high prices to secure the additional tonnage required. Coal operators having sold their coal, many of them for a period of years, at low prices naturally undertook to secure the higher prices when the contracts expired. Many coal companies still with long-time, low-price contracts on their books, some of which were constantly expiring held their coal for prices which would in the aggregate net the mine a fair margin of profit for its product.

The cost of production increased with the heavy demand for coal. Labor costs increased in the Pocahontas coal field at least 35 per cent. The restricted tonnage by reason of the failure of transportation caused thousands of men to seek employment elsewhere. Many of the men went to the munition plants, the plants that are working from 16 to 24 hours a day. The great Du Pont powder plant located at Hopewell, Va., a city constructed almost in a night, has been working their plant since the war on three eight-hour shifts. This plant consumes great quantities of Pocahontas coal, a consumption entirely new to the field. Highest wages are paid at the plant, and the labor used about this plant has been drawn to a great extent from the coal fields or from the section of the country the Pocahontas field depended upon to get its labor supply. Agencies to furnish labor have sprung up all over the country, and the coal operators have expended thousands of dollars attempting to bring men into the field with which to work their mines. Neighbor bidding against neighbor for men has occurred and is still occurring daily, and this results in great loss of energy from the loss of time consumed in miners moving from one plant to another. Every man is constantly looking for and receiving offers of better jobs. The unrest of labor is apparent, the high cost of living contributing to this unrest to a certain extent.

Material has increased in many cases over 100 per cent.

Taxes have increased materially, as all the coal companies are incorporated and pay their excess-profit taxes and income taxes, besides a heavy increase in the State taxes.

A system of guarding the coal plants has also sprung up. Attempts have been made to destroy some of the largest coal tipples in the Pocahontas field and practically all the operating companies have found it necessary as a matter of precaution to place heavy guards at the tipples, fans, power houses, and in some cases even in the coal mines, establishing a patrol of the entire coal plant. This all adds to the cost of a ton of coal. Recently the Interstate Commerce Commission allowed the railroads to increase the freight on coal. This also adds its mite to the final cost.

I am not upholding any operator who attempts to exact exorbitant profits. I am not in favor of the operator who holds his coal free from contract and forces the consumer to pay holdup prices. It can be said to the credit of the operators of the Pocahontas coal field that they are living religiously up to contracts. Coal contracts are usually made from year to year, from April 1 to April 1, and in many cases are made for a period of five years. I have in mind now a contract I closed myself four years ago with the Milwaukee Gas Co. for five years, and which runs until April 1 of next year, for 400,000 tons. The price for the coal sold under that contract netted the mine far less than $1 per ton. This contract has been filled each year, and we are now making the last year's shipments upon this low-price contract. All contracts are being conscientiously filled, operators standing a big loss upon every ton of coal shipped upon them; and, as an operator writing me the other day about these old contracts said:

> Manifestly, if we are to continue in business, this loss must be made up out of prices now prevailing, which prices are the result entirely of supply and demand; but it must be remembered that wages at least have been voluntarily increased; that supply and demand has made prices which permitted this.

The West Virginia operators may be accused and abused, but no man can accuse them of failing to live up to the sacred obligations of their contracts; and I contend it is unfair to ask them to fill their old contracts at ruinous prices and deny them the privilege of now selling their coal at prevailing prices.

I insert herewith a telegram received to-day from Hon. Wells Goodykoontz, president of the State Senate of West Virginia, and which in clear language gives the reasons for the high prices of coal:

Press dispatches say that the Federal Trade Commission recommends that the Government take over coal mines and operate rail and water transportation. It is time for Congress to call a halt upon the wild plans of a lot of men who have lost their heads. The Government has already enough to do without invading the fields occupied by men and corporations engaged in th pursuits of civil life. If the step mentioned is taken, where will it end? It will only end when every activity of private life has been absorbed; coal, oil, gas, iron, cotton, rice, corn, wheat, lumber, and all else will come within bureaucratic control; manufacturing, agriculture, seafaring, and commerce will become bound hand and foot by officeholders ignorant to the same extent they think themselves wise. What is the trouble with the coal business? The facts are these: The present high prices have stimulated the greatest possible activity in the production of coal; little mines are being opened and coal hauled in wagons and loaded into railroad cars on commercial sidings. Thousands of acres are ready for development. The sole and only trouble is the lack of railroad ars. The railways have been allowed to increase their rates under promise to buy new equipment, but the new equipment has not been forthcoming. Let the Federal Commerce Commission compel the railroads to supply additional equipment to open sidings for new development and to require railroad officers and agents to dispose of their stock in coal-mining companies and coal-selling agencies, and it will not be long until the price of coal will recede to its normal figure. We do not want this country Germanized.

Lack of transportation for coal, in my opinion, is the real cause to-day of the high prices of fuel. The production of coal for 1916 in the Nation increased over 66,000,000 tons over the year 1915, and, in my opinion, the production of 1917 will show a big decrease over 1916, unless the railways adopt a better system of handling their transportation of coal. I have before me reports from eight coal companies in West Virginia in which I am interested, which show that for the first five months of this year there is a net shortage of 71,915 tons of coal and 5,411 tons of coke as compared with shipments for the same months in 1916. The car supply has been the worst we have experienced in years; operators begging for cars, men demanding work, and customers threatening litigation unless contracts were complied with, and no transportation to give relief at the point of production or consumption.

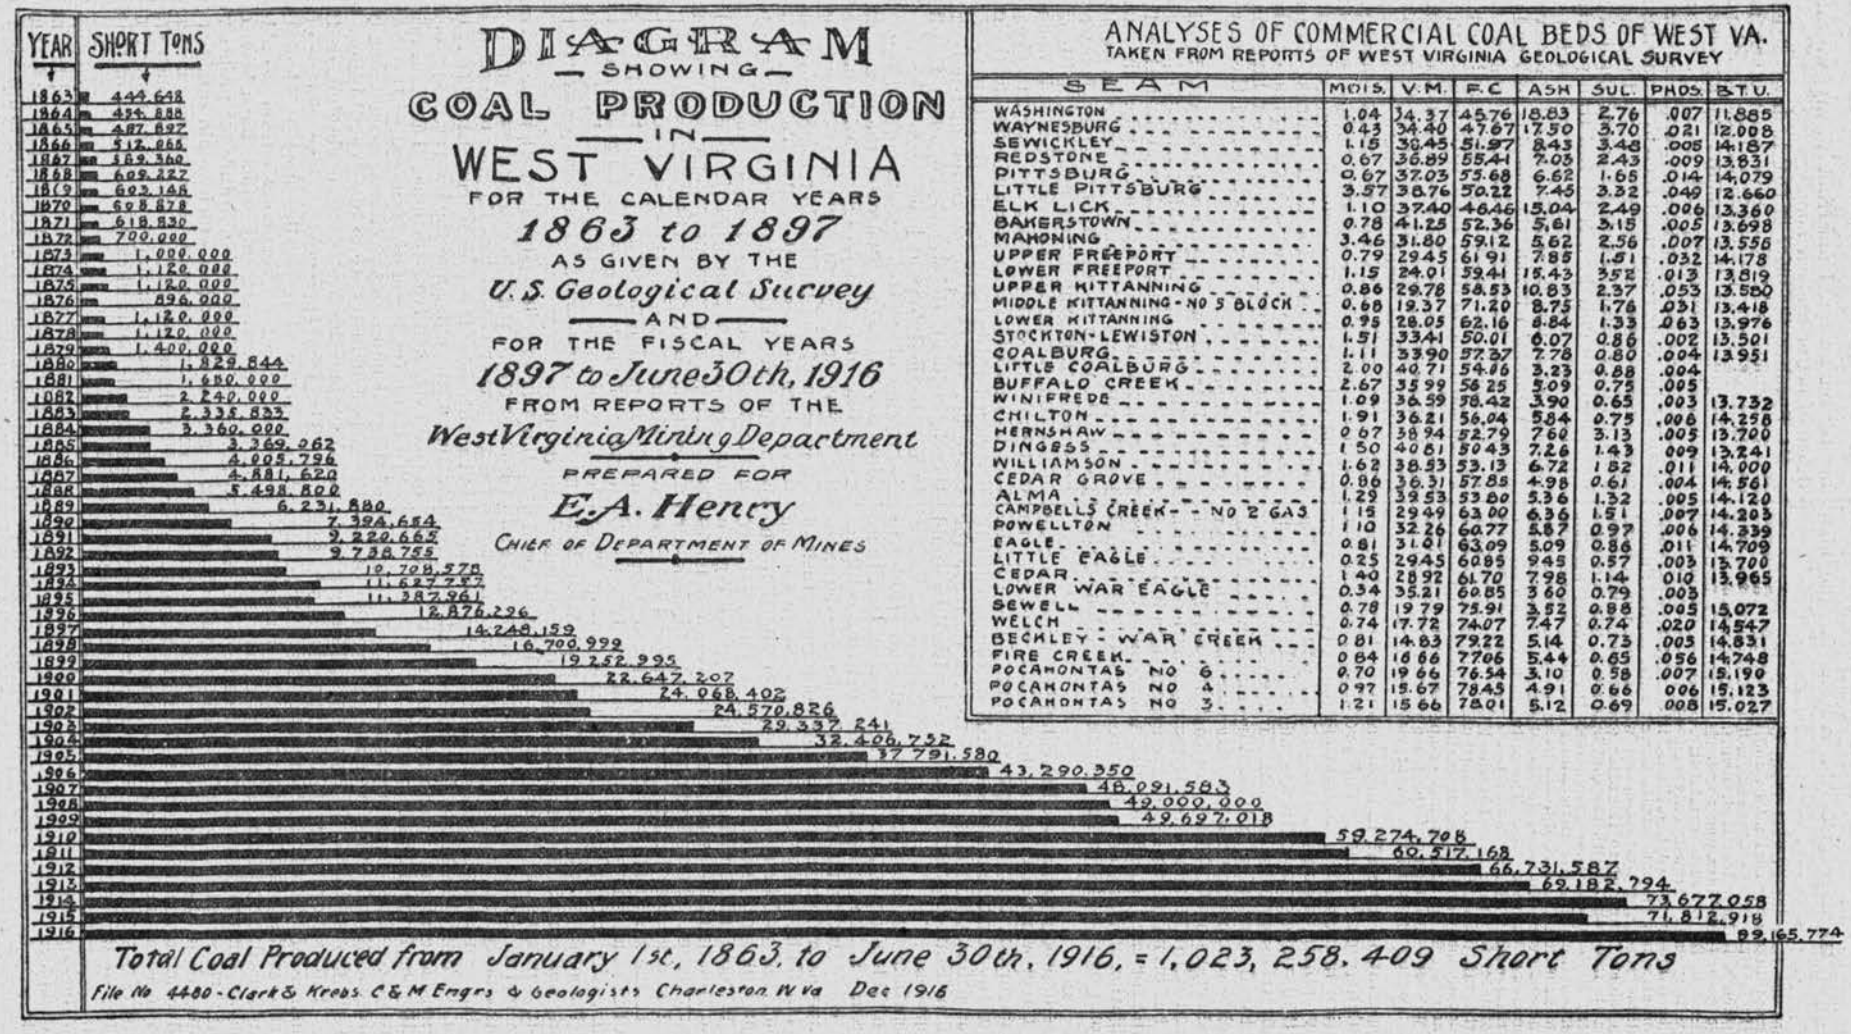
If the decrease in production above indicated is general all over the State, and I feel warranted in assuming it is, then we are forced to the conclusion, there being 1,000 mines in the State, the production of the first five months of 1917 as compared with 1916 has decreased 9,000,000 tons; at this rate of decrease the shipments from the State for 1917 as compared with 1916 would be 20,000,000 tons less.

The new operations in the State developed since 1916 will make up some of this shortage, but the facts remain that there is a heavy decrease in the production of the existing collieries and cars which could and would have been loaded by the existing collieries have been diverted to the new collieries. Instead of new cars being built by the railroads of the State for the new development, few additional cars have been added to the equipment of the railroads, and those already in business have been compelled to remain idle while new operations were given a proper share of the available equipment. To open new mines will not give any relief. New development only hinders car service. Quicker and heavier loading could be secured by closing down some of the small mines, but this would not be practical or fair to the small shipper. A production of 125,000 000 tons per year is easily within the limits of the mines of West Virginia producing coal to-day. Give the mines of West Virginia an adequate and certain car supply and the coal operators of West Virginia will not fail the Nation in its hour of need. We have never had a chance to show what we can do, and long for the opportunity and wait the hour when we can show to the world what can be accomplished in producing tonnage from the mines of West Virginia. The Nation will be given quick relief in needed coal, and, production being greater than consumption, will soon force prices to normal.

Statements received show that for the month of January one of the above-mentioned mines worked an average of 18 days; February, 12 days; March, 18 days; April, 15 days; and May, 17 days. The performance at this mine is about the average performance of the whole Pocahontas district, as the allotment of cars is on the loading-capacity basis. This restriction of tonnage caused by failure of transportation is, in my opinion, responsible for the increase in the cost of fuel to a very large extent. The small number of operating days increases the cost of production at the mine; the same overhead charges have to be paid whether the production is great or small. A mine's ability to increase production is also dependent upon the car supply. Miners will not remain at a mine unless given a reasonable number of working days each month, and certainly no new labor can be secured unless work is promised.

We have from time to time noted the rulings handed down by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Council of National Defense, having for their purpose the expedition of shipments; but so far, I am frank to say, we can not see any evidence of better coal-car supply.

Mr. Speaker, the price of coal to-day is fixed by the consumer, the consumers bidding against each other, and this, due to a shortage of coal, primarily caused by the great transportation companies of this country being unable to handle the freights of the country, and, secondly, on account of the increased consumption caused by munition plants working from 16 to 24 hours per day and thereby requiring two and, in many cases, three times as much coal as they heretofore required. This unprecedented demand has continued for the past year or more and can only be met by full transportation of coal. West Virginia can easily increase the production of coal 25,000,000 tons per year, and do it now. A full car service at the mines in West Virginia, without the opening of another mine, will give the Nation at least 25,000,000 more tons of coal for 1917 than we produced in 1916. We increased our production over 15,000,000 tons in 1916 over 1915, and with a full car supply can readily increase the production over 1916 25,000,000, and this in face of the fact that one-half of the year of 1917 is gone. The commissions established here for the purpose of doing things can get results, and get results quickly, if they will give coal the right of way, and give us cars; cars and more coal cars at the mines; and the price of coal will within a few weeks drop less than $2 per ton at the mines. Recently the railroads were allowed to increase their rates on the plea that they needed new equipment. They are taking the increased rates, but their service is demoralized and the new equipment is not yet in sight.



The 1,000,000 men who are to-day employed in the coal industry of the Nation, furnishing over 60 per cent of the freight traffic of the country, which coal furnishes the power to drive the wheels of industry, are under the management of as intelligent class of men as we have in this country. Temporarily, the price of fuel is high; but when we think of the long, long, lean years which have marked the life of the coal industry of the country we should remember it is due to the low price of coal that has cost the lives of over 3,000 coal miners per year, and this sacrifice is in the main due to the consumer, who has driven a hard bargain for his fuel supply. Low prices for coal cause low efficiency in operation and low wages to the miner, thereby reducing the standard of wages we all boast about when talking to the toilers at home.

Government control, regulation, and even operation of coal mines are offered as a cure for the present high fuel prices. I would like some man to tell me what branch of public service the Government operates cheaply? Has it not rather been the experience of the public that under Government operation extravagance and waste prevail? The men in charge of the coal plants of the Nation, as a rule, are men who have grown up in the business. They have in many cases been promoted to managers after serving their time as trapper boys, mule drivers, coal diggers, mine foremen, and superintendents. Many of them are mining engineers. Their mines are laid out and operated with a care equal to the operation of a railway. In order to produce maximum efficiency no attempt is made for a great number of years to produce large quantities of coal. A small tonnage is rather preferred in order to conserve the property and in the end show a 90 per cent recovery of the available coal in the mine.

Mine maps are looked upon with pride by competent and careful managers. It is not altogether the amount of money earned from a property, which is the aim of the careful mine manager, but rather how few tons of coal have been destroyed in the operation of the mine, and the low percentage of loss of life per ton of coal extracted from the mine, that is the pride of the manager.

To turn over to the Government of this Nation the operation of the coal mines of the country would simply result in ruin to the largest industry we have. We all believe in conservation of property, but this would mean absolute destruction of properties. The men appointed to take charge of and operate the properties would feel called upon to show their ability to do things at once; no regard whatever would be taken of the future. Properties to-day which have been developed under a system looking only to the future for profits would be subjected to a system of hogging which would in a few months make the property utterly worthless as a paying mining proposition. The work of thousands of the best mining men of our country, who have spent years in development and study of their particular mines, would be sacrificed to the greed of the appointee to show quick production.

I realize the fact it is America against Germany; that we are at war and must win at any and all cost; but as careful business men let us not attempt to do something by legislation which in the end can not be but a complete failure in practice.

EARL A. HENRY.

The Speculator is the Food Pirate and Not the Farmer.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, food regulation in this country is an unexplored field and there must be the exercise of wisdom as well as caution lest great injustice be done the producer and the program fall short of relieving the consumer. The bill seems to be one of much useless if not meaningless verbiage, and possibly in some places confusing if not incomprehensible. It is needless to further discuss what we are going to do about conserving our alleged present supply of foodstuffs, for there is no reserve in the country. That long since left the hands of the producers and was shipped to the allies in Europe. What we have to deal with in a practical way is the crop now producing and soon to be harvested, and not with what it has been stated we have, for we do not have a surplus beyond our own immediate needs. Just so the provisions of this bill strike at the root of the trouble and bring about lower prices for products necessary to sustain human life, which we all believe, if efficiently and properly administered, will begin and end with the speculator and the man who hoards. Furthermore, it will in nowise affect the farmer, who has not been getting anything like the prices charged the ultimate consumer on account of the avarice of the speculator. It is all a very short horse to curry and the bull's-eye of the situation is plainly visible, only by this legislation we want to get the right man and get him speedily—and that man is not the farmer but the food speculator, the pirate who fixes prices.

I wish to file with my remarks two articles I recently contributed to the Lewisburg (Pa.) Saturday News:

PLACING THE BLAME.

Referring to our files of 25 years ago, we find that at that time butter was selling in the retail markets at 24 cents per pound, eggs 24 cents per dozen, lard 10 cents per pound, potatoes 40 cents per bushel, ham 14 cents, shoulder 10 cents per pound, sides 10 cents, and flour 70 cents per one-eighth barrel. Ten years previous to that time butter was selling for 12 cents per pound and eggs sold for 10 cents per dozen.

The above sounds quite reasonable when compared with the prices of these commodities to-day or as given before the Senate committee on Tuesday by "Some Hoover," as the much-vaunted food dictator has been characterized by Senator REED, the Democratic antifood-price legislator in the upper branch of Congress. Hoover does not go back 20 years to find what has been done by the middlemen, or food pirates, but compares to-day's prices with the prices prevailing four months ago, and he figures the increase to be 51 per cent. This increase is on top of a still greater increase which took place following the campaign of 1912, when the Democratic slogan was, "We'll bring down the cost of living."

There can be no question about a piratical sort of regulating now going on to keep prices at the highest point the people can pay for something to eat, and it is just as certain that the farmer who actually raises the produce has not been getting even a share of this increase commensurate with the increase in the cost to him of producing foodstuff during recent years, and especially since the war started and the munition factories have commandeered all excess labor at high wages.

To win the war the people are ready to go on short rations and suffer in many ways, but the mistake should not be made in this regulatory program with respect to consumption by striking at the wrong end of the dilemma—the farmer. The farmer should be protected in his rights to the benefits of a war-stimulated market, while the increased cost of production must be taken into consideration just as all this is given allowance in every other branch of business. But the farmer is not the man who needs regulating, for he pretty generally sells when he can get a reasonable profit.

The fellow to hit, and hit hard, is the food speculator, the man who buys wheat at $1.25 and holds it in the elevators for a dollar profit, and the man who buys milk at 5 cents per quart and sells it over the city restaurant counter at 40 cents per quart. The same chap also gets hold of the beef, pork, lamb, and lard supply and the public gets the squeeze and the farmer unjustly gets the blame.

If the President and Hoover are earnestly after the speculator and middlemen, then let them go to it, and Heaven will bless them in their efforts to reduce the cost of living; but if they design to regulate the farmer they will miss their mark, discourage production, and lead us into more trouble than "keeping the country out of war."

"REMITTANCE MEN" COULD PRODUCE AN ABUNDANCE OF FOOD.

Although England is being harassed on land and sea as never before in her brilliant history of conquest and ability to take care of herself by alliance and otherwise, there are said to be in the United States at this time 500,000 British slackers, or as the English term designates them, "remittance men." When the war in Europe commenced to look serious these "remittance men" jumped the reservation and got as far away as possible from the trenches in France, coming here and locating in remote parts of British Columbia and other English dependencies where they receive remittances from home.

The New York American in an editorial of marked vigorous protest calls upon Great Britain to first conscript these slackers and hundreds of thousands more in England, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand before one American soldier be allowed to go to Europe to fight England's battles and thereby save not democracy but England's hereditary throne and feudal aristocracy. Since England has not invoked conscription to save herself, the American can not see the justice of sending conscripted American armies to the trenches when hundreds of thousands of Englishmen are available, and who, if they all went to the front, could beat down the Kaiser's forces and bring peace without the sacrifice of American man power.

This country has shown an eager willingness to help make the world safe and join in everywhere establishing the right of the people to rule. Money is pouring out and men are training for the final blow, and America will be felt in the cleaning up of Kaisers and despots of the so-called divine kind and all kinds, but right now the American believes would be a good time for England to get into the conscription business and bring back home to fight these 500,000 English "remittance men" in the United States, and a million or more in Canada and other British possessions, while America is preparing to save her from annihilation by Germany.

The allies alone are beaten, but the United States can save them and be at the council table when peace terms are made, and in such a commanding position as to give Italy, England, Ireland, Germany, Servia, and Greece their only chance of casting off their kings and royal privileged bosses. But there should be no "slacker" or "remittance" nations among those seeking this freedom or democracy, least among them once world-dominant and proud England.

THE DOOM OF MONARCHY.

The divine right of any man to control the action of any other man against his will is a fallacy which is riding to oblivion over the battle fields of Europe.

Lincoln's broad view of government is soon going to be realized in all the half-free countries of Europe. While England is far from being a despotism, the Empire is nevertheless an autocracy with hereditary rights and entailments, and is therefore only half free. It is the same with Germany, but with even more centralized power. Spain, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Holland, Bulgaria, and a few more are on this half-free and half-slave list. And it was Lincoln who said of this country that it could not endure half slave and half free. It was Dr. John Howard Harris, of Bucknell University, in presenting his inspiring theme under the caption of "The World's Spiritual Commonwealth," who declared that "in government if any are to be free and safe then all must be free and safe." This sentiment is as practical as it is immortal, and we see it working out to-day in the blood-soaked trenches of Europe.

There can be no continued or prolonged halfway business about self-government or individual sovereignty. The world is not going to absorb the ideas of centralized but liberalized power through the agency of limited monarchies or constitutional monarchies which the Cecil Rhodes and Andrew Carnegie free-scholarship funds only mask, and which are really a bribe to promote support among intellectuals. Truly a king who is subject to the will of a ministry or a parliament is merely a puppet, but where there is hereditary monarchy or kingship, with entailment laws and hereditary rights and privileges there you have aristocracy and autocracy and the plebeian under one government, and the class distinction is too apparent to admit of any argument on the subject.

This half-slavery business was brought about with the downfall of absolutism as a consequence of the French Revolution, and is a farcical compromise between the masses and the royal nabob bosses. But all this is apparently booked to climb from the royal perch with the crown and scepter relegated to the museum of novel and obsolete antiquities. This year the world is being reminded of what Martin Luther did about arbitrary power four centuries ago, and now for real freedom of thought and action there comes a renewed fascination, and for the foolish idea that a king can rule a people better than they can rule themselves the end seems near. We have seen all sorts of bespangled royalty in Washington during the past six months, and they are about the only down-and-out people we have little pity for. These world paupers coming to the great American democracy for help to prop up the tottering thrones of Europe was a wasted voyage, for after this war we predict another revolution that will upset and forever destroy every throne in Europe, beginning on the banks of the Thames and winding up on the Bosphorus and all around the Baltic Sea. The people are not going to ever again engage in such a war for they will not allow any privileged, divine right class to so shape affairs by false and fraudulent usurpation through the easy name of "limited monarchy," or "constitutional monarchy," as to make them the victims of secret treaties, and be led into the shambles for the holiday of brutal emperors, kings, and ministries.

The king-governed countries of Europe have been a failure in accomplishing equality for mankind, and they are doomed to an early and well-deserved eclipse. Then will follow freedom and genuine individual sovereignty which will supplant the inhumanity which has for ages caused the masses to bend under the burdens and sorrows imposed by self-appointed rulers.

Food Control.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MURRAY HULBERT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 27, 1917.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a telegram just received from the mayor of the city of New York:

NEW YORK, June 26, 1917.

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Without wise conservation of our food supply the people of New York City will find themselves in a difficult position next winter, which no amount of local effort will be able to correct. The welfare of the people of New York City will depend upon the application of a national program of food conservation. The government of this city will voluntarily cooperate with the National Government in every possible way, but I think it is highly important that the hands of President Wilson and his administration should be strengthened by the passage of the Lever bill.

JOHN PURROY MITCHEL, Mayor.

A Bill (H. R. 4961) to Provide for the Controlling and Distribution of Food Products and Fuel.

Statement of Hon. JOHN I. NOLAN, of California, regarding his attitude on the so-called prohibition amendments as well as the action of the committee in reference to the amendment proposed by Mr. KEATING exempting labor organizations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN I. NOLAN,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the Lever bill, H. R. 4961, because the time had come in this country, in my estimation, when the Government has to step in and protect the consumer from the food speculator and the food pirate. I have already expressed my views during the debate on this bill on this particular phase of the measure at some length. I wish to confine myself to section 13 of the original bill as reported by the committee and the so-called Barkley and Webb amendments. Originally the provision as reported by the committee, if adopted and passed by the House, would have placed in the hands of the President of the United States, as a war measure and for the purpose of conserving our food supply, the power to prohibit the use of grain and other cereals in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages which, in the judgment of those that have given this food-control question careful study, was as far as we should have legislated on this important question at the special session of Congress. We would have left this matter to the discretion of the President and the gentlemen having the administration of this important law in charge—the fair way, I believe, to settle the question of war prohibition—and we could safely have left the question of national prohibition to the determination of Congress in normal times, when the question of the submission of a constitutional amendment could be met fairly and squarely and every angle thoroughly debated and settled to the satisfaction of both sides.

This important question received little or no consideration when the so-called prohibition amendments were adopted by the committee. They were debated hurriedly and with only a few hours' discussion. The question of revenue was given no consideration at all. The average advocate of prohibition, whether in or out of Congress or whether in time of war or in time of peace, offers no substitute for the internal-revenue tax on wine, beer, and liquors, and while they might justify their position in normal or peace times they have no logical reason to advance for the wiping out of about $450,000,000 of revenue without any suggestion in the form of a substitute. The question that this House and the Senate will have to decide in a short time, provided the prohibition sections as passed by the House are adopted, is where this additional $450,000,000 of revenue is coming from. The Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate say they do not know. Will the prohibitionists tell us?

The people are staggering under high costs now, and they will be staggering under additional tax burdens shortly, and it looks as if these taxes will be direct and will fall on the shoulders of the consumers, who are getting little or no consideration now, and if the present condition continues along with the House provision contained in section 13 they will receive less, as undoubtedly there will be further effort made to raise taxes on the products that the ordinary man consumes, and this has already been started by levying taxes on tea, coffee, sugar, and other commodities.

The Lenroot amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is himself in favor of prohibition, would have exempted light wines and beer and confined the Barkley amendment to whisky and other distilled spirits. This amendment was defeated in Committee of the Whole by a few votes. I supported this amendment and was in hopes that it would carry. It would have given the people of this country an opportunity to have consumed beverages of very little alcoholic content and probably have gone a great ways during the war to eventually solve this liquor problem. The State of California was vitally interested in the Lenroot amendment, as the wine industry of our State, which represents an investment of $150,000,000, will be wiped out completely and without notice if the Barkley amendment prevails. One fact stands out in connection with the Lenroot amendment: At least two Members of the California delegation voted and worked against the adoption of this amendment. The vote upon it was close enough in my estimation to mean that the responsibility largely rests upon the shoulders of some of our delegation if the wine industry of California is destroyed.

Another matter to which I desire to call attention is that the committee decided to reject the amendment offered by Mr. KEATING, of Colorado, which would have guaranteed the labor organizations of this country the benefits of sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton antitrust law. When certain sections of the food-control bill were pointed out by the representatives of labor as being rather in conflict with sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton law, it was agreed that the bill was not intended to apply to labor organizations, and these gentlemen signified a willingness to have the Keating amendment adopted, as instanced by Mr. Hoover's letter to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture; but notwithstanding this fact, the chairman of the committee, Mr. LEVER, made a bitter fight against the adoption of the Keating amendment, taking the position that labor unions should not be exempted from the provisions of this act even though the provisions of the bill might conflict with sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton antitrust law. Note the difference in the treatment accorded the farmers' unions and organizations as compared with the treatment accorded the organizations of labor in this country. The farmers are guaranteed a minimum price for their commodities and are exempted from all the penalties, whether as individuals or combinations, so that the protection given the farmer in section 6 of the Clayton Act is preserved to him and his organization but denied to labor. In other words, the one individual who is protected from every angle in this bill and guaranteed is the farmer, but the same sort of protection is denied the worker when organized.

I have some hope that the Senate, in considering this measure, will correct this injustice as well as to take a broad view and legislate in a common-sense way in section 13 with relation to prohibition. I voted for this bill because I believe under Mr. Hoover's administration an honest attempt will be made to solve the present problem of high prices, and as this was the original intention of the bill, I supported it, despite amendments to section 13 and the disregard by the committee of the labor-exemption amendments.

Silt-Diversion Works at Los Angeles and Long Beach Harbors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY Z. OSBORNE,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 26, 1917,

On the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with leave granted to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I offer a few comments on the following paragraph of the rivers and harbors bill (H. R. 4285):

Los Angeles Harbor, Cal.: For maintenance, $25,000, and for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 896, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $50,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement; in all, $75,000. Such modification as may be recommended by the Chief of Engineers and approved by the Secretary of War for the plan of silt-diversion works adopted by the river and harbor act approved July 27, 1916, for the protection of Los Angeles and Long Beach Harbors, in accordance with the report printed in House Document No. 462, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, is hereby authorized, subject to the conditions set forth in said document: Provided, That such modifications shall not increase the total cost of the work to the United States.

In the extension of remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], published in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, upon the current bill, this item is criticized upon two grounds:

1. That it is a land-reclamation project.

2. That the improvement contemplates levees 15 miles inland, "to protect a community from surface water," in conformity with "plan D" of House Document No. 462.

Briefly, I will reply as follows:

As to the first claim, as heretofore I have stated on this floor, it has no foundation whatever, and the only argument that has been made in advocacy of that claim is based upon a misunderstanding of the nature of the project, which I shall shortly explain.

As to the second claim, it entirely is based on a misunderstanding. Instead of carrying out a project in conformity with plan D, which is vigorously opposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], the provision of the paragraph is for the exclusive purpose of permitting the Chief of Engineers, with the approval of the Secretary of War, to do away with plan D altogether and to substitute a new plan, which is fully set forth in Document No. 9, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session. The argument based upon the objectionable features of plan D is therefore not applicable to the proviso, which is directed to the rejection of that plan and the substitution of another which does away with those objectionable features.

The fact is that the legislation intended to affect silt diversion is not embraced in this bill at all, but is already a law. It was a part of the previous river and harbor bill, approved July 27, 1916. The only way in which this bill touches this subject is in this proviso, permitting a modification of this plan D, as stated.

The conditions at Los Angeles and Long Beach Harbors which necessitated their protection from silt brought down in seasonal floods, are as follows:

The Los Angeles and San Gabriel Rivers, which, with their tributaries, have their rise in the Sierra Madre Mountains, take their course southerly across the costal plain and discharge in the bays bordering the Pacific. Ordinarily their discharge is light, but quite frequently a year comes when there are extraordinary rainfalls, and these rivers carry an enormous volume of water, and, tearing out of their ill-defined channels, rip up the rich alluvial lands and bear millions of tons of silt into the bays along the ocean. A large part of this silt is discharged into Long Beach Harbor, but in seasons of very high water it breaks over into Los Angeles Harbor and deposits hundreds of thousands of tons of silt which later have to be dredged out at Government expense. These floods do not occur every year, but the Corps of Engineers estimate that upon an average it costs $80,000 per annum to remove the silt.

The Board of Engineers and the various district officers of the Corps of Engineers located at Los Angeles Harbor have devoted much consideration to means of obviating this recurring filling up of the harbor, and the matter was taken up with the local authorities of Los Angeles County. The people of the county were as greatly concerned about the ravages of the floods, in destroying lands and crops, as the Engineer Corps was disturbed about the harbor. This resulted in the formation of the Flood Control Board of Engineers, who formulated a plan to cover both objects. The county handles the floods down to a point where they naturally concentrate, at Dominguez, about 6 miles from the ocean. The National Government has nothing to do with the flood-control plan above that point. Below that point the Government project commences and comprises a straight channel to the sea, where the silt will be carried, avoiding both Los Angeles and Long Beach Harbors, thus avoiding in future the expenditure of $80,000 per year for dredging out silt.

The estimated cost is the same as that of plan D, the construction being more solid and the excavations more extensive than were required by plan D, which, however, was of two or three times greater length; the estimated cost being $1,080,000, of which $500,000 was appropriated in the bill of last year. A condition imposed was that the local authorities should provide rights of way for the project, build bridges, assume responsibility for all damages, and maintain the silt-diversion works after their construction. The estimated cost of these provisions are equal to the cost of the Government work. Los Angeles County called an election last fall and voted bonds to the amount of $4,450,000, of which $1,080,000 is for the purpose of meeting the conditions imposed in the Government appropriation. In addition, the Legislature of the State of California at its session last winter—a contest of the bond election having been instituted—made a provision to cover the Government condition and an immediate appropriation of $250,000, which is now available.

It will thus be seen that Los Angeles County, and not the National Government, is conducting the flood-control features of this necessarily combined project, and the Government expenditures are confined absolutely to the protection of the two harbors from shoaling and possible destruction by silt. A saving of $80,000 per year for dredging the annual accumulation of silt from Los Angeles Harbor alone would pay for the entire project in 14 years.

When the gentleman from Wisconsin and the minority of the committee assumed that "there were evidences of a reclamation scheme," I believe that they confused the county flood-control plan with the Government project. In fact, the acting chairman of the minority, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], absolved the silt-diversion project from the "reclamation-scheme" charge in his remarks on June 19, which were, in part, as follows:

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want particularly to address myself in the few minutes that I have to the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE]. The gentleman takes exception to certain statements made in the minority report. I have conversed with him and with other gentlemen from California in reference to that statement. I am inclined to think that the sentence to which he refers as applied to Los Angeles is somewhat of a confusion and was not intended by the writer of that portion of the minority report to refer to the project carried in this bill. I am very glad, indeed, as one of the signers of the minority report, to make this statement. I think it is due to the gentleman from California that I should make it.

* * * * * * * *

Therefore, so far as the statement in the minority report is concerned, so far as I had anything to do with signing it, I am glad at this time to have the opportunity of withdrawing any reference to either Richmond or to Los Angeles Harbor projects as they appear in the bill.

As to the relation between Los Angeles and Long Beach Harbors to the subject of national defense, it may be said that at the present time eight steel ships, of 8,800 tons each, have been contracted for by Gen. Goethals at Los Angeles Harbor, and are now in course of construction, besides several wooden ships. At Long Beach Harbor five submarines are now being built for the National Government. Los Angeles Harbor handles more lumber than does the port of New York or any other port in the United States. I sincerely believe that the preservation of such ports have a direct connection with the national defense.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

SPEECH
OF
HON. JOHN R. CONNELLY,
OF KANSAS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the magnitude of the power invested by this act, and I shall vote for it largely because it is a powerful measure and carries with it the potency to bring results. The conditions that demand the passing of some legislation are so pressing and so imperative that we can ill afford to hesitate. I appreciate that there is and has been much said about the high cost of living that has not been advisable to say, although it is a matter that comes very near to every citizen of moderate means in the country. In order to make their arguments forceful, some of the very able gentlemen who have spoken have predicted riots and revolutions and resistance to law. This is not a good argument to make in this Chamber, because of the few people who take such statements without understanding that they are meant largely as argument and not to be taken too seriously. I do not believe all that is said in the newspapers of the day about the actions and abuses of the food situation. I do not doubt that there have been some abuses, and I am in favor of such legislation as will make these abuses, such as they are, impossible. But there is a disposition in times like these for each fellow who writes, and each fellow who speaks, to say something more impressive about conditions than the other fellows who have written and spoken, and oftentimes actual practices, while bad enough, are made to appear even worse than they really are.

I feel that people will expect too much from the legislation that can be enacted here and will therefore be disappointed. Every thinking person knows that there are many reasons for high prices in foodstuffs and all other commodities other than the reason that speculators are engaged in the nefarious business of augmenting the evil. The world has more men engaged in destruction and fewer in the work of construction perhaps than at any time since history began. The work of organizing and equipping great bodies of men in the field for war activities demands the expenditure of vast sums of money. This money is raised and spent with less thought of prices than for the purpose of securing the things needful. There perhaps has never been a time in the history of the world, and certainly not in this country, when money was cheaper or greater in volume than it is right now. We are making an effort to get food and supplies to our allies, and some of this is being destroyed by the submarines of the enemy. The workmen from the farms and fields and gardens where the granaries of the world are to be replenished are lured away to factories and mills where higher wages await them than they can get on the farms. Last year's crops of materials out of which bread is made were much short of the normal, and the crop now just maturing gives promise of increasing this shortage several millions of bushels.

These are some of the things that increase the cost of living, and these things will continue to work on the economic condition regardless of any legislation that may be passed here.

I want to help pass this bill and any other bill that promises to relieve the people of moderate means and the poor people of the country from the burdens that are weighing heavily upon them; but I doubt the wisdom or the patriotism of trying to exaggerate the benefits that can be brought by legislation. It is the duty of every patriot to tell the truth to the people and ask them to meet conditions as they are to the best of their ability. In a recent issue of a leading newspaper it was announced that potatoes that were selling at retail for $3 per bushel were being bought a few miles away at half that price, and this was given as an argument that Congress should hasten food legislation. Of course, every thinking person knew that the statement was not true and that it was made with the sole purpose of creating discontent and a disposition to censure Congress among the people who happened to read such statements and who were credulous enough to believe them. The statement was corrected in a later edition of the paper, but it had created an impression in the minds of many that Congress was derelict and was to a considerable extent to blame. These are not good times for the activities of the demagogue. In times when the sentiments of the country are normal they do but little harm, but in times when it is essential that every patriot shall feel in his heart that he wants to be the best citizen and the most loyal patriot possible it is unfortunate that we have the few who try to sow the seeds of hatred and distrust of the Government in the hearts of good people by clamorous demands upon Congress for laws that are described as panaceas for all ills, when in fact there are no such laws, and by the very nature of things there can not be.

Mr. Speaker, in times of peace and quiet I have my doubts about the merits of some of the measures advocated by those who belong to other parties than the one that I choose to be a member of. I have always contended for certain principles and ideas that I believed were essential to the greatest good to the greatest number of my fellow citizens; but even in peace times I have never permitted myself to believe that men of other parties were not just as loyal, just as honest, and just as patriotic as were those who agreed with the ideas that I believed best. Now that we are in war, I know that the great people of the country, regardless of the party that they believe best serves them in government, are willing to lay these things aside until there is a better time to again take them up and contend for them. I am persuaded that the little partisan group of men in Congress and out of Congress are not representative of any great number of people.

I have listened with some regret to the efforts that have been made by the few here to array the country people and the city people against each other. Some have felt that this bill was made too favorable to the farmer, and that he is selected as the man for certain favors in this legislation. I represent almost purely a farming district. I represent, perhaps, as many organized farmers as any man in the House, and yet I have not received one letter from one farmer or farmers' organization asking for any legislation favorable to the farmer. They are not asking for the favors that would appear to be given them in this bill. A few weeks ago this Congress passed a law giving to the shipbuilders certain bonuses, which amounted to several millions of dollars, in order to persuade them to make greater efforts to prepare ships for this emergency. It was not intended as a gift by Congress, but it was considered a good way to get results. This bill tries to go to the farmer and give him some incentive to exert more energy with more assurance. It is not intended as a special favor to the farmer, and he is not asking for special favors. It is intended to make the food supply of the country more adequate and more certain, and it is unfortunate that some people who failed to question the motive of the Government in giving millions to the shipbuilders should have so readily discovered the evils in this bill which is directed to encourage the farmer.

The bill is intended to discourage the illegitimate charges of the food speculator. It is intended to shield the poor people of the country, who find that their ability to feed and care for themselves is becoming a matter of concern, and they believe that prices have been unduly increased by agencies that have sought to make profits out of the necessaries of life unduly. It is intended to discourage the activities of the fellow who would stand between the producer and the consumer and levy a toll that can not be defended in any of the legitimate transactions of trade. It is intended to encourage production and discourage price fixing. It has not been framed with the purpose of annoying people who are honestly engaged in producing or in the legitimate activities of distribution. Under its proper administration no honest man should be embarrassed and no crook should be shown mercy.

Mr. Speaker, there is little to be gained in such times as these by those who put in much time finding fault with the Government. It is probable that Congress will make mistakes and that the President will make mistakes. No Congress or President could fail to make a few. But I believe there is every disposition on the part of Congress to find out what is best and then to do it. I believe that the President has no ambitions other than that wholesome ambition to follow the convictions that he has formed, with an honest motive live the very highest life of a patriotic citizen. These are new conditions to every Member of Congress and to the President. They are called upon to sail uncharted seas and to travel along roads where no well-beaten path marks the course to pursue in their efforts to serve the country.

I am of the opinion that practically every Member of Congress, as well as the President, is striving to serve his country well. They should receive as little censure and their actions should be viewed with as great charity as is possible, and I have no doubt that this will be done. It is folly to expect that they will not make mistakes. Mistakes are made by those in authority as well as by those out of authority. It is the common lot of men to find that at times their judgment is at fault.

I have been impressed with the splendid loyalty of the people of the country. I believe that the average citizen is impressed with the gravity of the situation in which the country finds itself, and each one, almost without exception, wants to accord to his Government the full measure of loyalty. I believe that the heart of the people is true. They realize that this war means what every other war since the beginning of time has meant. It means sacrifice and suffering. It means hardships for the men in battle line and heartaches for the ones at home. It means misdirected energies and a concentration of responsibilities. But whatever it means, whatever the sacrifices necessary, the people will not fail. They will stand by the President and the flag with the hope that soon the war clouds will pass away never to return. If the sacrifices and sufferings that this war has brought to the stricken people of all the earth has for its ultimate aim the giving to every people upon every part of the earth the assurance that peace, once established, shall be for all times and peoples, if the sword when sheathed this time shall be drawn no more forever, if no nation or combination of nations shall be permitted to consider the peace that shall come at the end of this war as a mere truce—a breathing spell for the people to get ready for a greater war in the future, if the end of this holocaust of war shall mark the beginning of hope for mankind to be spared the curse of recurring conflict, then it will have served a purpose that will at least in part repay the blood and treasure that will be spent.

I shall vote for this bill because I believe it is the best bill that can be had at this time, and because I believe it will serve the good purpose of protecting the great majority of the poor people of the country, whether they live in city or country, upon whose shoulders must rest much of the burdens that will necessarily be heavy in the next few years.

Save the Food.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ISAAC SIEGEL,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the Lever food-conservation bill because of the necessity of the enacting into law as soon as possible of a measure that will tend to decrease the price of food in this country. It is, however, necessary that all our people economize in the use of food by not wasting it, and one of the suggestions along that line is contained in an essay written by one Moe Finkelstein, a lad about 13 years of age, who attends Public School No. 109, situated on East Ninety-ninth Street, Manhattan Borough, the principal of which is Edward J. McNally, and the district superintendent is Dr. James Lee, one of the best-known educators in the United States.

I quote the essay at length:

SAVE THE FOOD.

This is a vital issue in every country of the world to-day. The belligerent countries are in need, in danger of famine, and they look to America for help, but even America, with its 4,000,000 square miles of rich country and boundless natural resources, faces trouble unless we all do our little part toward preventing waste. What are some of the methods by which food waste may be reduced to a minimum?

Let us first consider the individual homes, where, after all, you will be expected to watch out.

Vegetable parts, such as potato peelings, outer tough cabbage leaves, tough parts of celery, which are ordinarily thrown away, should be put into the soup pot, and their flavor and valuable mineral salts used to improve the soup. Tops of beets make a delicious spinach.

Meat particles, such as bones and gristle, should be saved and used in soup or in other ways instead of being thrown into the garbage pail. Fats should not be thrown away. They should be carefully fried out and put day by day into the jar kept for fat alone. Fats are necessary to keep away tuberculosis.

Left-overs of vegetables and meats should not be discarded, but should be made into palatable salads by the addition of a few seasonings.

In regard to portions, we should take no more on our plates than we are able to eat. Nothing should be left on the plate, as that which is left must be thrown into the garbage pail.

As to bread, the fact that it is called the "staff of life" shows its importance. Until now the waste of bread in New York City was dreadful. It was a common sight to see big portions of bread—sometimes whole loaves—in garbage cans. People were willing to eat only fresh bread. Bread a day or more old was considered unfit and thrown out. This condition, however, has been changed. We all know that the harder and staler bread is the better bread for general health. Crusts or other small pieces of bread should be reduced to crumbs and used in a dozen different ways by the good housekeeper.

Even sour milk should not be thrown away. It should be used for the making of biscuits or johnny cake.

Let us next consider the preserving of foods for future use.

One way of preserving food is by canning. This has been done with fruits, meats, and vegetables on a large scale in our great canning factories, of which we have many in our own State. Agents who are paid by the Government are at present going around through the country teaching the women how to do canning on a small scale in their own homes. Thus the overflow of fine fruits and vegetables which can not be eaten in their season and must go to waste are saved for use during winter and early spring.

Another way of preserving food, and one which will probably be used more extensively than canning on account of the lack of tin, is that of dehydration, or drying. This is suggested for fruits and vegetables which are cut into parts and then air dried. This method draws out all the water. The dried product is then closely packed in air-tight cartons and kept indefinitely.

To-day America is trying to impress upon its children the fact that economy is a duty which we owe to all humanity. Therefore let us all remember to proverb: Waste not, want not.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

REMARKS

OF

HON. MURRAY HULBERT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 26, 1917.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, I am a thorough waterway man, because I have not accustomed myself to drinking anything else, except tea and coffee; and, in view of the action taken by the House last Saturday evening, I do not know any more appropriate place to say what I wish to than here now, and I hope that no Member will be so inconsiderate as to make a point of order that my remarks are not germane to the formal amendment to strike out the last word.

When the Lever food-control bill was reported by the committee I was in hearty accord with it and intended to support it. The adoption of the Barkley amendment, which I opposed, and the failure of the Lenroot amendment, for which I voted, however, proved to be an insurmountable barrier. I was unable to appreciate the logic contained in the proposition that we should forbid the utilization of food products for the distilling of liquor, brewing of beer, and making of light wines in order to conserve for shipment abroad to supply our allies, that they might convert, a part at least, into bass ale, Scotch and Irish whisky, and other alcoholic liquid refreshment and even export it back to us.

I am unwilling to ask the American people to make a sacrifice for the benefit of the people of any other country who have yet proven themselves unwilling to endure such a sacrifice upon their own imposition; and so, while I was in full sympathy with the Lever food bill, I could not conscientiously support it when by the amendment referred to it was made a mask for prohibition, and hence I voted "present."

It is necessary that we have a contented, not a disgruntled, Nation.

The people of the city which I have the honor to represent in part subscribed more than one-half of the total liberty bond issue, whereupon this House attempted to saddle them with this ill-considered, destructive legislation, which, if it becomes a law, will entail a loss of untold millions to the taxpayers of New York City.

But it is to be hoped there is yet another day in the Senate.

The Food Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN Y. WEBB,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, in the great struggle which is now going on in the world in which we have taken part it is necessary that we conserve every force that we have in order that we may the more surely survive it.

One of the great demands made upon us is for food and feed. It becomes the first duty of America to make every provision possible to feed, not only our own people at home and our soldiers that have been and will be drafted into the service of the country, but also our allies who are jointly engaged with us in this war. This must be done by a wise and economical use of our resources to sustain life.

The prevention of waste at once suggests itself as the first problem that should receive our attention. This is equally desirable, whether the product is wasted by being converted from a food or feed product to a thing not useful in sustaining life, or is wasted by neglecting to use it for some useful purpose. Every pound of foodstuff that can be saved from waste will add that much to the sustaining power of the Nation.

The fight against alcoholic beverages has been going on too long, and the verdict of the citizenship of this Nation is too strong against it for me to stop to argue that foodstuffs used in their manufacture is a harmful waste of our resources. We would make ourselves ridiculous if in our great efforts to measure up to the needs of the hour we should overlook this great waste.

The common-sense view that the business world would take of such an oversight is well presented by the following letter from a man who evidently from his own statement is not strongly prejudiced against liquors as beverages, or for sentimental reasons. The following letter from Mr. R. J. Caldwell, of New York, is the one to which I refer:

NEW YORK, June 19, 1917.

Hon. EDWIN Y. WEBB,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to the President's call, I have organized facilities for the financing and harvesting of 800 acres of food crops, all of which are under way and progressing well. This effort on the part of so many is useless if the brewers and distillers are going to be permitted to continue the consumption of food products.

I am not an abstainer, but I recognize we are at war.

"A bushel saved is a bushel raised."

Faithfully, yours,

R. J. CALDWELL.

Prof. A. Caswell Ellis, of the University of Texas, in a recent article of great interest and value says:

The Nation's largest single waste is undoubtedly in the liquor traffic. The loss from the use of alcoholic beverages falls mainly under five heads: (1) The amount of foodstuff used in their manufacture and the human energy, the houses, and transportation facilities employed in the business; (2) the sickness and death resulting from the use of alcoholic beverages; (3) the lowered efficiency in work resulting from drinking by millions; (4) the crime due to drink; and (5) the waste of public funds due to debauchery in public office because of the liquor fight.

Food shortage is the great problem which our country must meet. It is proposed that we shall furnish food supplies not only for ourselves but for England, France, Italy, and the other nations fighting Germany. We are all urged to economize, to lick our plates clean, to peel the potatoes a little thinner, and the possibility of half rations may later stare us in the face. Under these circumstances it is unthinkable that our country would permit 3,603,911,916 pounds of grain and molasses to be manufactured into distilled spirits, which was the case in 1916, and in the year 1900, 2,260,266,146 pounds of corn, malt, and barley were manufactured into fermented liquors. A group of distinguished and reliable physiologists and economists in Harvard and Yale have conclusively shown that, taking out one-sixth of this 6,994,311,135 pounds of foodstuffs in the production of denatured alcohol, there is still left enough wasted materials each year to supply the energy requirements of 7,000,000 men for a year. The idea of permitting such a waste to go on under the circumstances is monstrous, and it seems to me that no sane people will permit its continuance. The article by Prof. Ellis, to which I have referred and which so clearly and forcibly presents the argument for this amendment, is as follows:

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES COST THE NATION MORE THAN THE SPECIAL WAR TAX—USE THE LABOR OF A MILLION MEN AND SEVEN BILLION POUNDS OF FOODSTUFF ANNUALLY.

To start out in a fight for life with a keg of beer strapped on your back is madness, no matter how much you enjoy a glass on occasion.

FAILURE TO STOP GREAT WASTE NOW IS TREASON.

The United States is face to face with a crisis in her own history and in the history of the human race. Whether government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall perish from the earth rests largely in our hands. Opposed to us is the greatest military and industrial machine the world has ever seen. For three years it has withstood the attacks of 20,000,000 brave men armed with all the weapons of science, adding each year new areas to its conquests, and to-day having in the field more men and equipment than ever before.

Seven million able-bodied men have already been killed and over 50,000,000 more are either in the trenches and training camps or are busy making munitions and army supplies. It is imperative that those left for the factories and field be brought to the highest possible efficiency, and that every useless expenditure of material and men be stopped at once. Failure to strip our Nation of its greatest needless handicap to efficiency as we enter this war would be a colossal mistake; to dodge the issue from cowardice or from selfish considerations is treason.

THE LIQUOR BUSINESS THE LARGEST SINGLE WASTE.

The Nation's largest single waste is undoubtedly in the liquor traffic. The loss from the use of alcoholic beverages falls mainly under five heads: (1) The amount of foodstuff used in their manufacture, and the human energy, the houses, and transportation facilities employed in the business; (2) the sickness and death resulting from the use of alcoholic beverages; (3) the lowered efficiency in work resulting from drinking by millions; (4) the crime due to drink; (5) the waste of public funds due to debauchery in public office because of the liquor fight.

THE FOOD WASTE.

The internal-revenue reports for 1916 show that 3,603,911,916 pounds of grain and molasses went that year into distilled spirits, and the census of 1900 (Vol. V, p. 602) shows that 2,260,266,146 pounds of corn, malt, and barley went that year into fermented liquors. The 50 per cent increase from 1900 to 1916 in the amount brewed would make 3,390,399,219 pounds as the amount used for fermented liquors in 1916.

A group of the most distinguished and reliable physiologists and economists in Harvard and Yale have shown that, after taking out one-sixth of this 6,994,311,135 pounds of foodstuff to produce denatured alcohol, there is left enough wasted food material each year to supply the energy requirements of 7,000,000 men for a year.

Why should we waste this enormous food supply and then ask the women to peel the potatoes a little thinner and force millions of poor women and children to go on half rations?

Is such saving drops at the spigot while wasting a stream at the bunghole a reasonable act?

THE MEN AND MATERIAL WASTED.

But the waste of foodstuff is only the beginning. The Other Side (Apr. 2, 1917), published by the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association, gives 1,600,000 as the number of wage earners employed in the liquor business in the United States. The recent advertisement by the brewers states that hundreds of thousands of men are employed by them alone. I can not vouch for the reliability of these figures, but if even half that many, or 800,000 men, are working in the alcoholic-beverage business, they are badly needed now in the new places created by the war and those that will be left vacant by the 2,000,000 men who are going to the trenches. We are short of clerks, accountants, carpenters, brick masons, building material, freight cars, teams and wagons, autos, industrial alcohol, and glass jars. Our Nation needs now for more useful service to humanity not merely the 7,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuff worse than wasted but the hundreds of thousands of men, distilleries, breweries, warehouses, stores, freight cars, autos, teams, wagons, and tons of glass now used up in the manufacture, distribution, and sale of alcoholic drinks.

$1,750,000,000 PAID OVER THE BAR EACH YEAR.

No one knows exactly how much society pays difectly for the support of all this army of men and billions of pounds of material and equipment employed in the liquor business. The lowest estimate made by a responsible party, and based on accurate revenue reports, of the amount paid by our Nation over the bars for alcoholic drinks is $1,750,000,000, or almost exactly the value of the average corn crop of the Nation, and nearly three times the value of an average cotton crop at 10 cents a pound. It is more than the amount of the special war taxes for the year. As it has been shown clearly by disinterested scientific men that even the little food value of the 2 ounces of alcohol that the body can use in a day is in nearly every case more than made up for by bodily wastes produced by the presence in the body of alcohol, this vast sum is just as completely wasted by the Nation as if we used all those hundreds of thousands of men and myriads of tons of food and equipment in shoveling sand on the beach to the right all the morning and then back to the left again all afternoon for the period of the war. Is that the act of intelligent beings?

COST OF SICKNESS AND DEATH RESULTING FROM ALCOHOL.

But what we are doing is worse than paying two billion a year for shoveling sand on the beach. We are allowing the sand to be shoveled into the organs of our bodies and the wheels of industry. Sixty-eight thousand men and women (valued at $1,700 each, or a total of $116,000,000 worth) die in the United States each year from diseases produced by alcohol. The records of 43 American insurance companies from 1885 to 1908, covering 2,000,000 policyholders, show a death rate in excess of the average for very moderate drinkers of 18 per cent, for those occasionally drinking to excess of 50 per cent, and for heavy drinkers of 86 per cent. A number of large separate companies here and abroad have recently published results of their experience that are more striking even than the above. (See Atlantic Monthly, Nov., 1916.)

Similarly, the reports of the South Australian sick benefit societies show that societies admitting both drinkers and nondrinkers have 92 per cent more cases of sickness per member than do societies admitting only abstainers, and that the members remain sick, on the average, 70 per cent longer. The records of the Leipsic sick benefit societies show that between 25 and 45 years of age habitual "drinkers" were sick $2\frac{7}{10}$ times as often as the average insured person. American, English, and other records show similar facts. One-fourth of our insanity (costing $40,000,000 per year) and probably one-fifth of feeble-mindedness are due to alcohol. Also every commission that has investigated vice has reported alcohol as responsible for a large part of moral debauchery and probably over 50 per cent of venereal disease. Half of the houses of shame in Cincinnati actually had to close for want of support when the selling of alcoholic drinks was forbidden in all such places. Laboratory experiments have clearly shown that minute quantities of alcohol in the blood lower the powers of the blood serum and blood corpuscles to resist the germs of many diseases. These and numerous other similar facts make it very conservative to say that 10 per cent of the preventable disease of the Nation is due to the use of alcoholic beverages. As our annual loss from preventable disease is admitted to be $1,500,000,000, this means that at least $150,000,000 is wasted by us each year through diseases caused by alcohol.

$600,000,000 WASTED THROUGH LOWERED WORKING CAPACITY.

No one knows exactly how much the productive capacity of the Nation is lowered by reduction of working power in moderate drinkers when not sick. Tests made by unbiased scientists in Germany and Switzerland showed that even as little as two to four mugs of beer a day cut down the work done by moderate drinkers 8 per cent in setting type, reduced the number of hits made in army rifle practice seven-eighths, and increased the time required for heavy mountain marches 22 per cent. Memory power and higher mental activities were reduced 40 per cent or more, although in this and in the simple activities the subjects thought they were doing better when under the influence of the alcohol. Numerous studies made in school and factory work have shown that alcohol usually reduces working power considerably and increases accidents and the destruction of material. While there may be some exceptions to the rule, it is certainly a safe estimate to assume that moderate drinkers are, on the average, 10 per cent less efficient because of alcohol. If one person in five is a moderate drinker, then 2 per cent of our national efficiency is destroyed by alcoholic beverages. The products of human efficiency on farms, and in mines, factories, etc., in the United States are worth about thirty billion per year. Two per cent of this, or $600,000,000, is therefore the price we pay in lowered efficiency for using alcoholic beverages very temperately.

$300,000,000 WASTED IN CRIME.

Conservative estimates by well informed men place the cost of crime in the United States at $600,000,000 per year. The lowest estimate made of the part of this crime due to alcohol is 30 per cent and the highest is 70 per cent. Probably about 50 per cent, or $300,000,000 worth, is the amount of crime due directly or indirectly to our toleration of alcoholic drinks.

UNKNOWN MILLIONS WASTED THROUGH DEBAUCHERY OF PUBLIC OFFICE.

While we have many worthy officials, both pros and antis, who are well prepared for the duties of their offices, it is painfully obvious that hundreds of millions of money and invaluable opportunities for development of our resources are wasted by officials elected not for their fitness for the office but because either of their friendliness for or hostility to the liquor interests. This will continue as long as any considerable body of voters is left who attack the saloons, and it looks as if such a body will continue at least for the period of this war.

TOTAL PRICE PAID FOR HAVING ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES.

For the privilege of using alcoholic beverages indiscriminately, then, we are paying each year this price:

The labor of about a million men; 7,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs; houses, land, transportation, etc., all to the value of	$1,750,000,000
68,000 men and women killed by alcohol	116,000,000
Sickness produced by alcohol	150,000,000
Lowered efficiency in work due to alcohol	600,000,000
Crime due to alcohol	300,000,000
Debauchery in public office
Total yearly cost of alcoholic beverages	2,916,000,000

This is nearly double the amount of the special taxes asked for the support of the war for the first year. Can any rational man justify the waste during this emergency of three billion a year, including the use of 7,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs and the labor of a million men, merely in order that drunkards may have better opportunities to get drunk and moderate drinkers may lower their working efficiency with greater convenience?

WHAT CAN BE DONE?

Plainly the manufacture, distribution, and sale of alcoholic beverages ought to be stopped at once. The property employed in the business and the stock of liquors on hand should be taken over by the Government immediately and paid for at a price that is fair to the owners as well as the public. Every reasonable help should also be extended to those now employed in the business in finding promptly another employment. Such a plan would really benefit all concerned, as it would give the liquor men the only chance they are likely ever to have to dispose of their property before it is confiscated. On the other hand, the Government can now, with comparative ease, find a use for most of the distilleries, breweries, and other equipment in making munitions, industrial alcohol, and other supplies urgently needed. The supply of liquors on hand could be converted into munitions or sold for medical purposes as seemed best. In this way neither the liquor men nor the public will suffer seriously, while the Nation will step up on a plane of vastly higher efficiency in this war and in the peace that will follow.

A. CASWELL ELLIS,
The University of Texas.

The great majority of the Christian and temperance people of this Nation are demanding of us that we conserve the Nation's strength by preventing its being used up in the form of alcohol for beverage purposes, not alone because they are for prohibition, but because they believe this will help solve the food problem now confronting us.

The Antisaloon League of America, through Dr. Edwin C. Dinwiddie, the superintendent of its national legislative committee, has set forth briefly the things that they hope that this Congress will bring about in a letter dated June 22, 1917, a copy of which has been sent to each Representative in this Congress, and is as follows:

NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
THE ANTISALOON LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1917.

MY DEAR SIR: Believing that we represent the earnest hopes and desires of an overwhelming majority of the Christian and temperance forces of our country—and multiplied thousands besides—we feel it is due that constituency and ourselves to set forth to our friends in Congress our position concerning war emergency prohibition.

We believe that both for the proper conservation of our foodstuffs and in order to increase and maintain the greatest degree of national efficiency in our Army and Navy and our producing population at home the Congress should, by direct legislation, provide—

First. That no foods, food material, or feeds shall be used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes during the period of the war.

Second. That in order to prevent, so far as possible, any further conversion of foodstuffs into intoxicating liquors, when same are needed for munitions, hospital, or industrial purposes, the President shall be authorized to commandeer any or all liquors in bond or stock for use or redistillation for governmental purposes.

Third. That under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe authority should be granted for the production of necessary alcohol or alcoholic liquors for legitimate scientific, industrial, pharmaceutical, sacramental, and all governmental purposes.

Fifth. That national prohibition of the manufacture, sale, and transportation of all intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes shall be enacted in order to conserve more fully the food supply for our Army and Navy, our civilian population which supports and maintains them, and our allies, whom we must either help to feed or pay for the neglect to do so by augmenting our Army at the front and our Navy on the seas, as well as increase our producing power in all directions.

We are convinced that the overwhelming sentiment of the country approves this program and that the people generally throughout the States are expecting the Congress to enact it. Representing the church and temperance constituency of the country, as we do, we urge its speedy adoption by the Congress. Representative E. Y. WEBB will propose such amendments, covering such features of the above propositions as it is believed may be held in order on the pending bill under the rules of the House.

We are satisfied that your support of such amendments will meet with the approval of the patriotic citizenship of the Nation.

Very sincerely, yours,

EDWIN C. DINWIDDIE,
Legislative Superintendent.
JAMES CANNON, Jr.,
ARTHUR J. BARTON,
WAYNE B. WHEELER,
Legislative Committee.

The friends of the amendment are taking no unjust advantage of this crisis to force prohibition upon the country. From a deep conviction that intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes are unnecessary and harmful, they attempt to aid you in carrying out the great object of this bill to conserve the food supply of the Nation by providing a way by which the liquors which otherwise would be used to the positive injury of mankind and to lessen the physical force of the Nation may be converted into alcohol which is needed to carry on the war. We authorize the requisitioning of steel, factories, food, and even human beings for Government purposes. Then why should we not authorize the requisitioning of alcohol and liquors in the United States in so far as the Government needs them for the manufacture of ammunition and in the hospitals or for any other military uses?

Food Control.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN I. NOLAN,
OF CALIFORNIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to print granted during the consideration of the food-control bill I extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD an editorial from the Oakland Enquirer under date of June 22, 1917, entitled "The food cornerer; get him":

THE FOOD CORNERER; GET HIM.

It is said that Congressmen have begun to feel the public demand for immediate legislation adequate to reach and punish the food speculator. Dilatory discussion of the food-control bill now dragging aimlessly along has aroused resentment, it is said, that is being felt, and will be heeded. It is high time—high time at both ends. The people have demanded none too soon; their demand has been felt none too keenly.

We have to deal with a public enemy in the food speculator; one deserving of drastic treatment. Though he may not bear arms against the Nation, his wicked action is no more to be condoned than though he lead a legion of hostile gun men. If enemy troops are to be shot, enemy spies to be summarily executed, what clemency shall be extended to one who would starve our troops that that enemy in arms should conquer us? If one be allowed in our midst to strive for our defeat by any means at his command, without punishment, by what logic may we justify slaying of him who comes against us in heroic attitude, asking no quarter, making no false pretense? The enemy who faces us is vastly to be preferred to the enemy who would stab us in the back.

There is before Congress, in this proposed food-control measure, a means to reach—to circumvent or to punish—the food speculator. Provisions of the bill were drawn directly to this purpose. In no other way, save by application of military regulation—a thing always possible in war times—can those public enemies be reached than by special legislation. The exigencies of the moment demand that no time be lost in meeting the situation.

This war-time food speculator is a species of bandit that we have not until just now known that we possessed. We have had anarchists and train robbers and German spies and counterfeiters aplenty, and been able to locate and punish them. But the presence of the perfidious creature who would endanger the Nation before its enemy has only emerged since his opportunity matured. He, worst of all our undesirables, has been revealed only as the fruits of his iniquity here found him out. And he has been found out only after he has robbed the country of $250,000,000 in artificially enhanced flour prices, besides other and greater thefts, and after he has laid plans to maintain a strangle hold upon the country for some time to come. This last is the worst of our criminal afflictions.

It is fortunate for the country that these food sharks have shown their presence thus early in our travail. It is well, perhaps, since these torments must be met, that we know of them as we do. Their impetuosity of greed has served the public well, since now they are distinctly in the public eye, with public vigilance pursuing them and public wrath thirsting for their destruction.

This food-control bill should not pass without such drastic measures as would place the food shark in the category of our most infamous enemies. Such punishment should be assigned his offenses as would exterminate his kind; such latitude extended Government agencies in pursuit of him as would make detection easy and speedy, and execution informal. The thief caught in his act is a hero compared with him who would dissipate the Nation's vitality through food denial, that his pockets be lined with gold. The murderer caught in his crime is a retailer in offense compared with the food cornerer who would starve, by wholesale. The ordinary criminal is deserving of clemency compared with the extortionist, who would not only rob for gain but who would imperil the Nation in time of war. Short-cut justice is good enough for merchandising in starvation, and not to be unexpected, if the people be too far exasperated by the law's delays.

Producing the Evidence in the Case of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
OF PENNSYLVANIA.
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tuesday, June 26, 1917.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in fairness to those who have supported the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal item of the river and harbor bill, and to justify the statements often made in debate that the project is not deserving the persistent opposition to which it is subjected nor to the harsh things said about it, I have had prepared a summary of official reports, opinions, and statements, the consensus of which I respectfully commend to those who have contended against the project as well as to those who have manifested their abiding faith in it. To those who know the Atlantic coast or who understand our commercial and naval necessities, especially in times of war, it is not worth while to argue this question. Their wonder is that others can not or will not understand the evident wisdom and expediency of this long-neglected improvement, the importance of which to the Nation in time of need can not be estimated in a monetary sense.

The strategic value of an adequate waterway connecting the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays is self-evident. It is commonly regarded by waterway experts as of equal importance to the United States as the Kiel Canal is to Germany; and yet for years the Government has permitted it to remain in private ownership, incompetent for such service as may be vital to the national safety at any moment. Surely those who have sounded the warning and who have labored for years to put the Government's "house in order" along the Atlantic coast may not be blamed for urging this improvement now.

THE MINORITY ATTACK.

In its report to the House the minority of the River and Harbor Committee attacked the project vigorously, but, as I believe, without good cause. I quote that part of the minority report which is pertinent:

The appropriation of $1,300,000 for the purchase of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal is omitted, but a clause ultimately much more expensive is added by the item authorizing the condemnation of this obsolete waterway. The minority feel that the House should have a thorough understanding of what the condemnation of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal really means. For many years an effort has been made to have this project assumed by the Government. It is a canal 13 miles long, supposedly having a depth of 9 feet, which, if taken over by the Government, will mean an expenditure of from $8,000,000 to $12,000,000, or possibly more, in order to secure a depth of 12 feet. A wide stretch of imagination must be used to argue that this can possibly contribute to the present national emergency. It is a part of the so-called intercoastal waterways for which strong influences have been at work. Congress has already adopted portions of this system, and if, by influential persuasion from time to time additional sections are adopted, the proponents of the proposition will feel they can consistently argue that the whole system should be connected up by adoption of the final links. Untold millions are involved in this ambitious project. The minority urge that it should not be countenanced by the purchase of this canal as a war measure. It would be a splendid opportunity for owners of worthless stock and depreciated bonds to dispose of them to the Government that helped build this canal; but such financing is no part of the Government's war emergencies.

A NEWSPAPER RETORT.

That minority report was given wide publicity and had its effect upon Members of the House; but the eastern newspapers that had been giving encouragement to attacks upon river and harbor bills did not generally approve the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal attack. I quote from one of them—the Philadelphia Inquirer—and ask consideration of what it said:

THAT RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

In opposition to the river and harbor bill there will be the usual cries of "pork." No doubt there are some junks of pork in the bill, but the total appropriation has been decreased from the customary proportions, and most of what remains is intended for legitimate purposes. It is a great shame that Congress has never been able as yet to get the river and harbor improvements on a solid basis of actual necessity, but considerable progress has been made and to defeat this measure would be to deal a serious blow at projects of merit.

For instance, the Delaware River has become the greatest shipbuilding center in the world. In many respects the navy yard at League Island is the most important of all yards. This river, for the benefit of the Government alone, must have its contemplated improvements.

Then there is provision for taking over the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal and making something worth while out of it. This should have been done long ago. Indeed, the whole contemplated Atlantic waterways project, if it were now in working order, would exert vast influence upon transportation. The railroads are glutted with freight. Every waterway that can be made available should be utilized for the relief of the railroads and for the relief of Government transportation as well as of the public. If the deeper canal had been cut through New Jersey, from the Delaware to the waters of New York, and the deeper channel had been cut across the State of Delaware, from the Delaware River to the Chesapeake, that relief which we are now seeking from overstrained railroads would be experienced. What a pity that Congress has never been able to look ahead!

The war caught us unprepared in every direction. Now we are making an effort to do what we should have done. The rivers and harbors bill, because of the various necessary projects which it carries, is an essential part of the get-ready movement.

COL. TAYLOR IN THE SUN.

From the New York Sun, another critic of river and harbor improvements, I quote an extract of a letter published May 15 last. The writer was Col. Harry Taylor, of the War Department, who is now with Gen. Pershing in France as staff officer, representing the United States Army Engineers. To the Sun Col. Taylor said:

You say "the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal project, the pet of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, * * * is expected to cost upward of $10,000,000, though contemplating only a 12-foot canal from the Delaware River to the Chesapeake Bay." The project for the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal contemplates eventually a channel not less than 25 feet deep. As a step toward this deep canal, it is proposed to first construct a 12-foot canal at a cost of approximately $8,000,000—not $10,000,000—including something over $2,500,000 for the purchase of the existing canal. The deepening of the 12-foot canal to 25 feet is estimated to cost $4,500,000, so that the estimated cost of completing a 25-foot canal is approximately $12,500,000.

As a matter of history, it may be known to you that the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal during the Civil War proved to be a transportation route of some importance, and that had it not been for that small and inefficient canal the Capital of Washington would probably have been in the hands of the Confederates early in 1861. While we hope that the Capital will never be that near capture again, the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal is still regarded as highly important from the defense point of view as well as from a commercial point of view.

SUMMONING THE FACTS.

So much, Mr. Speaker, by way of introduction. I shall now present some indisputable facts concerning the much-abused but extremely worthy project of connecting up the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays for commerce and for war.

The importance of a free modern waterway connecting the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays has been attested by every official board or commission that has been directed to report on the subject, and by innumerable individuals who have been familiar with the existing need and the possible advantage of the completion of such a waterway.

It is an essential link in a continuous series of protected waterways along the Atlantic seaboard whereby about 131 miles of connecting canal, already in part completed, will provide uninterrupted navigation for about 1,800 miles, connecting the mouths of 148 rivers having a length of 5,365 miles; connecting the principal seaports, naval stations, and coast defenses; and by the canal system of New York—500 miles in length—further connecting with the Great Lakes, 1,489 miles; Lake Champlain, 126 miles; and the St. Lawrence River and tributaries, 1,000 miles.

APPROVED BY ARMY AND NAVY.

It is an essential feature of the defenses of our eastern seaboard in time of war, as attested by the respective boards of both Army and Navy.

It will afford much-needed relief in the movement of freight in eastern-traffic territory, where the railroads are subject to frequent and serious congestion, embargo, and delay.

While there are several feasible routes between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays, the Army engineers, without exception, have recommended the route of the existing canal as the most desirable for both commerce and defense, the cheapest to complete and maintain.

The pending river and harbor bill provides for acquisition of the existing canal by condemnation proceedings. This method has been adopted as the most feasible under the circumstances—bondholders, who regularly receive their dividends, and stockholders, who receive nothing, having equal voting power in the canal company—and the most likely to result in an award satisfactory to the Government—the proceedings being instituted in the district where the canal is located, whereas its security holders reside principally in other districts.

There is no project on which the Army engineers have reported which has a closer relation to present problems of traffic congestion, interstate commerce, coast defense, and military and naval efficiency than that of providing a free modern waterway between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays.

It touches the very heart of our greatest industries, our production of ships and munitions, and our national prosperity itself as dependent upon the efficient and economical assembling of the materials of our export trade.

REPORTS, FINDINGS, AND OPINIONS RELATIVE TO THE ACQUISITION AND MODERNIZATION OF THE WATERWAY CONNECTING CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE BAYS.

REPORTS OF 1882–83.

Legal authority: The river and harbor act of August 2, 1882.

* * * * * * *

Reported upon by Lieut. Col. William P. Craighill, Corps of Engineers, United States Army.

Dates of reports: December 5 and December 20, 1882, and March 1, 1883.

Reports printed in Annual Report of Chief of Engineers for 1883 and House Executive Document 102, Fifty-third Congress.

QUOTATIONS FROM REPORTS.

The main objects of such a canal are supposed to be two: The greater facilitation of the defense of a part of the territory of the United States by the opening of an interior short line of communication between the great bays—Chesapeake and Delaware—and the shortening of a great route of foreign and coastwise commerce. Both of these objects seem to be of national importance.

NOTES UPON THE MILITARY CONSIDERATIONS.

It will be doubted by no one that a ship canal connecting the two bays would be of vast importance in the contingency of war with a maritime nation. Such a connection would provide a means of concentrating the floating defense of the two bays, and besides this would render more secure communication between the naval stations of Philadelphia, Norfolk, and Washington.

Vessels defending a port have two offices to perform, the one being to assist in the direct defense or to prevent capture or occupation by a hostile force, the other being the prevention or breaking up of blockade. Without the canal a blockade at the capes of the Delaware would close the port of Philadelphia, or a blockade at the capes of Virginia would close the outward commerce of Baltimore and the other ports of the Chesapeake. With the canal built where communication would be secure, neither the ports of Philadelphia nor of Baltimore could be closed unless an effectual blockade were established both at the Delaware and Virginia capes. The disadvantage to the attacking party is obvious, while the defending vessels could concentrate at either outlet, and breaking the blockade at one point would open both ports and render the blockade useless at the other outlet.

It may be assumed that if a war with one of the great naval powers should arise, and the mere appropriation of the money could provide such a channel of communication between the bays, the amount would be at once provided without hesitation. That would, however, be too late.

The city of Baltimore is greatly interested in this canal. She is nearer the great cities of the West—Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and others—than Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, her great contestants for the trade of the West; but her situation at the head of Chesapeake Bay requires her commerce to take a longer route to the ocean than is convenient; that is, through the whole length of that bay.

REPORT OF 1894.

Legal authority: River and harbor act of August 18, 1894.

Reported upon by the board, appointed by the President, composed of Brig. Gen. Thomas L. Casey, Chief of Engineers; Col. William P. Craighill, Corps of Engineers; Capt. George Dewey, United States Navy; Mr. Mendes Cohen, of Maryland; Mr. E. Porter Alexander, of South Carolina.

Date of report: December 8, 1894.

Report printed in House Executive Document 102, Fifty-third Congress, third session.

QUOTATIONS FROM REPORT.

* * * * * * *

To conclude: After examination of the surveys heretofore made under the direction of the War Department, this board determines the most feasible route for the construction of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal to be the Back Creek route, which is substantially located upon the line of the existing Chesapeake & Delaware Canal.

THE AGNUS COMMISSION.

REPORT OF 1907.

Legal authority: Joint resolution No. 37, approved June 28, 1906.

* * * * * * *

Reported upon by the commission appointed by the President of the United States. Felix Agnus, chairman; C. A. F. Flagler, major, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; F. T. Chambers, civil engineer, United States Navy.

Date of report: January 1, 1907.

Report printed in Senate Executive Document No. 215, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session.

The commission was organized at a meeting in Baltimore on July 30, 1906, Gen. Felix Agnus being elected chairman.

QUOTATIONS FROM THE REPORT—THE SELECTION OF ROUTE.

Although not definitely required by the provisions of the joint resolution, the commission considers that in view of its careful and extensive examination of the subject it should express its opinion upon the relative desirability of the two routes, and states that the present Chesapeake & Delaware Canal route is equal to or better than the Sassafras route under practically all phases of comparison.

It is cheaper of construction and the cost of maintenance would be practically the same.

The two routes offer the same advantages from a commercial viewpoint.

The military and naval advantages will be equal, except for the cost of moving the defenses of the Delaware, giving an additional advantage in favor of the Chesapeake & Delaware Ship Canal route.

The Government may see fit to purchase the present Chesapeake & Delaware Canal and deepen it gradually. This seems to be the course advised by those who have appeared before the commission or communicated their views to it. While terms of the joint resolution do not direct the commission to express its conclusions upon this phase of the subject, yet the sentiment is so strong and proceeds from such responsible sources that the commission suggests the advisability of acquiring the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal at an early date if practicable and if it can be done at a cost not exceeding $2,514,289.70.

APPRAISEMENT OF CANAL PROPERTY.

Taking the funded indebtedness as $2,602,950, the net income as $104,118, and a fair rate for appraisement as 5 per cent, the commission finds $2,083,600 as the value. But it may be considered that if the Government should purchase the works and franchises of the canal company it would assume the funded indebtedness of the company, placing the total issues of bonds at par, or $2,602,950. Deducting from this sum the value of the floating plant and of the outside holdings of the company, which the commission has stated above it is not advisable to acquire, there remains the sum of $2,514,289.70. The commission believes that no higher value than this $2,514,289.70 should be paid by the Government for the works, bonds, franchises, and real property holdings and all other claims of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co., except those just cited, viz. the floating plant and the outside holdings.

All earning values accruing from the franchises are included in this $2,514,289.70. If a higher price than $2,514,289.70 should be demanded by the owners of the canal, the commission recommends that condemnation proceedings be employed.

GENERAL REMARKS ON THE MILITARY VALUE OF THE PROPOSED WATERWAY.

It is a well-established principle that, for the defense of a frontier threatened by an attack from without, at some unknown point the forces for the defense shall be concentrated within the frontier line at points from which they can be moved rapidly and safely to the actual point of attack when developed. The proposed intracoastal waterway between New York and Norfolk forms a most desirable line for such movements of troops, lying as it does for its entire distance under the shelter of fortifications built or planned for the defense of the coast.

* * * * * * *

The usefulness of such portions of this inland waterway as were in existence at the outbreak of the Civil War was thoroughly proved in the operations at that time.

For the movement of troops, sheltered water transportation affords many advantages over transportation by rail.

The number of transportation units required for a division of troops with field equipment, rations, and forage for three days is by rail 958 passenger and freight cars; by water 12 ships of 20-foot draft like the Kentuckian or 22 ships of 16-foot draft like the Momus.

For naval purposes it is necessary here only to invite attention to the very great advantage to be obtained by providing an additional and protected entrance for each of the ports from New York to Norfolk—an advantage which would make impossible an effective blockade of any one of these ports.

From the above it is evident that the construction of the canal would add greatly to the defensive strength of the United States.

THE MOST AVAILABLE ROUTE.

It was the duty of the board to examine all practicable routes and to prepare plans and estimates of the cost along the most available route.

In making this examination the board availed itself of the information heretofore collected and compiled and examined personally all practicable routes formerly suggested as well as some later modifications of the same.

The board held that no route should be adopted that does not enter Delaware River at a point within the protection and control of the fortifications already constructed.

The maintenance of its channel where it enters the Delaware River and Chesapeake Bay presents no serious difficulty.

The cost of a canal by this route will be less than by any other available.

The construction work can be so conducted as to permit the uninterrupted use, toll free, of the canal for commerce as soon as the Government acquires possession.

* * * * * * *

CONCLUSIONS OF SPECIAL BOARD.

Delaware River-Chesapeake Bay section: All practicable routes in this section were examined, and the Back Creek route, along the line of the present Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, was selected and surveyed as the most available. A plan has been prepared for a canal 25 feet deep and with a bottom width of 125 feet, and such a canal along this route and with these dimensions is recommended. The estimated cost of construction is $9,910,210.

The board is of the opinion that the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal property should be acquired by the United States by purchase. The cost has heretofore been estimated at $2,514,290. (See S. Doc. No. 215, 59th Cong., 2d sess.) No definite proposition has been received by this board for the sale of the canal. The purchase price is in addition to the construction cost stated above.

The importance of this section is deemed sufficient to warrant the immediate purchase of the existing canal and the inception of work for its enlargement as soon as funds can be made available.

SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT OF 1912 AND 1913.

Legal authority: River and harbor act approved March 3, 1909.

Reported upon by (A) a special board of engineer officers consisting of Col. W. M. Black, Col. Frederic V. Abbot, Lieut. Col. J. C. Sanford, Lieut. Col. Mason M. Patrick, and Maj. R. R. Raymond; (B) by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, William T. Rossell, colonel, Corps of Engineers, senior member of the board; (C) and by Brig. Gen. W. H. Bixby, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Dates of reports: (A) February 14, 1912; (B) July 22, 1912; (C) August 9, 1913.

Reports printed in House Document No. 196, Sixty-third Congress, first session.

The special board in this report apparently considered the question from the commercial side only, and did not express any views concerning the naval or military advantages. This method of viewing the question was followed by both the reviewing Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors and the Chief of Engineers.

THE MACOMB REPORT.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, February 27, 1915.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

Subject: Military advantages of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal.

1. There is returned herewith a memorandum with attached papers on the above subject, dated February 24, 1915, from the Secretary of War to the Chief of Staff, wherein three questions are submitted:

(a) The military advantage, if any, of the existence of this canal.

(b) Whether a canal along this line would be of any military advantage, and if so, what?

(c) What character and size the canal would have to be in order to be of any advantage?

These questions apparently refer both to the present and contemplated canal along this line.

2. In answer to 1 (a), it is believed that the existing canal has some value as it exists to-day as an obstacle to the advance of a hostile expedition landing on the west bank of Delaware Bay and advancing against Wilmington and Philadelphia. The fine, undefended harbor at Lewes, Del., makes such a landing a probability. The canal, especially at the locks, is so narrow, only 24 feet at the locks, as to form an obstacle not very formidable. The canal is too small for the passage of submarines or other naval craft that would be used for preventing the landing of troops from hostile transports, and too small and obstructed by locks for rapid transport of troops and matériel from one bay to the other.

3. As to 1 (b), a sea-level canal along this same line would be of very great military importance from the following points of view:

(a) For the movement of submarines and other craft that must constitute an important part of our coast-defense system.

(b) As forming an almost impassable obstacle to the passage of troops advancing to attack Wilmington or Philadelphia from the peninsula between Delaware and Chesapeake Bays.

(c) For the transport of men and matériel of the Coast Artillery and the Coast Artillery supports from one bay to the other.

4. The first of the points enumerated in paragraph 3 is a military one, because submarines and other small craft are believed to be at present an integral part of the seacoast defense, for use not only against naval attack on the harbors, but in a still more important sense against transports attempting to land a hostile force on our shores in case of the defeat of our Navy. Seacoast defenses reach no farther than the range of their guns, and it is impossible to distribute mobile army troops at all possible landing places to prevent the landing of troops without so frittering away the army in small detachments as to render it almost impossible to collect them for united action. A canal such as proposed would allow the whole force of submarines, etc., to be held in one of the two bays and used with equal efficiency in either. Without the canal the force of submarines, etc., must be divided between the two bays, and to reinforce one another they must attempt a passage by the outside, a distance of over 200 miles, as against about 15 miles by the canal.

A canal along this line and one from Delaware Bay to New York Harbor would make a landing of hostile troops almost impossible between Narragansett Bay and Chesapeake Bay, and the construction of this canal is an important step toward the accomplishment of this result.

5. As an obstacle and a part of the land defense of Wilmington and Philadelphia a canal suited for other commercial and naval purposes would be of great importance. Defended by a few troops and small gunboats, such an obstacle (of the size recommended below) would hardly be crossed, and it is not believed that it would be attempted.

6. As a means of transport it has a measure of value for the easy transportation of men and matériel between the fortifications of Delaware Bay and of Baltimore.

7. As to 1 (c), the objects set forth in paragraph 3 above can be obtained by a sea-level canal having a depth of 18 feet at mean low water and a bottom width of about 150 feet. While tides of 6 feet to 10 feet prevail in the waters at the ends of the canal, investigation has shown that guard locks will not be necessary and that an open canal will be entirely feasible.

M. M. MACOMB,
Brigadier General, Chief of War College Division.

I concur.
TASKER H. BLISS,
Brigadier General, United States Army, Acting Chief of Staff.

I concur.
LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

A SENATE COMMITTEE INQUIRY.

VALUATION.

[Report of Senate Committee on Coast and Insular Survey, S. Rept. No. 452, 63d Cong., 2d sess., pursuant to S. Res. 304.]

The Agnus Commission, when Col. Flagler (then major of Engineers, United States Army) had charge of the Wilmington (Del.) district, made a detailed valuation of the works and property of the canal, which may be found at page 18, Senate Document 215, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session. The value there given is $3,708,186.

Gen. Bixby, in his testimony before this committee (p. 126), confirmed this valuation and showed that no new appraisement was necessary, as the appraisement made in 1906 was confirmed by present cost prices of materials.

Your committee has secured the opinion of many of the holders of the bonds of the company as to the value of the bonds, and practically all of them claim that the par value of the bonds should be given for the canal. In this opinion your committee can not concur for the reasons given, but believe that the acquisition of the canal by the Government without resort by it to condemnation proceedings is practically impossible, because in addition to holding the securities with the hope that the Government will at least pay the par value of the bonds the owners and holders of the stock and bonds are so widely scattered as to render it impracticable to deal with them individually and thus acquire their holdings.

We therefore conclude that the appropriation carried in the present river and harbor bill will prove insufficient to acquire the canal, that condemnation proceedings must be resorted to ultimately and should be provided for in any appropriation made with the expectation of acquiring the canal, and that the amount necessary to pay an award in condemnation proceedings will not be less than $2,000,000, and may reach $2,500,000.

HEARINGS ON THE SUBJECT OF THE PURCHASE OF THE CHESAPEAKE & DELAWARE CANAL BEFORE COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS JANUARY 15, 1914.

OPINION OF EUGENE W. FRY, TREASURER SOUTHERN TRANSPORTATION CO., JANUARY, 1914.

Practically all of our barges can load to a draft of nearly 12 feet when there is sufficient water. The same barges can only load to a 9-foot draft in trading through the canal, which means a great loss in cargo capacity.

It is necessary to charge higher rates of freight to cover all these additional costs of operation, such as canal tolls, "short" cargoes, and the excessive cost of towing. If the canal is made a free waterway, 12 feet in depth, it would cheapen rates of freight on lumber, railroad ties, mine timber, pulp wood, pig iron, ice, and all other commodities.

I do not think the producers and consumers in the North and South fully realize what a great saving would eventually be brought about by reason of our Government acquiring the canal and making it a free and deeper waterway.

OPINION OF GEORGE F. SPROULE, SECRETARY OF BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF NAVIGATION, PHILADELPHIA.

In forwarding for your consideration statistics of the volume of the inward business of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal for the years 1912 and 1913, so far as the port of Philadelphia is concerned, the commissioners of navigation for the River Delaware and its navigable tributaries submit that of 212,107,867 feet of lumber brought in during 1913, 125,684,801 feet came via this inland waterway, at rates of freight greatly below those paid by the outside passage. The present fleet of sailing craft engaged in the outside lumber trade from southern ports is not being replaced, for the reason that vessels of this type can no longer be operated at a profit to their owners, and is consequently being rapidly depleted by every storm. The life of the present fleet is calculated at about five years, after which time it will be impossible to get lumber here otherwise than by expensively manned and operated steamships. Experience has demonstrated the carrying of lumber by steamships to be almost prohibitive, owing principally to the lack of ability to load and discharge it with such rapidity as is required to enable this type of craft to pay expenses. Few of the schooners now engaged in the lumber trade are classed, consequently the rates of insurance on their cargoes are high and almost prohibitive.

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES H. PRESTON, MAYOR OF BALTIMORE, TO COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS, JANUARY 15, 1914.

We are very enthusiastic in Baltimore on the passage of this bill in the interest of the north and south traffic of our country. We think it will be of the greatest assistance to shippers and consumers and cheap freight rates. While now the railroads are not able to handle it—they are coming down in Baltimore and taking great slices of our central business territory, because they can not handle the freight coming into our town—let us help them with the consumer by giving them water transportation north and south from the great States of Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, and the intervening States to Cape Cod—let us give them cheap transportation. And the only way to do it is to bring about the completion of the link between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays by the purchase or condemnation, if necessary, of this canal.

STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES R. MILLER, GOVERNOR OF DELAWARE.

This subject has been under consideration for a very long period of time. It has been reported upon favorably and indorsed by the United States engineers, and it is the one project in the Atlantic intracoastal waterway system which is absolutely essential for the construction of inland waterways from Maine to Florida. This canal, I would call your attention to the fact, gentlemen, connects the two largest bodies of inland seaboard waters in the United States, the upper Chesapeake and the lower Delaware, which are practically rendered useless by the inefficiency of this canal as a manner of intracoastal communication. It is the center link in the chain of the proposed inland waterways along the entire Atlantic seaboard. Without the acquisition and the improvement of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal it is absolutely impossible to carry into effect the completion of the proposed line of intracoastal waterways along the Atlantic seaboard.

I would call your attention, gentlemen, to the fact that between the cities of Baltimore and Philadelphia, and other cities lying along the Delaware River, with an aggregate population of 2,500,000, the distance is shortened almost 200 miles. I would call attention to the fact that this canal, gentlemen, would provide transportation for a low class of freight which is always long in delivery by rail. Germany has solved that proposition very largely by her system of international canals. England has done the same. It may be, perhaps, presumptuous for me to call the attention of you gentlemen, who know very much more about river and harbor matters than I do, to these facts, but I would remind you that the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal bears the same relation to millions of people along the Atlantic seaboard that these continental canals do to the people of Continental Europe. The people of the entire Atlantic seaboard are behind this proposition as a unit, and if Congress delays or postpones continually this proposition it will only intensify our efforts and stimulate our determination to work more energetically until the object is accomplished.

HON. JOSEPHUS DANIELS, SECRETARY OF THE NAVY, FROM LETTER READ AT THE CONVENTION OF THE ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, SAVANNAH, GA., NOVEMBER, 1915.

The Atlantic inland deeper waterway is to our country what the Panama Canal is to the world.

* * * * * * *

We have been doing great things in America, and I am one of those who believe that our country is on so firm and sound a bottom that not even the disasters of war which have temporarily deranged some of our affairs can long delay our inevitable success.

When one looks at the coast line from Boston to New Orleans and notes this long inside-of-the-coast waterway, needing only to be properly dredged, widened, and connected up by proper canal links in the chain, it seems as if Providence had enriched us with a most remarkable natural defense, provided we make use of what nature has thus endowed us with. It seems as if Providence had lifted up a sand barrier between the hinterland and the sea and bade us go in and make it deep enough to carry our commercial and naval flotillas. Since it has been put within our reach would it not be national suicide for us to fail to follow the lead? * * *

Aside from the commercial value of cheap transportation and safety from storms and deep-sea navigation, there are the following military and naval advantages in case of war: It will enable us with a more limited number of mine-laying ships, mine sweepers, submarines, and the torpedo boats to transfer these mobile harbor and coast-defense weapons from one point to another on our coast, thus multiplying their efficiency, increasing the radius of action, and lessening the danger of their being intercepted by an enemy until an attack is launched. It would increase our coast defenses by transporting heavy mortars and traction engines on canal boats and barges to points up and down the coast when an enemy may attempt to make a landing or seize a base. The Germans use their canals and rivers to thus transport heavy artillery.

FROM ADDRESS OF MAJ. C. A. FLAGLER, UNITED STATES ARMY, CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, PHILADELPHIA, 1907.

This waterway has many links partially constructed: The Cape Cod Canal, the Delaware & Raritan Canal, the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, the Dismal Swamp and Albemarle & Chesapeake Canals paralleling each other, and the Core Creek Cut now being made by the Government from Beaufort Harbor to Pamlico Sound. All of these, however, are for a generally shallow draft commerce, 10 feet at low water being about the prevailing depth. They are what may be termed barge canals. The great Atlantic waterways that we are discussing include this inland chain of artificial channels and also great natural channels such as Long Island Sound and the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays. All of these large natural waters are being made navigable by the General Government for ships of the largest draft, and the connecting artificial channels should offer in the near future equal advantages. There should be no weak links in the chain.

HON. AUSTIN L. CROTHERS, GOVERNOR OF MARYLAND, ADDRESS BEFORE CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, BALTIMORE, 1908.

I am one of those who believe that the great development of the future is water transportation. We see when we face the East that old and historical waterway, the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, that has performed such important functions in the history of the welfare of the people, and we realize that it needs to be deepened and widened, and the deepening and opening of that canal, which has been found to be the most feasible route running over to the Delaware River, will bring great results.

ADDRESS, JOHN F. STEVENS, FORMER CHIEF ENGINEER PANAMA CANAL, AT CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, BALTIMORE, 1908.

There seems to be a general impression that the railways are opposed to the exploitation and construction of canals. That there is good ground for such opinion the speaker does not believe. The consensus of opinion among our ablest most far-sighted railway owners and executives is undoubtedly that canals, properly planned, honestly financed and constructed, will not only aid the development of the country but will create new business, and from other and potent causes be of assistance and value to the railways themselves. Beyond a doubt they will take from the railways some part of a certain class of traffic, but such loss will be recouped by the fact that the railways will be enabled to better and more economically handle the higher-priced traffic, which the waterways can never satisfactorily do, and so the net results will be for their benefit.

ADDRESS OF LATE REAR ADMIRAL GEORGE W. MELVILLE, UNITED STATES NAVY, AT CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, BALTIMORE, 1908.

So important do I feel is the movement you have started for the improvement of these internal waterways that, much as I desire to see our Navy increased to its proper rank, I feel we might, with advantage, reduce our naval building program in order to push this work, if that were necessary. I can not believe, however, that our Representatives in Congress can fail to appreciate the importance of this matter when it is properly presented to them.

ADDRESS OF MR. CHARLES HEBER CLARK AT CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, BALTIMORE, 1908.

I am convinced that the other Americans who do not live in Philadelphia or in Baltimore or on the Atlantic coast will perceive when they are properly informed the wisdom of doing that thing which will unite the two most magnificent bays on the coast and open up a channel for all this commerce on the Chesapeake and Delaware, and so I hope before the adjournment of this remarkable convention an effort will be made to enforce on Congress the necessity of buying that canal for $2,500,000.

LETTER FROM ANDREW CARNEGIE, READ AT CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, NORFOLK, 1909.

You are engaged in a good work; money can not be more wisely spent than in improving our waterways. Especially should the inside passage be opened on the Atlantic seaboard.

LETTER FROM HON. GEORGE GRAY, UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, WILMINGTON, DEL., READ AT CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, NORFOLK, 1909.

I am glad that the interest in the general movement is increasing under the lead of the association. Nothing has come to the front during this generation that promises so much for the material and commercial advancement of the country as this deeper-waterways project. The energies of the people for more than 30 years past have been directed to the development of our railroad system. During this development the waterways were necessarily relegated to a subordinate place. The time has now passed for that, and our congested railroad traffic will be relieved by a cheaper water-borne carriage. The necessity for this is almost self-evident, and land and water carriage will supplement each other to the infinite advantage of all the people.

LETTER FROM W. W. FINLEY, PRESIDENT OF THE SOUTHERN RAILWAY, READ AT CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, NORFOLK, 1909.

If it were at all possible for me to do so, I should be glad to attend the sessions of the convention and to advocate to the best of my ability the policy of carrying out an intelligent and comprehensive plan for the improvement of our waterways. As I have frequently said, the agricultural, industrial, and commercial development of any locality and the prosperity of its people depend, in very large measure, upon the adequacy of the transportation facilities by which they are served. Speaking especially for the Southern States, I believe that there is a present economic need of improved transportation facilities both by land and by water.

REAR ADMIRAL C. S. SPERRY, UNITED STATES NAVY, ADDRESS BEFORE CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, NORFOLK, 1909.

While I am greatly interested, and so are my brother officers, in the naval view of the intercoastal waterways, we are equally interested in the development of the intercoastal waterways commercially and for the general advancement of the country.

The inland waterways of the Atlantic coast are an important factor in the national defense in several ways. Not only do they afford a secure passage for certain vessels of the Navy, but the sounds, particularly, are an outer line of defense; the ditch of the fortress. Submarines, destroyers, and torpedo boats, secure in their smooth waters and able to pass out through occasional passages readily defended by mines, can drive off an enemy's fleet and a hostile landing will be impossible.

PRESIDENT WILLIAM H. TAFT, ADDRESS BEFORE CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, NORFOLK, VA., 1909.

Now, about this waterways association. I have heard gentlemen—I think I heard our distinguished speaker intimate that he did not see what was the necessity of a waterway when it was only a biscuit throw over into the ocean; but that is because he comes from Illinois.

If in the discharge of his duty it had been his fate, as it has been mine, to go around this neighboring Cape Hatteras he would understand the difference in a biscuit throw. He would know that there is something in quiet water.

HON. J. FRANKLIN FORT, GOVERNOR OF NEW JERSEY, ADDRESS BEFORE CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, PROVIDENCE, R. I., 1910.

Our people are awakening to the true situation, and the sooner the people of all the States realize what it will do for them to promote the opening of waterways for quick and cheap transportation between our coastwise and interior towns and cities the better it will be for them.

WHEN THE CANAL SERVED LINCOLN—CAPT. PHILIP REYBOLD, WILMINGTON, DEL., STATEMENT PRESENTED AT CONVENTION OF THE ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, PROVIDENCE, R. I., 1910.

The value of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal as a means of coast defense was proved during the Civil War by the following cir cumstances:

Immediately after the riot which occurred in the city of Baltimore on April 19, 1861, when the Sixth Massachusetts Regiment was passing through that city on its way to the defense of Washington, all the bridges as far north as the Gunpowder River on the line of the Philadelphia, Wilmington & Baltimore Railroad were burned by the Confederates, so there was no means of transporting the troops on the seaboard to Washington by rail. April 20, 1861, the Government seized all the steam propellers lying in or about Philadelphia that could pass through the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal. These boats were then sent down the Delaware River and through the canal to the Chesapeake Bay to meet the troops at Perryville, Md., and thence convey them down the bay to Annapolis and thence by rail to Washington.

From this time forward, until the end of the war, the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal became a most important part of the inland waterway which the Government used for the transportation of supplies of every sort for the Army. They were brought from as far north as Narragansett Bay down through Long Island Sound, through the Delaware & Raritan Canal, down the Delaware River, through the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, down the Chesapeake Bay, through the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal, through the Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds, and so on down to Beaufort, N. C., a distance of something over 1,000 miles, at all times protected from the cruisers of the Confederate fleet which scoured the coast.

For the use of transportation in these canals and bays constituting this line of inland waterway from Narragansett Bay to Beaufort, N. C., the United States Government seized and chartered during the war 144 propeller steamers, 89 steam tugs, and 842 freight barges, in all 1,075 boats, which were used in the passage of these canals.

The whole subject of the chartering and seizure of these boats during the course of the war for the purpose of transportation of Government supplies to the Army through this canal system is set out in full in executive document of the House of Representatives, No. 337, of the second session of the Fortieth Congress. Inasmuch as there were in all 3,612 vessels seized, chartered, or employed by the Federal Government during the war throughout the entire country, it will appear that nearly one-third of this whole number was used in this particular system of canals.

HON. RICHMOND P. HOBSON'S ADDRESS AT CONVENTION OF ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION, PROVIDENCE, 1910—ADVANTAGE OF AN INTRACOASTAL WATERWAY IN TIME OF WAR.

As great as would be the advantage of our inland waterways in years of peace, their greatest advantages would come in time of war.

The wonderful development of transportation in recent years has brought every important nation within striking distance of all other nations, and at the same time has multiplied the magnitude and swiftness of war operations, so that modern wars have become substantially a test of the military preparations of the belligerents, and not of their resources. All of these developments have worked to the disadvantage of America. All other nations have leaped to arms, have organized their whole population into armies, and have taxed their finances upon their fleets, policies that weaken their resources but increase enormously their preparations.

America alone has failed to organize her people into armies and has made slow progress even on her Navy. Though our resources are relatively boundless, our preparations are woefully inferior, and a short war, testing only preparations, would leave us in humiliation and defeat. Therefore our main objective in an important war must be to gain and bring our resources into play. The enemy's objective, on the contrary, would be to strike a staggering blow at once before our resources are brought to bear, seize our commercial centers, destroy our navy yards and ship yards, and bring us to terms quickly. If we bring our resources to bear we should win; if we fail, we should lose the war.

Whether we succeed in gaining our main objective would depend very materially upon our inland waterways.

The conclusions to be drawn from examination of this are simple and clear:

1. That our coastwise inland waterways next to our fleet itself can be made the most vital factor of national defense.

2. That the services of these waterways increase with the Nation's peril. They are useful for economy and for building up plants in time of peace; they would always be a source of strength after the national defenses were well provided for. They are of paramount importance under our present inferior conditions of defense.

3. That in any war under present conditions they would afford our best chance of gaining the time necessary to organize our forces and develop our great resources. They would furnish the best refuge for our fleet, if outnumbered by the enemy, without permitting its blockade; they would make it possible for our fleet, though inferior, to give battle after choosing its own time and conditions, and enable it to retire if necessary; they would make it possible to utilize and expand all our establishments for repairing and building ships and to assemble and concentrate ships as fast as ready.

4. That upon our coastwise inland waterways in their relation to the fleet would largely depend the security of our navy yards, shipyards, and coast cities, and our chance of escaping the knockout blows that would surely be aimed at our coast defenses the instant war were declared.

Summing up, even aside from the great commercial value of our coastwise inland waterways, their paramount vital importance in national defense would warrant and demand immediate measures on the part of Congress to bring about their full and speedy development.

ADDRESS OF REAR ADMIRAL COLBY M. CHESTER, UNITED STATES NAVY, AT ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, NEW LONDON, CONN., 1912.

To the Navy of the United States, having for its main purpose of existence the protection of the country, by carrying on offensive and defensive campaigns on the broad oceans far away from its coasts, it may seem a far cry from interior waterways to a fleet in being; but, as the fleet is made up of cruisers, scout vessels, torpedo boats and destroyers, submarines, and a variety of craft known as auxiliaries, many of which are so small in size as to require protection from the elements whenever possible, and as the inside channels afford such protection, there is a very peculiar relationship between them.

The strategic importance of this interior waterway system is marked. If its improvements are undertaken and finished in accordance with the plans of the United States Engineer Corps, it will permit the transfer of torpedo boats, submarines, picket boats, and other small craft to almost any point along the Atlantic Coast that may be threatened by an enemy at war with the country, under any condition of weather that is likely to occur; and this, too, without being discovered by a blockading fleet. As secrecy is a prime object in all military manœuvers, the improvement of our interior waterways may become of momentous importance to the country, should a war, unfortunately, take place between this and another nation.

PRESIDENT WILLIAM H. TAFT, ADDRESS, ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, NEW LONDON, CONN., 1912.

And so with the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal. I regard that as one of the evidences, of which there are some—not so many, but there are some—of the nonbusiness-like character of the Government of the United States. We have there a little canal that is hardly big enough for a canal boat, between those two great waterways, the Delaware and the Chesapeake. It can easily be made a great waterway, and it ought to be made a great waterway. [Applause.] I am glad to see that it has been recommended that the Government should buy what is there and should enlarge it.

GEORGE CLINTON, JR., BUFFALO, N. Y., ADDRESS, ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, JACKSONVILLE, FLA., 1913.

If the intracoastal canal system which this assocation is endeavoring to secure in its perfection shall be accomplished, the ore, the grain, the lumber, and the other products of our Middle West and of the Canadian northwest, which come down through the Great Lakes system and the barge canal, will find a largely increased outlet without breaking bulk after leaving the port of Buffalo, by reason of the fact that the very vessels which bring those products down through the barge canal will be able to take them to their ports of final destination along the intracoastal waterway.

THE INTRACOASTAL WATERWAY IN THE NATIONAL DEFENSE.

[From addresses by Hon. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, Atlantic Deeper Waterways Convention, Albany and Troy, N. Y., 1914.]

When you are advocating this inland waterway, when you have the vision to see its importance to commerce—and I put that as the reason why the money should be forthcoming to construct this canal—still you see that in any emergency it would be vitally important to the national life that our ships, when the occasion called, should be in harbor, protected, ready to save our cities and our people.

If this canal was constructed, you could take these submarines and destroyers from Boston to New Orleans in these inner channels without hurt or injury. That is for peace. But if we should be so unfortunate—and I pray God we may never see it—as to have war, then the possession of an inland-waterway channel would be essential to preserve efficiency and to enable us to defeat our opponents, because these little craft could ply to and fro, and dart out and deal a blow and return with little injury to themselves. That is the argument on the side of national defense.

There is one other argument which I will give you most briefly in favor of this inland-waterway canal. It is an argument for the preservation of human life. We have thought too little, until recently, of the lives of men who go down to the sea. We have in Congress and as a people permitted conditions that have sacrificed the lives of men for commerce and trade on the sea, and until the Titanic disaster we never had even the beginning of proper protection and proper laws. I wish to give you the disasters to vessels on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts during the 10 years from 1899 to 1909. The number of vessels is 5,715. Loss to the vessels, known, $30,000,000; loss to the cargoes, known, $10,000,000. Vessels totally lost, 1,675; vessels damaged, 4,040. Tonnage totally lost, 483,743; tonnage damages, 3,289,200. Lives lost, 2,223. The total cost of the Atlantic intracoastal waterway would be $47,800,000, so that if we could save a tithe of this material loss we could in a few years pay every dollar of the cost of these improvements which your association is advocating.

But who shall estimate the value of a human life; who shall put a money value upon the lives of the men sacrificed, when for a few million dollars we might make navigation easy and safe?

RESPONSE OF HON. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, SECRETARY OF COMMERCE, ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, RALEIGH, N. C., 1915.

All that I have of sympathy and of belief goes into the work on which you are bent. I know from personal knowledge what it means not to have sufficient water to float ships that are carrying needed things. America, when she wakes up, will not tolerate anything harmful that gets in the way of her commerce.

RESPONSE OF HON. FRANKLIN K. LANE, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, RALEIGH, N. C., 1915.

No great idea ever falls by the wayside. If one man drops it, another man picks it up, and it is carried on to success. Great ideas have made this world, and this proposition that you present, and for which you are carrying on propaganda is one that must make for a greater America, and that is the idea that all of us have.

LETTER OF ADMIRAL DEWEY, UNITED STATES NAVY, ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, SAVANNAH, GA., 1915.

I am in hearty accord with the cause of inland waterways and feel sure, that while it is a large and rather slow undertaking, the time will come, and I hope not far distant, when our ships will have a continuous inland route from New York to Key West.

REMARKS OF HON. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, SECRETARY OF COMMERCE, ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, SAVANNAH, GA., 1915.

For these very practical reasons, because the time is right, because if you get your waterways you have got the tools to use them as never we have had before, because the pressure of necessity is upon the land to make its facilities equal to its needs—for these reasons I am heartily in favor of the cause which you have at heart.

ADDRESS OF REAR ADMIRAL A. W. GRANT, UNITED STATES NAVY, ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, SAVANNAH, GA., 1915.

Inland waterways, capable of being used by the entire fleet, would enable that fleet to be concentrated at any point on our Atlantic seaboard ready to strike a blow upon an inferior force of an enemy or to defeat the enemy in detail should the latter be divided into squadrons. The value of such a waterway to a defending force is apparent. It could remain in safety until the enemy has been located on our coast and then could be concentrated behind ample protection for attack. An enemy operating on the high seas against our coast would then have to always keep its force concentrated. Otherwise it would leave itself open to being defeated in detail.

CAPT. C. E. JOHNSTON, UNITED STATES COAST GUARD, ADDRESS, ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PA., 1916.

The Coast Guard, as its name implies, deals essentially with coastwise matters, and in this field it is intimately concerned with coastal waterways, both inland and littoral. The project of the Deeper Waterways Association is therefore of great interest to the Coast Guard. Our larger vessels, denominated cruising cutters, can keep the sea under almost any conditions of wind and weather and will have little occasion to use the inland waterways in times of peace, but in times of war it may be of vital importance to have a route by which they may proceed from one part of the coast to another with safety and dispatch.

MAJ. J. C. OAKES, UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICER, ADDRESS, ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PA., 1916.

In my opinion, the construction of the canal connecting the Chesapeake and the Delaware, and connecting the Delaware with New York Harbor, would increase the power of our Navy more than threefold.

CHIEF JUSTICE J. HARRY COVINGTON, OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ADDRESS, ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PA., 1916.

Your own project of the Atlantic deeper waterways is one that must commend itself to future Congresses. Here is a great water highway extending 1,800 miles from Florida up the coast, in a section of America that is constantly congesting with population, in a section of the country where the physical situation of the land itself, the value of the land, will soon make it well-nigh impossible for the trunk lines to expand their rights of way to carry more lateral track; where the cost of that land and the necessities of financing will make it well-nigh impossible for those trunk lines to have the expansion of area necessary for the terminals to take care of their vastly developing traffic. In this great area, not as an enemy to the railroad but as a coworker with the railroads for the industrial development of that area, stands this association, committed to a project which means that over these highways of God, through a sensible and not a log-rolling scheme of appropriations, there is to be developed the class of traffic, the class of highway transporting commerce that will take care of the low-grade bulk freight which moves with time as no element, relieving the railroads of a congestion which sooner or later they can not hope to cope with, while it leaves open to them the classes of freight to earn the dividends which are justly theirs and their stockholders.

ADMIRAL WILLIAM S. BENSON, CHIEF OF OPERATIONS, UNITED STATES NAVY, ADDRESS, ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PA., 1916.

Right here in this vicinity a great many ships are built, and were it possible to get our ships through the inland waters, say from the Chesapeake to the Delaware and from the Delaware to New York, and thence through the Sound, instead of taking one fleet to blockade one of the ports through which our vessels would pass, it would take at least half a dozen fleets to maintain an effective blockade. So you can readily see the practical necessity, so far as the Government is concerned, of having waterways, and as your name indicates, deeper waterways. I believe the waterways should be sufficiently deep and broad to allow our biggest ships to pass through them.

NEED FOR THE USE OF OUR INTERIOR WATERWAYS.

[Statement by Hon. William C. Redfield, Secretary of the Department of Commerce, Washington, June, 1917.]

It is necessary that every possible use be made both for local and through freight of all interior waterways, canals, rivers, and lakes, and this must be done not only as generally but as quickly as possible if we are to escape serious congestion.

There is more than sufficient business for both railway and waterway for many months to come. Wherever, therefore, throughout the country a barge or a boat, a scow, a lighter, or a motor vessel can be made to take the place of a railway car, it ought to be done. Such arrangements as are practical should be made along all our great waterways to develop promptly methods for using the water as a means of transportation. This is the time to get idle barges and scows into use, to repair old barges, to build new ones, and to take advantage of a patriotic duty of water transit in every practicable way.

Every river, lake, and canal should be used. Every enterprise, large or small, looking toward their practical use should have encouragement.

It is at this time a matter of national duty to develop the interior waterway and to give it that part in the Nation's economic life to which its extent and variety entitle it, and this should be done as promptly and as thoroughly as possible by temporary means, if need be, in order to get the traffic moving, and then by permanent means in order to make the movement a solid part of our national life. This process can only be helpful in the long run to every one concerned and to the country as a whole.

The effort to promote the use of our waterways has the approval of the War Department, the Commerce Department, and the Shipping Board, and so far as they can these will cooperate in the work. The Department of Commerce, therefore, issues this statement to indicate on behalf of our commerce how grave the situation is and to ask from business and commercial organizations everywhere that the practical help to be given in this emergency by water transportation have their early and thorough consideration.

MAJ. GEN. TASKER H. BLISS, ASSISTANT CHIEF OF STAFF, UNITED STATES ARMY.

[An address delivered in 1884 that sounds like a prophecy.]

In the event of a foreign war that would seriously tax the energy of the Government we will find ourselves with a vast army suddenly collected along some one of our maritime frontiers. It is possible that at the outset we shall find some of our large seaboard cities, where commercial enterprises have collected vast stores of food and other material to which we could naturally look for supply, in the hands of an active and enterprising enemy. Our railroads would then be taxed beyond their capacity in the transportation of men, food, supplies, and war material of every description, besides endeavoring to carry on the ordinary traffic of the country. Then, as in the past, if there be no way of relieving the strain, the Government will pay fabulous prices for the means of saving the national honor. Then, as it has done before, it will saddle posterity with a vast and unnecessary debt—every dollar of which will be a protest against false economy in needed preparation.

In such a case it is obvious what an immense advantage the Government would possess in a system which, with its infinite ramifications, would afford a cheap and ready access to the great supply districts of the country. The rivers which, for thousands of miles in every direction, drain the great valley of the Mississippi, would then send to the point of need a ceaseless stream of supplies that might otherwise rot upon the harvest fields or moider in the storehouses. In some respects these routes are safer in time of war than railroads, for no ordinary raiding party can, as in the case of the latter, cut the line of communication by a few minutes' work. Their terminal branches in the East lie for a hundred miles or more in the channels of the great tidewater rivers, to obstruct which would be a labor of time and of difficulty.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 9, 1917.

Hon. JOHN H. SMALL,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SMALL: In response to your oral inquiry, and referring to the recommendation that I recently submitted for your consideration concerning the advisability of a river and harbor bill, I have the honor to state that the general subject of the character of the river and harbor legislation that should be undertaken at this time was first presented to the President, and he expressed his approval of the policy that I proposed to him as a proper one to observe.

This contemplates such work as is required to enable our waterways to continue to play their necessary part in the transportation service of the country and also to serve urgent military needs. It calls for the appropriation of sufficient sums to provide for necessary work of maintenance in channels already improved, for the more urgent work of continuing improvement of projects already begun, and the adoption of such new projects as are considered necessary under present conditions for military or naval purposes or as a part of the program of national defense and preparedness. The bill that has been prepared along these lines by your committee, in conference with the Chief of Engineers and his representatives, has my approval.

Very truly, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 8, 1917.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: In reply to your letter of the 25th ultimo, urging the expediency of early action by this department looking to the condemnation of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, I have the honor to inform you that I have already recommended its purchase in a letter to the Committee on Military Affairs under date of April 3, 1916, when I not only gave it favorable consideration as to purchase, but also recommended its subsequent enlargement to a depth of 25 feet and a bottom width of 125 feet. These views were again expressed by me in a letter to the Committee on Military Affairs on April 19, 1917.

It is hoped that this matter may have the early attention of Congress and receive its favorable consideration.

Yours, very truly,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

PHILADELPHIA, June 25, 1917.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, M. C.

DEAR MR. MOORE: Reference has been made in recent debates on the river and harbor bill to a fraudulent overissue of bonds in the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co., which was discovered 31 years ago, in 1886.

Those who suffered from this crime, committed by a former officer of the canal company, were the stockholders, who were thereby deprived in proportion of their hopes for future participation in the profits of operation.

It was in effect an embezzlement of the reserve profits set aside during a period of years for redemption of the mortgage, and the embezzlement had no other effect than to reduce the amount by which the mortgage was redeemed. The following are the facts:

Original mortgage loan, duration 30 years, issued 1856	$2,800,000
Amount of bonds bought in to 1885	806,250
Supposed condition of loan on maturity, 1886	1,993,750

Upon presentation of bonds for cancellation there was discovered a fraudulent reissue on the company's paper of $609,200. These bonds were purchased in good faith in the open market, and under a court decree as to a portion of them the company was obliged to assume the entire liability, so that the mortgage loan was reissued, including the said bonds, at $2,602,950, where it still stands.

The effect of the defalcation was to remove all prospect of dividends upon the common stock, amounting then and now to $1,903,238.50, and presumably to wipe out any cash value which that stock might have had.

It is wholly untrue to say at this time that the company was to blame in the transaction. Its former secretary, who was subsequently arrested and convicted and served a term in the penitentiary for his action, simply embezzled the total profits of the canal for a term of years, which had been set aside toward the redemption of its mortgage.

The book cost of the canal was—

Original construction, 1830	$2,201,864.03
Reconstruction of locks, 1855	373,177.02
Reservoir, 1841	22,000.00
Pumping engine, etc., 1851	38,200.00
Riparian rights subsequently purchased	7,790.50
Total cost	2,645,031.55

which is slightly above the amount of the mortgage loan.

If the stockholders had succeeded in paying off the mortgage loan, they would have regained possession of the property, but the defalcation made it impossible for them to hope to do so. It did not, however, in any way affect the value of the canal as a going proposition or its purchase price.

Reference was also made in the debate to the fact that the canal had never proposed a purchase price to the Government. The reason is substantially that under the peculiar organization of the company both stocks and bonds have equal voting power; and the stock being apparently worthless and the bonds regularly receiving dividends, the stockholders might be expected to attempt to prevent the bondholders from receiving the entire proceeds of the sale. As a practical proposition, condemnation proceedings are apparently the best solution of the difficulty. It is also a desirable method of procedure, because, being located in the Delaware district and the securities being held mainly in Pennsylvania and Maryland, a Delaware jury may be expected to render unbiased verdict.

Yours, very truly,

WILFRED H. SCHOFF,
Secretary Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association.

STORY OF HIGH FREIGHTS.

The following letter, bearing upon the increase of freight rates for want of waterway facilities, tells its own story:

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF NAVIGATION,
Philadelphia, Pa., May 23, 1917.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: I received from your Philadelphia office this morning an inquiry concerning statistics with regard to the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal for the calendar year of 1916, with the request that I should forward the same to your care at Washington.

I want to supplement these statistics with some views concerning the early acquisition by the United States Government of this important waterway, from a commercial point of view and as a matter of preparedness in the conflict which this country has entered.

The demand from a commercial point of view for the opening up of this antiquated waterway is greater than ever, and it is no exaggeration to say that the proper development of this section is now at a practical standstill through the inability of consumers to get such raw materials into this market as originate in the South and to ship out the manufactured products destined in that direction.

For the past three years, since the breaking out of the great European war, it has been a physical impossibility to get lumber into this market from the South.

The railroads, as you well know, have embargoes against this commodity and the communities such as Wilmington, Carneys Point, Chester, and other localities in close proximity are handicapped through their inability to erect houses for the mechanics they have had to employ, with the result that in many instances they are forced to charter steamboats to carry their labor from Philadelphia and back, with a consequent loss of time in a day's work approximating from two to three hours.

The great demand for tonnage to carry supplies to the allies has taken from our coastwise trade all the remaining available vessels engaged in the outside routes, and the shoal and restricted width of the locks in the present Chesapeake & Delaware Canal have made it impossible to operate through this waterway modern barges such as would have tended to remedy this shortage in tonnage.

Our lumbermen find it impossible to supply building materials to those corporations and individuals desiring to erect houses, with the result that it is not possible to operate many of the large manufacturing plants to anything like their capacity.

If shipbuilding in the interest of the United States Government is to be pursued, how are the materials for their construction to be gotten to the shipyards unless waterways, such as the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, are modernized and opened up?

It is impossible for the railroads to handle the freight offering, and there are instances too numerous to mention right here of ships in distress being held up for weeks awaiting the receipt of parts of their machinery coming from points no further distant than Connecticut and Rhode Island and New York.

Ocean freights, by reason of the hostilities, have made it unattractive to vessel owners to continue their craft in the coastwise trade. Only yesterday the schooner John B. Biemiller was chartered to load 6,000 barrels of oil at New York for Genoa at a freight rate of $17 a barrel. Under ordinary conditions $0.96 a barrel to this point would have been an attractive freight.

This vessel in normal times carried lumber, and this is what the lumbermen and dealers in building materials are confronted with to-day.

One schooner, the Josephine, has loaded lumber at Mobile for Philadelphia at $16 a thousand feet. Under normal conditions her freight would have been from $6.50 to $7.50 per thousand feet.

In no other way will the conditions be remedied than by the opening up of this inland waterway, as this will permit of the construction and operation of the cheaply built and cheaply manned inland barges.

The value of this canal to the Navy, if modernized, is too well known by you Washington officials to be dwelt upon by me.

Now, these statistics which follow should not be considered indicative of the importance of this waterway to our section of the country, as the business is minimized by its antiquated condition.

During the year 1916, 1,164 vessels of the gross tonnage of 521,343 tons arrived here with cargo via this canal, and during the same period 1,133 vessels, with the gross tonnage of 521,632 tons, left Philadelphia for points in the South via this canal.

Within the same period 110,049,182 feet of lumber, 219,807 railroad ties, 19,930 tons of cinders, 62,430 tons of mine props, 8,110 tons of piling, 3,408 tons of pig iron, 27,277 cords of pulp wood, 11,750 tons of sand, and 3,230 tons of nitrate of soda arrived here from the South via this canal, and within this same period 381 regular line steamers departed and 382 regular line steamers arrived via this waterway.

Of course you will understand that there was much miscellaneous freight, the details of which would make this letter too voluminous.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. F. SPROULE, Secretary.

The Food-Control Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. FREAR,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the food-control bill now before the House. It is not perfect and experience will suggest material amendments, but at this time, in the midst of a great world conflict, we are called upon to meet an emergency that affects every household in the land—the high cost of living.

It will not meet the situation to abuse food barons, extortionists, or speculators, nor should we overlook the fact that legitimate business is employed in the production and manufacture of the necessaries of life. This food-control law seeks not only to avoid waste in present methods of marketing, but to prevent the men or set of men who now prey upon the general public from extorting unconscionable profits for food and fuel which they control.

The Sherman antitrust law has been in force for many years, but it has failed to relieve the extortion practiced in food prices, and extortion is now a menace to the rights of the public throughout the country. Competition in the sale of foodstuffs has practically ceased because a small centralized group of men to-day manipulate and largely control prices and cumbersome methods of marketing the necessaries of life. The farmers of the country and other producers of foodstuffs get for their products only what these speculators are forced to give, while the consumer is compelled to pay all that can be extorted from him by the same men who prey upon the necessities of the people in either case. Many examples of such exactions have been exposed in the House. This monopolistic practice is indefensible and contrary to our purposes of government and ought to be summarily dealt with.

The food-control bill, together with the food-survey bill, just passed by the House will empower the Government, acting through the President and his appointees, to ascertain the supply of fuel and foodstuffs on hand throughout the country and the most efficient means of marketing such products. It will enable us to act intelligently so as not seriously to deplete our own supplies when permitting the exportation of food products to Europe, and under the bill the authorities may bring into the open those who seek to corner the market. In this time of national stress it prevents the use of food products for purposes other than for food, while the bill provides that if necessary to do so the Government can expend $150,000,000 in taking over fuel and food products, with mines and factories if need be.

Every Member of the House, I believe, will favor the general purpose of the bill. If it affords relief, it may also offer some means of bringing nearer together the producer and the consumer in times of peace as well as in times of war. The strength of a nation is in its citizenship; that citizenship is entitled to every protection that can be afforded, and now that we are engaged in a great war and every resource of government must be conserved it is as necessary to protect our people at home from commercial and economic enemies as it is to protect them from enemies across the water. By so doing we help sustain our soldiers at the front.

During my brief membership in Congress I have endeavored to point out and prevent inexcusable Government waste and useless extravagance, on the theory that the public is heavily taxed to pay the bills, and as a matter of right is entitled to protection from selfishness of interests organized to raid the Treasury for private and local purposes. In some respects this bill carries out that same general proposition. It should pass Congress without delay, and will thereby place in the hands of the administration a powerful agency with which to meet the high cost of living. In my judgment that power will be exercised for the public interest; and believing that the bill is a needed war measure, I will give it my support.

Food Control.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM W. HASTINGS,
OF OKLAHOMA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Thursday, June 28, 1917.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an editorial taken from the Daily Oklahoman under date of June 25, 1917, as follows:

THE HOUSE VOTE ON FOOD CONTROL.

The House has passed the food-control bill by a vote of 365 to 5. It may fairly be assumed that this almost unanimous action of the House is bound to influence the opposition to the measure in the Senate. The chances are that the food-control bill will be a law by July 1, according to the President's schedule.

The Senators who have been fighting the bill have not succeeded in rallying any support to their side. Public opinion is with the President. It is an informed public opinion. Mr. Hoover has stated that the food speculators have robbed the people of this country of a quarter of a billion dollars in the last five months. Possibly that statement is an estimate, which might be difficult to prove, but public judgment accepts it as approximately correct. Other statements made by Hoover are not estimates, but cold, hard facts. He tells us, for instance, that the price of bread in Belgium is 40 per cent lower than in this country, while in France it is 50 per cent lower. Hoover knows about conditions in those countries. That food is much cheaper in England than in the United States everybody knows. It is those facts which have induced the administration to ask for vast powers as to the production and marketing of foodstuffs, and it is those facts which have ranged the people squarely behind the President.

It is understood, of course, that a law of this character could not possibly be passed excepting under the abnormal conditions of the war. Nevertheless, it is not altogether a war condition. Our system of marketing foods has been wrong. It has operated to the serious disadvantage of the farmer and of the consumer. The speculators have gotten the profits. Under the so-called board of trade marketing system the prices of farm products are down when the farmer has them for sale, they go up as soon as they leave the farmers' hands, and by various kinds of manipulation—storage, artificial shortages, etc.—the prices to the consumer are pushed up to "all that the traffic will bear." The exigencies of war have made that system unendurable. It may seriously be doubted if, after the war, the people will ever submit to such tyranny again. Producers and consumers have a community of interest against food gambling.

Price regulation by the Government is no novel, revolutionary experiment in this country. The Government regulates railroad rates. Its experience in this line may not be an unqualified success, but it is incomparably superior to the system of letting the railroads make their own rates. The rates of every public-service corporation in this country are determined by the public. The plan may leave many things to be desired, but it is emphatically the best plan that has yet been found. So with food, so with fuel, so with all the necessaries. Individual initiative must be safeguarded, of course, but individual or corporate initiative must not have the license to practice extortion. Our food gamblers and our anthracite coal barons have operated under that license, but the war has brought their despotism to an end, and peace will not restore it.

River and Harbor Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. ROSE,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tuesday, June 26, 1917.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to print granted during the consideration of the rivers and harbors bill I have to say that my action thereon was governed for the most part by the reports filed upon the part of the majority and minority members of the committee.

It will be remembered that minority members of that committee, composed of men of equal ability with those representing the majority, filed a report wherein it was stated that many of the projects contemplated by the bill were absolutely without merit, and palpable efforts were being made to rush through some reclamation schemes.

Since it is impossible for those of us who represent interior districts in interior States to make any sort of an examination of the rivers and harbors sought to be improved, there is no method provided, excepting the reports filed by the committees and the arguments offered in support of and against the several propositions contained in the bill, for such members to acquaint themselves with the merits or demerits of such proposed legislation.

The objections filed by the minority are either true or not true. If true, then the appropriations suggested should not be made, and if not true, should be shown conclusively. For the above reasons I cast my vote to recommit the bill, and that effort meeting with failure, I supported the bill as it passed the House with the knowledge that there are many projects, including the improvement of the river and harbor facilities along the Delaware River in Pennsylvania, which are worthy projects from any point of view. While it may be truly said that there are many projects offered which may be of the "pork" variety, it is absolutely essential to improve and maintain many of our navigable streams to facilitate the constantly increasing commerce of the Nation, many of which should not suffer by reason of a few schemes proposed which may appear unworthy.

River and Harbor Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD E. ROBBINS,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tuesday, June 26, 1917.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE YOUGHIOGHENY RIVER.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, the amendment offered provides as follows:

Page 31, lines 13 and 14, insert the following paragraph: "Youghiogheny River, Pa., from its mouth to West Newton, including the report of the existing and prospective water terminals."

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this proposed survey of the Youghiogheny River, in Pennsylvania, will not cost the Government a cent. I wish to explain briefly the situation with reference to the Youghiogheny River.

The Youghiogheny River rises in Garrett County, Md., and flows through Maryland, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania a distance of 140 miles and empties into the Monongahela River at the city of McKeesport, in slackwater pool 2 of that river, in which river the system of navigation is now owned and operated by the United States Government.

This amendment merely calls for a reexamination and report of the engineers from data that they already have on this river to the next Congress without cost to the Government.

The Youghiogheny River was improved by a private corporation known as the Youghiogheny Navigation Co., chartered under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania in 1848, and was rendered navigable by two locks and dams from McKeesport to West Newton, a distance of 18.8 miles, being the points between which reexamination is now requested. During that time a very large amount of commerce, principally of coal, with passenger steamers, was operated on this river. Sixteen mines produced coal and shipped over it in that distance, being a mine for nearly every mile of river. These locks and dams were swept away by an extraordinary flood in 1866, and at that time the river was surveyed as a section of the proposed Chesapeake & Ohio Canal, extending from Washington City by the way of Cumberland to the Ohio River using the Youghiogheny and Monongahela Rivers, and hence the locks and dams were never completed. It was generally supposed that the Government would complete the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal and rebuild these locks and dams in accordance with its own plans.

While it is true that railroads have been built on either side of the river—the Pittsburgh division of the Baltimore & Ohio, completed in 1854, and the Youghiogheny division of the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie in 1882—these railroads have developed and carried the coal tonnage formerly tributary to that river because slack-water navigation was entirely destroyed.

This proposed improvement between McKeesport and West Newton has been before the Board of Engineers of the United States at different times in the past.

1. In 1873 Capt. George H. Mabon examined this river in connection with the extension of the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal, and reported in favor of the restoration of navigation by the construction of three locks and dams, each with a lift of 10 feet, to cost $688,000. This report is found in Document No. 37, part 2, page 58.

2. A second examination was made by Col. William E. Merrill in 1880, as found in Engineer's Report of that year, part 3, page 1957, in which he says:

> For the present I would recommend the construction of one lock and dam at a cost of $230,000 and that the work be prosecuted with energy and economy.

3. A third examination was made by Capt. George M. Lehman in 1884, found in Engineer's Report of that year, Appendix HH, part 5, page 3226, in which he favored the extension of this improvement.

4. A fourth examination was made by Maj. Charles F. Powell favoring this improvement, and when I was a Member of the Fifty-fifth Congress I had inserted in the river and harbor bill, approved March 3, 1899, an appropriation of $25,000 for the purpose of having the river examined and surveyed; and in the report made by Maj. Powell, pursuant to said authorization, on September 27, 1899, Maj. Powell concluded his lengthy and exhaustive report thus:

> In view of these deductions I am led to report that, in my opinion, the Youghiogheny River from West Newton to its mouth is worthy of slack-water improvement by the General Government.

On October 11, 1899, Col. Henry M. Roberts, division engineer at Pittsburgh, indorsed and approved Maj. Powell's report thus:

> The three locks Maj. Powell estimates to cost $600,000. In fact, $32,000 will certainly cover the cost of annual maintenance and interest on the cost. This amounts to only 4 cents per ton for each of the 800,000 tons of coal that Maj. Powell estimates as the minimum amount that would annually be taken down the Youghiogheny River if it were improved to West Newton. I can hardly see how the saving in freights would not be more than double this amount; and therefore the improvement is a worthy one.

Nothing further was done in this matter until 1910, because no one took special interest in the project.

In the river and harbor act of June 25, 1910, page 638 contains the following provision:

> Improving the Youghiogheny River, Pa., up to West Newton, in accordance with the report of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, dated December 21, 1908, and printed in the Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 9, Sixty-first Congress, second session, $100,000.

With this sum available the location of the three locks and dams were made and soundings and drillings taken, but no further appropriation was made for the continuance or completion of the work; and in the river and harbor bill of March 4, 1915, there was inserted a provision transferring the balance of the fund, amounting to $87,805.25, to any other river and harbor improvement for which the funds may be needed prior to the 30th of June, 1916.

This proposition is therefore now brought before Congress, having had the unqualified indorsement of the Army engineers and of the Board of Army Engineers at six different times, and adverse report from but one of the engineers, and of the board last year, without an examination into the physical features of the river—merely an examination of the surveys and reports of their predecessors.

Col. Newcomer seems to have reported against this when he was the resident engineer at Pittsburgh in 1907, in a report made on the 10th of October of that year, in which he stated that the stream was not worthy of improvement because "there was lack of interest in the project."

It is believed now, when the interest in waterways has been so increased by the advent of war, that it would be entirely proper to make a reexamination of this project at this time from the surveys and data now in the hands of the Government engineers, and a resurvey, if necessary, and report to the next Congress, so that the improvement may be inserted in the next river and harbor bill and money appropriated sufficient, in addition to the $87,805.25 already credited to the project, to complete the improvement.

It is therefore apparent that not only has this proposition been surveyed and resurveyed but it has been finally planned and the dams and locks actually located, the ground for their foundation tested, and all the preliminary work done, so that this reexamination of the project simply means a reexamination and report on the data already in the hands of the Government.

This is not an original scheme—not an experiment—but is the restoration of navigation that heretofore existed.

In order to give some idea of the coal tonnage that is tributary to the Youghiogheny River, I herewith append the following reports, down to 1913, which are the latest available figures:

[1] 1913 consolidated.

From this table it is very apparent that there is a large acreage of Pittsburgh seam, although diminishing—that is, in part at least—tributary to this stream.

While it is true there are railroads on either side of this river carrying this coal, as there is no water-borne traffic, this coal has to seek the only outlet, to wit, the rail.

This river empties into the Monongahela, pool 2. The city of McKeesport is built on its banks for quite a distance, and there are a number of factories along the Youghiogheny that would have their products shipped by water if slackwater was available. There is urgent necessity for the beginning of the improvement by the construction of the first lock and dam.

Mr. Speaker, during the debate on this bill much has been stated about the decadence of the river traffic, and the Ohio River has been cited repeatedly as an instance of this situation. I deny that this is true. The Ohio River is only partially improved. Until its improvement is completed traffic can not be expected to increase. The Ohio River in its present condition is navigable only about one-fourth of the time, but mark the difference where water navigation is available a greater part of the year.

I therefore submit a table of traffic on the Monongahela River taken from the harbor master's report at Pittsburgh, which shows a constantly increasing traffic on the Monongahela River:

Year.	Products in tons.	Passengers.
1915	12,622,955	704,000
1914	11,143,390	613,381
1913	13,308,796	866,157
1912	12,476,323	796,616
1911	12,519,776	682,807
1910	12,314,664	683,172
1909	12,426,154	699,251
1908	11,454,895	267,043
1907	14,395,816	533,280
1906	12,927,975	271,450
1905	12,259,020	603,716
1904	9,373,448	604,477
1903	12,240,360	702,269
1902	12,252,405	896,500
1901	10,916,489	817,800
1900	8,141,451	884,415

Furthermore, in order to show that this is not the traffic in and around the city of Pittsburgh, I wish to give you an extract from the United States Government report for the month of February, 1916:

In spite of the fact that February was a short month and that at least once high water entirely stopped navigation, the February coal records were high at Lock No. 4, furnishing a true gauge of the conditions in the river coal business along the Monongahela. The total shipments of coal for the month downstream were 17,308,000 bushels. This makes the coal record for the first two months of the year 45,776,000 bushels, and gives a start in the year of a sort that if followed will make this about the best coal year in history.

The report of Lockmaster Sweeney at Lock No. 4 is as follows: "Downstream: Lockages, 355; steamers, 294; boats, barges, and flats, 1,281; coal, 17,308,000 bushels. Upstream: Lockages, 358; steamers, 298; boats, barges, and flats, 1,321; coal, 14,000 bushels.

"Just once during the month, this being February 13, was the river flooded until navigation was stopped. The waters went to 31.7 feet on the lock at this time."

Furthermore, Lock 3 for 1916 shipped a total tonnage of 10,166,514 tons, 9,975,120 tons of which were coal. This indicates clearly the immense tonnage that is moved on the Monongahela River. There can be no doubt, therefore, that if the Youghiogheny were improved it would carry a large and ever-increasing tonnage.

Gentlemen of the committee, it is unfair, as some of the Members have done, to constantly charge this bill with being a proposition to extract money from the United States. I am not aware of the merits of other propositions in this bill; I can not criticize them intelligently. To simply criticize them as without merit or ridicule them because of the strange names that some of them adopt, is, in my mind, unfair, uncalled for, and not the kind of criticism that ought to demand respect and carry conviction in the consideration of legislation in this House.

This proposition was of sufficient merit to recommend its installation originally and its maintenance for a period of over 18 years by private capital from 1848 to 1866. From 1866 until the present time the railroads have been opposing constantly the canalization of all our rivers, fearing them as competitors.

This attitude of the railroads has happily passed. The railroads are now practically under Government control, and indeed practically consolidated under one management. They have admitted their inability to carry the high-class, imperishable freight, leaving slow-moving traffic, such as coal, ore, stone, and building material to the rivers. The United States has expended enormous sums to build the Panama Canal, and it has expended and is expending enormous sums on the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers and is committed to the completion of the canalization of the Ohio. Why not complete the system?

The Youghiogheny is a branch of the Monongahela, which stands in the same relation to the Ohio as a branch line does to the main line of a railroad; it is a feeder and an originator of traffic. There are undeveloped veins of coal in addition to the Pittsburgh vein; there are mills and factories along its banks which would furnish traffic for the Ohio.

This project was recommended by the district engineer for appropriation in the present bill to begin the work in accordance with the authorization and an appropriation made of $100,000 therefor under the rivers and harbors bill of June 25, 1910, which definitely authorizes the construction of the first dam. The division engineer did not refuse it, only passed it up to the board, but the Board of Engineers, I presume, with war conditions facing them, reported "that they did not deem it advisable at the present time."

Hence the inference is that the war conditions approaching caused the project to be held up for the present.

The President has announced that business ought to go on as usual. This House, by the passage of the river and harbor bill, has committed itself to that proposition. The continuation of the improvement of the Ohio has been taken care of by this bill, and appropriations have been made for the harbor at Pittsburgh in the Monongahela River, hence the improvement of the Youghiogheny River is one of the projects that should be authorized under this bill and the actual work appropriated for and begun under the next bill to be presented in December, 1917. By doing this, Congress will recognize a meritorious proposition and grant justice to the stream and to the people residing along and adjacent thereto, who have too long, alas, been denied justice and fair treatment.

The Making of a "Pork-Barrel" Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRA G. HERSEY,
OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 26, 1917,

On the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, as a student of public questions for many years and a diligent reader of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I have been much interested in the past in the making of the annual "pork-barrel" bills in Congress. After reading each year the debates in the RECORD I never could quite understand how it was possible for Congress to enact such legislation that has hitherto brought so much criticism, shame, and disgrace to Congress and to the Nation.

But as a new Member at this special session, having been present at the making of an annual rivers and harbors bill, I now understand as never before how such vicious legislation comes to be enacted.

Years ago when the Republican Party was in control of this Nation, and through its tariff policies had made the Nation rich and prosperous with an overflowing treasury, it became a serious question what to do with the surplus. As a solution of that problem was born the idea of an annual rivers and harbors bill; since then billions have been wasted by the United States in aiding and developing worthless projects in many rivers and harbors in our land. Much good has been accomplished in a few cases in the way of better navigation and commerce, but much of this money has been lost on worthless schemes, until finally, under the criticism of the Democratic Party, the Republican Party was driven from power, largely due to this extravagance and to the evils that have grown out of this kind of legislation.

With the advent of the Democratic Party in power in the Nation these old, disgraceful methods have not been changed; but, on the contrary, new plans have been devised to further waste the money of the people. During the last four years of democratic control the annual pork-barrel measures have been enacted with all of the old and many new disgraceful features, and to-day we find that the administration is standing behind the present rivers and harbors bill demanding that it be passed now as a war measure.

Early in this special session it was announced that only legislation necessary for military preparedness, the national defense, and emergencies, called for by the present war should demand or receive the attention of this Congress; it therefore came to the people of this country as a great surprise when the Committee on Rivers and Harbors—in the midst of this emergency legislation—reported out this rivers and harbors bill and demanded its passage immediately as a war necessity.

Let us be frank and honest with each other and with the country. This is not a war measure. It has no place in our present legislation. It is the same old annual "pork-barrel" bill. It failed of passage at the last regular session in the Senate and has been redated and again reported to the House without any material change. It calls for about $30,000,000 from the people to finance over 400 different projects in every State in the Union, work that can not possibly be completed during the present war, if it continues for a reasonable time.

There are now $32,000,000 unexpended for the maintenance of rivers and harbors. This is sufficient to take care of this business until after the war, and to add to this thirty millions more at this time of supreme demands upon our people would be an insult to the taxpayers, and such an extravagant appropriation bill ought to be vetoed by the President.

A majority of the Rivers and Harbors Committee favor this bill, while seven members of that committee are opposed to the measure as wasteful and extravagant and not in any sense an emergency or war measure. The majority of the committee are interested in the passage of the bill by having in it large appropriations for their own State. Over twenty millions of these appropriations will go to the States represented by members of that great committee. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] has advocated great appropriations of millions to be spent along the Mississippi and Missouri and other rivers of the South.

The gentleman on the committee from New York [Mr. HULBERT] has, with great ability and zeal, advocated the appropriation of millions for the rivers and harbors of his State. The gentleman on the committee from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER] has been very zealous to get a big appropriation, of about a million dollars, for the Ohio River; and the gentleman on the committee from California [Mr. OSBORNE] has been very diligent in securing nearly a million and a half for the Pacific coast. The committee has been ably assisted in these projects by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who wants millions for his State of Pennsylvania.

And thus it comes about that when this bill is reported in the House it does not pass into the hands and control of the leaders of the two great parties, but is taken in charge by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, who control the time of debate and attempt to force it through by the old-time methods.

The able and distinguished leader of the Democratic party in the House from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] absents himself during the debate, takes no part therein, and leaves the leadership of the House on the Democratic side to the Rivers and Harbors Committee. The brilliant leader of the Republicans, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], also takes a vacation during the debate, and leaves this bill in charge of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, while the administration has read into the record of the debate its indorsement of the measure.

During the progress of this debate I have learned something about the political part played by the annual "pork-barrel" bill. The gentleman from California on the committee [Mr. OSBORNE], in the course of his remarks favoring the bill, said, in substance, that the late candidate of the Republican Party for President, Justice Hughes, while on his tour in the West in the late campaign, criticized these "pork-barrel" bills and gave the people of the West to understand that if he was elected President he would veto them, and he attributes the defeat of the Republican Party and its loss of California to this opposition of rivers and harbors legislation by Mr. Hughes.

I believe the gentleman from California was right. It furnishes the most reasonable solution of the loss of California that I have heard, and I have no doubt that the loss to the Republicans of the old stand-pat State of Ohio was due to the fact that Ohio had then and has now in this bill an appropration of over a million dollars.

Such is the result of vicious legislation. Rivers and harbors bills as enacted in the past and as forced through Congress to-day will result in the defeat of the Democratic Party. It has hitherto made and defeated Presidents; it has elected and defeated Members of Congress, and with brazen effrontery it declares to-day that it will defeat for office men who have the courage of their convictions and dare to stand against this wastefulness and extravagance in the Government.

I have given this present bill very careful attention, having been present every moment during the many days of debate in the House. I have carefully studied the merits of the different projects and have arrived at the conclusion that outside of about a dozen projects which no doubt have merit and ought to be approved, the balance of about 400 items can not be defended as necessary either in time of war or in times of peace. They are neither war measures nor will they ever assist even in any material way in enlarging or aiding the commerce of the country. They simply furnish a large fund to be spent in the several States in certain alleged public improvements that are to be washed away and destroyed at every flood time. Millions are to be dumped into rivers and streams that have no commerce and never will have any; millions are to be spent in projects that will give no return to the Government nor add to the wealth of the United States. One hundred and six old surveys are incompleted and 75 new surveys are called for in this bill, which is simply a preparation for another annual rivers and harbors bill, and which will call to its task the work and services of all our Army engineers, who are now so much needed in other work in this great war.

The true viciousness of this legislation is not apparent upon its face. The bill is so drawn that every State in the Nation has some part of this great appropriation. This is explained on the ground that it is necessary that every State should have some appropriation so as to hold its Representatives and Senators in favor of the bill. I wanted, if possible, to feel perfectly free to vote for this bill if it had merit and to vote against it if in my opinion it was bad legislation. I early found, however, that it was very hard to take and keep an unbiased and unprejudiced position and at the same time meet the wishes and desires of the people of my State.

The people of Portland, the largest city in my State, were eager to get incorporated into the rivers and harbors bill an amendment for the development of Portland Harbor, a very meritorious proposition, and one which I favored. Learning of my opposition to the rivers and harbors bill, the people of Portland knew that the defeat of the rivers and harbors bill would, of course, defeat the Portland amendment to be attached to the bill, and consequently I was flooded with letters and telegrams from that city demanding that I should vote for the whole bill, good or bad, right or wrong, to save the good project of Portland from defeat. Many of these letters were insults; others threats demanding that I should surrender any opinion I might have formed in regard to the bill and to vote for the whole measure, thus saving Portland's share. The great press of that city took up the matter and wrote many editorials, of which the following are specimens:

[From the Portland Evening Express, Monday, June 11, 1917.]

HERSEY CHIEF STUMBLING BLOCK OF HARBOR BILL.

Information from Washington that three of the members of the Maine delegation in Congress were said to be opposed to the passage of the pending rivers and harbors appropriation bill caused quite a stir in Portland, for that bill carries with it a clause providing for deepening Portland Harbor Channel to 35 feet. The Members that were said to be opposed to the measure are Congressmen PETERS, WHITE, and HERSEY.

The chamber of commerce got busy at once and called together the members of its harbor development committee, all of whom attended a meeting which occupied a couple of hours of the forenoon.

* * * * * * *

The committee got into communication by telephone or wire with the Members of Congress in question and with men of influence throughout the State. Congressman PETERS, who is at his home in Ellsworth, informed the committee that he is not opposed to the measure. He is in favor of the bill, but will not be in Washington when the House votes on the measure Wednesday, but he is paired with a Member who is opposed.

Chairman Merrill of the committee talked by telephone with Gov. Milliken, who said he had discussed the matter with all of the members of the Maine delegation in Washington, and is doing what he can in favor of the passage of the bill. He is inclined to believe that Congressman WHITE will vote for the bill, but said it is impossible to do anything with Congressman HERSEY.

All day the wires have been kept busy, and the chamber suggests that the more letters and telegrams that are sent by Maine business men to Representatives HERSEY and WHITE urging them to aid in the development of Maine by voting for the appropriation bill the better they will become convinced that Maine is in earnest in the matter.

Many business and professional men are sending personal telegrams to the Maine Congressmen to vote in favor of rivers and harbors appropriation bill, and every person interested in the development of Maine is being urged to use influence to secure the passage of the bill providing for a 35-foot channel in Portland Harbor.

Telegrams urging Congressman IRA G. HERSEY, of Houlton, and WALLACE H. WHITE, Jr., to vote for the passage of the bill were sent to them to-day.

Hon. Frank E. Guernsey, of Dover, has been urged to use his influence in securing the passage of the bill. He received telegrams from the Portland Chamber of Commerce and also from President Flagg, of the Maine State Board of Trade, to-day. Gov. Milliken has been asked to urge the support of the bill, and a telegram to Gov. Milliken was sent by Mayor Wilford G. Chapman, President H. T. Hooper, of the Portland Chamber of Commerce, and banking and professional men of this State. Telegrams were also sent to Congressman L. B. GODDALL and Rear Admiral R. E. Peary requesting them to do everything in their power toward securing the passage of the bill.

[Editorial in Daily Eastern Argus, Portland, June 12, 1917.]

The Chamber of Commerce of Portland, Me., should never rest until it has probed to the bottom the reasons for the opposition of Congressmen HERSEY, PETERS, and WHITE to the rivers and harbors bill, which carries with it the item for the deepening of Portland Harbor. What set of profiteers brought their influence to bear on these men? They owe the State an answer.

I thought that my colleague [Mr. WHITE] and myself were the only victims of such a propaganda, but I early found that hundreds of fellow Members of the House were receiving like treatment from home, and that this rivers and harbors bill had debauched the conscience of the people to such an extent that every State wanted a share of the Treasury when it would come to their locality.

I also discovered another thing—that the millions to be spent along the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers in the South were expected to hold in line the "solid South"; the millions to be spent along the Ohio and western coast were intended to make solid in favor of the bill Members from those favored sections. The great States of New York and Pennsylvania, which were receiving such magnificent millions under the bill, were expected to stand solidly in line behind the committee.

Here and there a great newspaper whose locality was not especially interested spoke out its honest thought. In my own

State the Lewiston Journal, founded by the late Nelson Dingley, said, June 23, of this rivers and harbors bill:

THE $26,000,000 PORK BILL.

If Congress enacts the $26,000,000 river and harbor pork while folks are subscribing three billions to liberty and $100,000,000 to Red Cross, and while the trusts take 300 per cent profit, look out to see the Taft and Wilson policy torn to tatters by and by when folks catch on. The river and harbor job was never defensible, but to-day when patriotism and decent principle must necessarily be embodied in legislation if we are to win this war the most dangerous enemies of the Nation are not hyphenated Germans but hyphenated plutocrats and grafters. Should this pork bill be passed and signed by the President, the fewer proclamations which his excellency emits for pure democracy the better. But let Congress first display a little "hoss" sense.

As a rule, however, "pork" has silenced the great American press in nearly every State where there was a large appropriation made in the rivers and harbors bill, and this caused no surprise, for Congress has become accustomed to the "old order of things."

When the bill came up for debate a large majority of the Members absented themselves from the House, many leaving the city for a vacation and others paired on final passage of the bill so they would not have the responsibility of voting for or against amendments to the bill.

A few Members made a heroic fight at first against the bill, but after repeated defeats in vain attempts to secure amendments they gave up the contest. A point of order was made against a certain project as not being properly in the bill. The Chair sustained the point of order and ruled out the project. An appeal was taken from the Chair, and the Chair was overruled, setting aside a correct decision on parliamentary law. And so the fight goes on. It is an old saying, "What is the Constitution between friends." It is now fast becoming an expression among Members, "What is parliamentary law when you want to get through a rivers and harbors bill."

I do not wish to be understood that in anything I have said that I mean or intend to reflect upon the honesty and integrity of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors or the membership of this House. I do not for one moment assume to be the guardian of the conscience of any man. It is the vicious system that has grown up in this Nation through the years that I disapprove. The members of the committee that indorse this bill believe that they are doing thereby honest service for their people. The Members of this House who to-day vote for this bill have grown to believe in the righteousness of the projects in which they are interested.

When a people or community year after year have received from the Public Treasury large sums for their rivers and harbors, they come to look upon this annual appropriation as a matter of right, and naturally regard any opposition from their Representatives as coming from those who oppose the best interests of their State. And Members of Congress who are interested, as they should be, in getting large appropriations for their own State come very easily to believe in and to honestly indorse and work for their own projects, and in looking after the special interests of their own constituents they do not pay much attention to the projects of their fellow Members and honestly vote with the committee for the whole bill.

After a Member has once voted for one of these pork-barrel bills he has deprived himself of any power and influence to oppose a future bill in which his State has no interest. This was illustrated in the debate yesterday upon the bill. I quote from the RECORD:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is making a gallant fight against this bill, has drawn to his aid the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES], who sits at my left and who occassionally reads off some statistics that he has gathered from some report or other, or he reads from some letter from an individual who may have more or less interest in the proceedings. I do not know just why the gentleman from Michigan rises so often to the aid of the gentleman from Wisconsin unless it is that Michigan has been so well provided for heretofore in appropriations made by Congress that it does not need and further help. * * * Up to 1915, not including appropriations for 1916 and the appropriations in this bill, the State of Michigan has been taken care of to the amount of $59,378,000. That is nearly $60,000,000 that Congress has given to the State of Michigan alone. Why, of course, the gentleman from Michigan can afford to cut out all other appropriations now. He has "got his."

During the discussion of this bill, I have been reminded of an incident that occurred some years ago in my own State legislature: A certain country representative from the northern part of my district was sent to the legislature. He was charged with the sole duty of getting an appropriation for a certain bridge for his town. He made his canvass and won his election on his promise that he would get that bridge appropriation. As soon as the legislature convened he found some one to draw and introduce a resolution for an appropriation for his bridge. In the course of time many like bridge resolutions were presented by members from other localities. He was anxious about his bridge, so he sought out the members who favored appropriations for bridges, and they got together and held a meeting and agreed to support each other's projects. The next morning in the house the speaker proceeded with the second reading of the bridge resolutions. The country member thinking that his trade settled the matter sprang to his feet and said, "Mr. Speaker, this is a mistake. This resolve should go no further. We fellows who have bridge bills have traded!"

So very early in this debate I found out that it was no use to contest this bill for it would pass the House, the reason understood was like the reason given by the member of the Maine Legislature when he said, "We have traded."

I hope the time will come, and not far distant, when uninfluenced by fear or favor the improvement of our waterways may be undertaken by the Congress, and that those projects that bring wealth and prosperity to the Nation shall receive calm, unbiased, and judicial consideration, and those schemes to loot the Treasury that have so disgraced people and party in the past will be known no more in all our land. Until that day, I must oppose and vote against this bill and continue to heed the apt and forceful admonition of our President that—

This is the time for America to correct her unpardonable fault of wastefulness and extravagance.

Food and Fuel Conservation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. HICKS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, in consideration of a bill so drastic and far-reaching in its effects as the pending measure, and so entirely without precedent, the first question that arises is whether national necessity warrants its enactment. It is a war measure and would not be before us if this Nation was not engaged in a conflict that demands the most efficient utilization of all our resources. This bill has for its purpose the security and defense of the Republic by the regulation and control of the food and fuel supplies of the Nation.

With the cost of living now at a point which is causing hardship and suffering to many of our people, we are confronted by a condition, which unless ameliorated will lead to serious results. There is a shortage in the world's food supply, due to the partial failure of the wheat crop in France, England, and Argentina. This shortage is augmented by the increased consumption of the armies in the field; by the reduced productivity of land due to the reduction of man power; by the sinking of cargoes by submarines; by the scarcity of ocean tonnage for the shipment of supplies from Australia and India, and by the cessation of the normal supply from Russia, Roumania, and Bulgaria. A serious emergency exists which demands immediate intervention by the Federal Government, and I regret that the passage of this measure has been so long delayed. With 1,000,000,000 acres of tillable land in the United States, only part of which is cultivated, we produced last year farm products to the value of $13,500,000,000, which provided not only for our own wants but enabled us to export large quantities of food to Europe. It is estimated that in the period between July 1, 1914, and January 1, 1917, the cost of food in Russia has risen 165 per cent; in Germany, 110 per cent; in France, 85 per cent; in England, 65 per cent; in neutral Sweden, 45 per cent; and in the United States, 25 per cent. In the last six months, however, the prices of basic foodstuffs in this country have increased from 30 to 65 per cent. When it is realized that in many of the countries dependent upon us for supplies the prices to the consumer are lower than they are in the country which produces them, the necessity for remedial legislation becomes urgent and imperative.

Let me give a few startling statistics published by the Government.

This bill does not mitigate against the farmer or the retailer doing legitimate business, as both are exempt from the provisions of this act. All must realize that the producer is entitled to fair and liberal profits for his produce, taking into consideration the cost of everything that enters into the production of his crops. Transportation and distribution, essential to both producer and consumer, are also entitled to just compensation for services fairly rendered. Under this bill the consumer is assured that the price he pays will bear a reasonable and just relation to the price received by the farmer. The bill aims to encourage production, improve the methods of distribution, prohibit manipulation and conspiracy in the enhancement of prices, and prevent hoarding and the willful destruction of necessities. It seeks to regulate boards of trade, eliminate unfair practices, and reduce waste by the regulation of the use of cereals in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages.

This bill provides also for the regulation of fuel supplies, and if its provisions are fully carried out should relieve the unsatisfactory coal situation. Railroads should not be permitted to store coal in cars or at distributing centers to the detriment of consumers and quick and certain transit between the mines and the retail dealers should be insisted upon.

This bill recognizes the patriotism of American industry and does not seek to hamper or restrict legitimate business. It strikes at the food speculator and the exploiter of the necessities of life, and creates a power to crush by the arm of the law those who in greed and avarice extort exorbitant profits from the needs of the people.

We have mobilized the manhood of America; we have mobilized our wealth and our commerce, and by this bill we mobilize our food and fuel supplies for the protection of our people and in order that the great conflict across the seas may be brought to a speedy and triumphant termination.

The Second-Class Postage Subsidy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY T. RAINEY,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 29, 1917.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject, I herewith print editorials from the Philadelphia Record of May 24, 1917:

Reasonable objections to the readjustment of postal tariffs for second-class matter on a zonal basis could not possibly be found. In the transportation cost of bulky mail pieces the distance carried must be taken into consideration. The difference between the cost of transporting a 1-ounce letter 100 miles or 1,000 is so small that it is negligible by comparison with the convenience of a uniform rate. In the case of a periodical weighing nearly a pound, however, the difference would be appreciable, and a differentiation of rates according to distance is as desirable as it is with parcel-post matter. The rates finally agreed to by the House in its discussion of the war-revenue bill would probably yield about one-half the amount actually paid by the Government to the railways for carriage, to say nothing of the cost of handling by the post-office employees. Instead of placing a burden on education, as Mr. MANN asserts, the Government under this measure would still give a liberal bonus to the educators.

DOES NOT SPEAK FOR THE PAPERS.

Congressman J. HAMPTON MOORE, of Philadelphia, did not represent the views of the Philadelphia newspapers in his defeated proposition to fix a flat rate of 2 cents a pound for carrying second-class matter in the mails. Neither did he represent a view entertained by any considerable number of his constituents.

His proposition—defeated as it should be—was to make the newspapers of Philadelphia and elsewhere pay more than the cost of carrying them through the mails as a means to continuing the policy of a Government subsidy of millions of dollars annually to a few magazine publishers.

The special beneficiaries of the long-established and unbusinesslike rate of postage on second-class matter, which costs the Government millions of dollars every year, have, whenever their subsidy was threatened, pretended to represent the newspapers of the country in opposing a change. They have not represented the newspapers as the term "newspaper" is generally understood. Neither did Mr. MOORE represent the newspapers in his ridiculous effort to defeat the zone system as proposed.

As a matter of fact, the postal rate long in force has been the greatest handicap to the small newspapers of the country. The weekly and monthly periodicals, carried by the Government at a loss into the territory of such newspapers, have never failed to argue that the advertiser did not need to use the local newspaper because he covered the field of the little fellow.

Only the other day one of the opponents of the zone system of postal rates on second-class matter drew the daily newspaper into the argument by taking a New York daily paper as an illustration. He sought to create the impression that it would be unfair to increase the rate of postage on that particular newspaper in face of the fact that it charges its mail subscribers three times as much as is charged to its subscribers in New York. But, of course, he did not call attention to the fact that what could be had for 1 cent in New York costs the resident of Philadelphia, Washington, Chicago, Denver, or San Francisco three times as much.

ST. LOUIS STAR.

On the same subject I herewith print a telegram received from Mr. John C. Rober, owner of the St. Louis Star, St. Louis, Mo.:

ST. LOUIS, MO., June 21, 1917.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Washington, D. C.:

As owner of the St. Louis Star, it is my opinion that the only proper plan of taxing newspapers is on the basis of the service they demand from the Post Office Department. The zone system of second-rate postage would require these newspapers which have built up great circulations in districts remote from the publication office to contribute a larger amount for the support of the Government than the newspapers which have confined themselves to their legitimate fields and have not compelled the Post Office Department to carry a vast tonnage over enormous distances at great loss to the Government. Whether regarded as a revenue measure or a service charge the principle is the same, and is to my mind the only correct method to apply in framing a revenue bill.

JOHN C. ROBER.

NEBRASKA EDITORS FAVOR ZONE SYSTEM.

The following article, indicating the position taken by the Nebraska Press Association, appeared in the Omaha News of June 21, 1917:

EDITORS FAVOR TAX ON PAPERS' NET INCOMES.

The Nebraska Press Association, at its closing session Wednesday afternoon, adopted resolutions favoring a tax on the net incomes of newspapers, and suggesting that if it becomes necessary to change second-class postage rates that the zone system be adopted.

NEW YORK TRIBUNE.

The following editorial appeared in the New York Tribune of Monday, June 4, 1917:

TAKE AWAY THE SUBSIDY.

The periodical publishers who appeared before the Senate Finance Committee on Saturday, in a desperate effort to defeat an increase in second-class postal rates, were unusually frank in their arguments. Their one fixed idea is to retain the subsidy which the Government now grants them in the shape of undercharges on the carriage of second-class mail matter.

They admit that they want to go on enjoying that subsidy, and they realize that, once it has been withdrawn, the Government will never restore it. They are therefore anxious to substitute for an equalization of second-class rates, which will be permanent in character because justified by sound principles of postal administration, a purely emergency tax on the volume of newspaper and magazine advertising. They could ask for a repeal of this tax when the war is over. But they have no hope that a scientific revision of second-class rates, through the introduction of the zone system created by the House bill, can ever be upset. It is obvious that a trial of such a scheme for a year or two would vindicate it completely. There would then be as little chance of a relapse to the old flat-rate undercharge on second-class matter for the benefit of publishers unwilling to pay their way as there would be of a revival of the old parcel post flat-rate system, with its ludicrous limitation on weight, for the benefit of the once all-powerful express companies.

A general tax on advertising, with a retention of the discriminating and inadequate flat rate on second-class matter, would simply continue the glaring inequalities which every investigating commission has found to exist in the second-class mail service. The Government has been devoting millions of dollars every year to promoting the sale of periodicals and newspapers which avail themselves of the long-haul privileges granted under existing postal laws. It carries bulky second-class mail from New York to San Francisco for the same charge for which it carries it from New York to Philadelphia. The newspaper or magazine sent 1,000 miles or 3,000 miles is delivered at a heavy loss to the Post Office Department. Circulation facilities are thus furnished at the public expense and publications of wide circulation are unfairly benefited.

There is no reason why the Government should carry mail of any sort at a loss. There is even less reason why it should make the same charge for carrying bulky matter 3,000 miles as it does for carrying it 50 miles. The zone system of rates, which proportions cost to service, is the only rational system to apply to second-class or to parcel-post matter. It establishes justice between different classes of shippers and it brings the Government a proper return for the longer haul. The inadequate flat rate is an undesirable form of Government charity.

Mr. SIMMONS, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, showed a thorough grasp of the situation when he told the publishers who appeared at Washington that "now is the psychological time to dispose of the postal-rate question." That is the truth. Congress has been wrestling with the problem for many years, and every intelligent Congressman knows that the present second-class rate scheme is vicious and out of date. Now, the publication business is expected to do its part in providing more revenue for the Government. It can save the Treasury $40,000,000 or $60,000,000 or $80,000,000 a year (according to various estimates) by surrendering its present second-class mail subsidy. It should be willing to do this without protest. It should greatly prefer to a general tax on advertising an abandonment of its ancient and costly second-class privilege—a privilege, too, whose benefits are absorbed by a relatively small class of publications.

The zone system of second-class rates must come in time, because it is fair and scientific. Congress knows that it is wrong, but has lacked the courage to antagonize its powerful beneficiaries. Now, the exigencies of war make the accomplishment of this long-delayed postal reform easy. We trust that Chairman SIMMONS will live up to his convictions and will hold the committee with him. An emergency tax on newspaper and periodical advertising will be unnecessary if the second-class rates are intelligently readjusted. The bill passed by the House of Representatives made such a readjustment. In our opinion, the Senate should go back to the House provision in spite of the clamor of the subsidists who are now besetting the Finance Committee.

OAKLAND (CAL.) ENQUIRER.

I print the following editorial from the Oakland (Cal.) Enquirer of June 1, 1917:

LET SECOND-CLASS MATTER PAY ITS OWN FREIGHT.

Advancement of postal rates upon periodical publications to a figure designed to cover the postal cost of transportation, as provided in the war-revenue bill which passed the House of Representatives May 23, was wisely adopted. That these profitable publications should continue to be delivered throughout the American Postal Service at a loss to the Government of $100,000,000 annually is without justification upon any ground. These publications are like any other commodity—made to sell—and should pay their own way if transported by mail, the same as a farmer's products pay by parcel post. Mail matter should pay as it goes, whether periodicals, letters, or anything else, and in proportion to its weight and distance carried.

The argument that these periodicals are educative and should, therefore, be privileged—transported at public expense—is impudent. From one-fourth to nine-tenths in bulk or weight of these periodicals is advertising matter—nothing else. On an average two-thirds of their weight is paid advertising, much of it at rates aggregating hundreds of dollars per page per issue. Does any one pretend that this advertising matter should be transported at public expense, simply to enrich greedy publishers? The pretense is absurd.

The House might have provided that the meritorious reading matter of these magazines be carried through the mails at present nominal rates, had it thought wise to do so, but evidently it did not think this proportion to be great enough to make segregation worth while. And it was pretty nearly right, notwithstanding the great quantity of really meritorious matter carried by some publications. About two-thirds of the $100,000,000 annual loss to the mail service in carrying this class of matter is caused by transporting pure advertising. In some instances advertising—not dissemination of knowledge—is the sole purpose of circulating alleged magazines, "scientific" pamphlets, and the like.

The kick made by the publishers in these cases is not made because of any hardship which a just postal rate may impose, but simply because they prefer the public, the whole public, which bears the post-office deficiency bill, to continue to pay their postage charges, so that they may pocket the $100,000,000 deficit equivalent, as they too long have done.

The proposed postage charge for this class of matter in the war-revenue bill is to be based upon weight and distance as is correct—just as all other transportation charges are computed. A New York publication weighing 1 pound should not be transported and delivered by carrier in the remote sections of Alaska—by reindeer carrier, 500 miles from a post office—as cheaply as delivered within 10 miles of the place of issue, yet this is the contention of these greedy publishers.

The fact is, not one of these bulky and highly specialized publications is read by 1 in 100 of the masses of the people, yet under the present system the other 99 must pay this postal deficit. Not 1 in 1,000 of the masses ever see nine-tenths of these publications, yet they are asked to pay the postage bill for their transportation to the few who buy and read them. Is it fair that this vast majority who do not receive these publications should be taxed that a few may read them and a handful of publishers may become rich by printing them?

It is said that many of these fungus-growth magazines would be forced to suspension if compelled to pay legitimate postal rates. What of it? Must the people pay the freight on a merchant's shipments to keep that merchant in business, or to guarantee him profits? The fact is that most every one of these magazines could be sold at a big profit at present prices, the publishers paying the full postal charge now proposed in the war-revenue bill. The others have no legitimate ground of complaint.

California Congressmen who voted to increase postal rates upon the zonal system sufficient to pay the Government the cost of transportation of all second-class matter, the same as is required of shippers by parcel post, voted precisely as they should. No other course were possible in justice. No publisher should be subsidized by the Government, unless all be so treated, and no just publisher desires such advantage.

If the publisher's product is to be transported at Government expense, why not the farmer's?

THE PUBLISHERS' AUXILIARY.

I print extracts from the Publishers' Auxiliary of May 12, 1917:

POSTAL MEASURE FAIR TO COUNTRY PAPERS—REVENUE BILL WOULD LESSEN BIG DAILY AND MAGAZINE COMPETITION—BILL PROVIDES FOR RETENTION OF "FREE-IN-COUNTY" CLAUSE—PUBLISHERS SHOULD URGE ITS PASSAGE.

[By Wright A. Patterson, editor in chief Western Newspaper Union.]

WASHINGTON.

Regardless of what it may have done to the larger daily newspapers and the magazines, the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives has cared for the country press in the new revenue bill just introduced.

If the bill as it is introduced in the House should become a law, it would increase the postal charges on a majority of the small papers to a very small extent, it would give the country publisher his opportunity, for it would materially lessen the competition he now has from the metropolitan daily papers and the magazines.

* * * * * * *

On no other provision of the new revenue bill was there a harder fight made in the committee than on this postal-tax provision. Metropolitan newspaper and magazine publishers generally fought to the last minute to prevent the introduction of the bill carrying these postal provisions, and there is no doubt about their continuing the fight, now that the bill is before Congress, and forcing modification in the proposed rates if it is possible. Members of the Ways and Means Committee, however, believe the bill will become a law with this section of it practically as drafted by the committee. They expect the active support of the country press and of Congressmen from country districts and Senators representing States of large rural population.

CONSIDERATION DUE RURAL PRESS.

The country press is fully entitled to the consideration the Ways and Means Committee has shown it. For years virtually all legislation affecting newspapers, where it has been at all beneficial, has been in the interest of the publications of the larger cities, and has seriously crippled the papers of the smaller cities and towns, while it is this latter class of papers that has unselfishly represented the best interests of the Nation as a whole.

At the present time the country press is giving loyal support to the Government in its efforts to increase and conserve the food supply of the Nation, to recruit help for the farms, to secure recruits for the armed forces of the Government, and in fact in every way is doing its "bit"—and it is a big "bit"—in the war with Germany.

The members of the Ways and Means Committee realized that to impose a heavy postal tax on the country press would mean putting a large percentage of these papers out of business, and that the Government could not afford to lose the tremendous influence they wield with the people of the smaller cities, the towns, and the farms.

URGE PASSAGE OF BILL.

I want to urge country newspaper publishers to give the Ways and Means Committee every possible assistance in securing the passage of this feature of the revenue bill without amendment. I want to urge them to do this for the good of the Nation and for the best interest of the country press. There is no legitimate reason why the Government should carry newspapers and magazines for long distances at a heavy loss when there are in each section of the country newspapers that can capably serve the people of these sections. There is no reason why the papers of Chicago should be carried at a loss to the Government into Iowa or Wisconsin or Michigan and other States, when there are newspapers in all of these States that can and do serve the people of these States. This is true regarding the circulation of papers out of every large city.

This bill, should it become a law, will give the publishers of the country daily and weekly newspapers their opportunity. It will force the price of the large city publications, when they are circulated in sections at considerable distances from the point of publication, to a subscription price that will make competition with them a possibility. And the law should do these things. The Nation should not cater to the cities and assist in creating that centralization of interests that has been going on for a number of years, largely because of legislation in favor of the cities.

But the publishers of the country daily and weekly newspapers must improve the opportunity this bill, if it becomes a law, will give them. The reading public will demand service of its newspapers, and if the local publishers do not give service the public will demand a repeal of the law, and Congress will meet this demand.

WRITE YOUR CONGRESSMAN.

Every publisher of a country daily or weekly newspaper should immediately write the Congressman representing his district and the Senators representing his State urging the passage, without amendment, of this postal-tax section of the revenue bill. They should not be satisfied with writing once only, but should continue to write until the bill has been passed by both Houses of Congress. They should also make an effort to get the people of their committees to write Congressmen and Senators in support of this same section of the revenue bill, for the opportunity for better newspapers means the opportunity for better towns. It means less mail-order competition for the local merchants, and less centralization for the merchandising interests of the large cities.

Another feature of the revenue bill that is of extreme interest to newspaper publishers is that providing for a tax on billboards, electric sign, street car, and other forms of advertising, except that in newspapers and magazines. The tax imposed is to be 5 per cent of the amount received for the advertising.

Again I want to urge every country publisher to write to-day.

THE NECESSITY FOR SUBSIDIZING A "NATIONAL PRESS."

The following suggestions were prepared and submitted to me by the publisher of a large and important Chicago newspaper:

SUGGESTIONS TO REBUT ARGUMENT THAT THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT MUST MAINTAIN THE PRESENT SYSTEM OF MAIL RATES BECAUSE A "NATIONAL PRESS," OR A GROUP OF PUBLICATIONS WITH A NATION-WIDE CIRCULATION, IS NECESSARY TO THE WELFARE AND UNITY OF FEELING OF SO LARGE A NATION.

1. It rests with those who make such an assertion and ask enormous privileges based upon it to prove it true. They haven't even started.

2. A large share of the so-called national press is purely commercial in character, and takes no sides on any question until the balance of public sentiment has been indicated in a way to admit of no mistake. There are exceptions. Collier's, the Metropolitan, and a few more made no apologies, express or implied, for the Kaiser and his allies on this side of the water. But the national papers with the greatest circulation dodged the entire issue as long as they could, and the average magazine was for two years far less clear-cut on this matter than the average metropolitan newspaper.

Obviously, there can be no valid plea for a press that is engaged purely in making money and does not even try to educate the public till the public has indicated the kind of education it wants.

3. The type of national press developed under present conditions is not merely neutral and colorless but is not truly national. It represents to an utterly disproportionate degree the sentiments and interests of the section in which it is published—the strip of territory along the Atlantic from New York to Philadelphia.

4. So far as this national press is effective in its appeal, it works injury by drawing into its net a disproportionate number of clever writers and observers who otherwise would be distributed more evenly about the land.

5. There is no more reason to believe that the country's interests are served by concentrating its national publishing business in New York than that those interests would be served by artificially concentrating the Nation's finances or manufactures in the same place. In every other field of activity the efforts of the Government have been to decentralize things, to get them back closer to the people. Witness the Federal reserve act. Why should the matter of a "national press" be an exception?

6. Under the present system there has been a deterioration in the character of the "national press." Passing by all such debatable questions as muckraking and the literary quality of fiction, it is certain that 20 years ago there were no such magazines as Snappy Stories, Smart Set, etc., going through the United States mails. The newspapers in the same time have become cleaner and more free from objectionable matter than before. So it comes to this: The subsidized branch of the publishing business is degenerating morally, while the branch that has received no favors and now is asked to bear crushing burdens has been improving.

Under the leave granted me I herewith print an article by Charles William Burrows, president of the National One-Cent Letter Postage Association, which appeared in the Unpopular Review for April and June, 1914:

OUR GOVERNMENT SUBVENTION TO LITERATURE.

M. Paul Otlet, the secretary of the Brussels International Bibliographic Institute, places the total annual book production of the entire globe at approximately 150,000 volumes per annum.

Señor Eduardo Ravarro Salvador, a distinguished Spanish author, has compiled with great care similar statistics, which are printed in the Madrid Heraldo, and his estimate closely confirms the other, giving approximately a little over 160,000 for the year 1911.

A dozen years ago, when book production was smaller than to-day, Mr. Percy L. Parker, in the New York Independent, gave the total number of books issued by 13 countries in an average year as 77,250, which would be not as large as the estimates of either Señor Salvador or M. Otlet, but is nevertheless of use in confirming them and increasing the probability that a mean of the three estimates may be quite substantially near to the truth.

Mr. Joseph B. Gilder, in an article in the New York Times for January 25, 1914, states that our ambassador to the court of St. James, Mr. Page, of the publishing firm of Doubleday, Page & Co., said not long before departing for his post that American men spend less for books than for neckties, and American women less than for the buttons on their frocks. The same article quotes the Boston bookseller, Mr. W. B. Clarke, who is chairman of the executive committee of the American Booksellers' Association, as saying that the per capita consumption of books is less than of any other commodity.

Following Mr. Gilder's article and using the statistics of the Statesman's Yearbook as to population and of the World Almanac as to book production in 1910, we find that in Switzerland there was 1 book printed for every 872 population; in Japan 1 to 1,224; in Germany 1 to 2,075; in France 1 to 3,809; in Great Britain 1 to 3,808; and in the United States 1 to 7,295. In 1911 our showing was not quite so good.

According to statistics prepared for the World Almanac from sources indicated above and from other data, the number of books issued annually in the United States seems to vary in late years but little either way from 10,000. It would appear, in fact, that the United States issues, roughly, only about 6 per cent, or, if we deduct new editions and translations, only about 4 per cent of the total.

Further, by an examination of these various and varying statistics from the best experts, it is evident that little Switzerland, which is scarcely one-eighteenth the size of our State of Texas, and whose population is less than one twenty-fifth that of the United States, publishes more than three-quarters as many books per annum as we do; in other words, ten times as many books per million inhabitants per annum are published by Switzerland as by the United States. In fact, she leads the world in this particular.

By similar analysis we find that the Scandinavian countries—Denmark, Sweden, and Norway—which in book production are next in rank to Switzerland, have an output of about six times ours. Germany, France, the British Empire, Holland, Italy, Austria (of course, in normal times) greatly surpass us, all running from three and one-half to five times our output per capita. Roumania, with one-thirteenth our population, publishes one-fourth as many books; Japan, with slightly more than half our population, publishes four times as many; in other words, eight times as many per million of population; but a large number of these are pamphlets, so instead of publishing eight times as many, she really issues an average of between three and four times as many, which makes our showing even then bad enough.

In the density of our ignorance we sometimes think of Russia as a benighted country, forgetting that in her middle and upper circles she is a land vibrant with intellectual and artistic energy. In book production, even though the showing on her side is distorted by the countless millions of her ignorant peasant class, who number about 79 per cent of her population, we find that she produces two and three-quarters times as many books as we do, and has a population only one and two-thirds times larger. In other words, she materially exceeds us in book production.

This leaves us to seek in Spain, the only one of the important civilized nations of the entire globe that publishes so few books per million of population per annum as we do, and it is questionable whether we are able to hold the lead over even her, for any analysis of the statistics of both Otlet and Salvador places us slightly behind united Spain and Portugal, the figures for the two being given in conjunction. Beneath these there is no lower depth.

Germany produces more books than any other nation in the seven highly creditable classes of educational, arts and sciences, belles lettres, theology, medicine, voyages, and law.

Italy holds first rank in political economy; France in history, poetry, and drama; and the United States ties France for first place in one item only—books on sport. That is our best bid for a premier place.

The Publisher's Weekly, the semiofficial organ of the book trade, in its issue of January 30, 1904, contains the following statement:

"The great decrease in all the more serious departments of literature, as well as in some of the lighter ones, is a curious and unexplainable condition of our book production. Scientific and philosophical writings are as conspicuous through their absence as are the simply amusing books."

Moreover, this backward condition of America's book production is a new situation that has existed for a generation only. That this is so is shown in various ways, but particularly in the parlous condition of the retail book-selling trade. A generation ago, when our population was a little less than one-half what it is to-day, there were in the United States, it is estimated, between three and four thousand booksellers carrying fairly good stocks of books representative of history, light science, economics, art, biography, travel, poetry, essays, fiction, and belles lettres generally.

There are fewer than 1,500 booksellers left, and this number is steadily being diminished through withdrawals from business. Yet on January 9, 1914, the secretary of the American News Co. told the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads that the country contains about 60,000 news stands.

Since the day when there were three or four thousand bookstores not only has the population of the country more than doubled, but the general average of wealth has increased markedly, being quite four times what it was then, so that by good rights the three or more thousand booksellers of that day should have increased threefold or over, to at least 10,000, instead of diminishing by more than one-half.

If it be true, as has been repeatedly asserted, that a good bookstore, well stocked and intelligently managed, performs an educational work in any community only slightly, if, indeed, at all, less important than that done by its schools, colleges, libraries, or churches, this deplorable condition of affairs merits serious attention. The reason for the situation is not far to seek, though not even its existence, let alone its cause, is as generally known as it should be. Yet the cause seems plainly and definitely determinable. To arrive at it we must turn from book production to another printing-trade industry that has waxed in the United States as book production has waned. Forty years ago less than 10,000,000 copies of periodicals, exclusive of newspapers, were published annually. To-day it is estimated that there are published over seven and a half billion, and of this quantity about two-thirds gets distribution through the mails. These extra hundreds of millions of periodicals would seem to mean as many tens of millions fewer good books, and that seems to be virtually the sole cause of the disappearance of the book. It accounts without any assistance for our notorious literary decadence.

On June 23, 1874, there was approved an act of Congress establishing a pound rate of postage on mail matter of the second class—newspapers and periodicals. At first this rate was 3 cents a pound for magazines and 2 cents for newspapers. Soon it was lowered to 2 cents for each and still later, becoming operative on July 1, 1885, the rate was reduced to only 1 cent per pound for each. The cost of service rendered then and every year since is many times that amount; at present it is estimated by various experts and commissions as running from over 8 cents to as high as 12 cents per pound.

The effect of that law is emphatically shown in the following table giving amounts of second-class mail (periodical literature) carried by the Post Office Department as various dates:

	Pounds.
For 1875 (first year law was operative)	40,000,000
For 1880	61,000,000
For 1890	204,000,000
For 1900	450,000,000
For 1910	873,000,000
For 1916 (this item added in reprinting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD)	1,202,000,000

At this rate within less than 10 years, if the law is not changed, this output will have increased to more than 2,000,000,000 pounds per annum.

Evidently giving to periodical literature this service at 1 cent per pound, $20 per ton, the cost being eight or ten times as much, has been simply a subvention, and a very effective one. Although we publish few books as compared with other civilized nations, we issue more periodicals than all other nations put together and half as much again, for we publish 60 per cent of the periodical literature of the entire globe.

The United States, according to the report of the Third Assistant Postmaster General for January, 1914, handled in the second-class mail during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, over 5,000,000,000 copies of periodicals—more than 50 for each man, woman, and child in the United States—enough to make more than 2,600 trainloads of 10 fully loaded cars per train. And this does not take into consideration the enormous number of copies of daily newspapers and other periodicals which are circulated outside of the mails by carriers, newsdealers, and others.

Underlying this megalosauruslike development is the factor that carriage by the Government at the nearly free rate of 1 cent per pound covers not only the literary product but the advertising material which has been the determining factor in this marvelous increase. At the time the pound-rate law first became operative magazines were few in number and contained little advertising and much good literature; but the pound-rate law gave birth to a new kind of magazine issued at less than cost for the revenue to be derived, because of the immense circulation possible under the subvention, from its advertising pages; and their advertising pages generally weigh more and cost the Government more to transport than do their literary pages.

To increase this revenue circulations were forced by methods that directly violated the law, and these methods are still being used. Premiums were given to an extent that led to an investigation by the Post Office Department, and it was found (Third Assistant Postmaster General's report, Dec. 1, 1911, p. 39) that in one case four-fifths of the subscribers went for the premium, the publication being worth nothing except as an advertising medium because of its large circulation—a circulation with which, despite the Government subvention, literature had nothing to do. Another periodical, weekly and agricultural, forced by premium 122,000 subscriptions out of 143,000; another 41,000 out of 53,000.

There are hundreds of needless growths of this sort. As an instance, there are published in the United States some 86 banking periodicals. The secretary of the American Bankers' Association, when asked how many of these were needed, replied, "From 3 to 6, and the other 80 are 'leg pullers.' They live in great part by sandbagging advertising out of financial interests."

Dr. Talcott Williams, at the session of the American Historical Association at Washington a few years ago, said that 100 years earlier the aggregate weight of one copy of each issue of an ordinary city daily for a year was about 10 pounds; 50 years later it was 25 pounds; 25 years later it had become 50 pounds; and when he spoke it was 125 pounds; while in many instances the Sunday editions alone weigh more than that. How much of it is published to the real advantage of the community?

Upon careful consideration, it seems evident that at first the law diverted the patronage of the reading public from books to the higher-priced and more respectable magazines, those so priced that their sale at the published rate would be possible even if the advertising were omitted or made a minor consideration; that next, the 25-cent issues cut the ground from under these older and higher-priced ones; that then rapidly appeared the 15-cent ones, and next the 10-cent ones—all so expensive to make that only the great volume of advertising rendered the low price possible—and that now the 5-cent issues are, in their turn, no less rapidly displacing the 10-cent ones. Swift's doggerel tells the tale:

> So, naturalists observe, a flea
> Has smaller fleas that on him prey;
> And these have smaller still to bite 'em;
> And so proceed ad infinitum.

While this article has primarily to do with the decadence of our literature, the economic side should not be lost sight of.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, the expense account of the Post Office Department amounted to over $306,000,000 (statistics revised to date in reprinting in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD). The second-class mail supplied nearly two-thirds of the tonnage and cost more than one-third of the total aggregate of expense, but the revenue paid by its publishers amounted to just under $11,500,000, as against the cost of over $76,000,000.

To make up for the loss thus incurred, the first-class mail—the letter mail—which weighed only one-fifth as many pounds, had to supply $190,000,000 of revenue from a service costing the Government less than $100,000,000. That is to say, the letter mail paid 18 times as much revenue as the second-class mail, though weighing but one-fifth as much and costing less.

There were carried the past year about 2,000,000,000 postal cards, which produced a revenue of nearly $20,000,000. The weight of these was only about 13,000,000 pounds. Thirteen million pounds of postal cards, therefore, produced almost exactly twice as much revenue as 1,200,000,000 pounds of publishers' second-class mail.

Averaging all in all, first-class mail costs at most not quite four times as much per pound as second-class mail, and pays 84 times as much.

In other words, each time that one of the forty or fifty million users of the first-class mail puts a 2-cent stamp on a letter, 1 cent pays for the service rendered and the other cent is taken by the department to give a "special privilege" of service at one-eighth of cost to fewer than 30,000 periodical publishers.

Suppose every time you needed $100 worth of 2-cent stamps you had to send to the post office $50 and to mail a draft for the other $50 to the secretary of the Periodical Publishers Association, how long do you think this situation could last? Yet that is exactly what you are doing, only you are chloroformed while they are taking the money away from you, because it is done indirectly.

As illustrating another abuse that results from the pound-rate privilege, let me refer to some periodicals that are light in weight; certain small magazines, for example, weigh but a fraction of an ounce, and the Government must distribute many of them in order to secure 1 cent. We have in our possession a little farm journal so light that it takes 40 copies to make a pound. As it is published monthly, not until the post office has served a subscriber with this journal for three years and four months will it get as much as a single cent for the entire service.

Is it any wonder that new periodicals have begun their career in the United States at the rate of more than 10 a day for every day, Sundays and holidays included, of the past 15 years? Fortunately the death rate is nearly as great as the birth rate; but, since those that persist are the selected growths, there is, as we have seen, a tremendous annual increase.

One expert estimates that the total number of books published in the world since the invention of printing is some 15,000,000, and another, more modest, places the figures at between ten and twelve millions. Assuming for each book a first edition of 1,000 copies, a somewhat common issue, we should have from 10,000,000,000 to 15,000,000,000 copies of all. In other words, there are issued in the United States each year from one-half to three-quarters as many copies of periodicals as have ever been published in the first editions of all books ever printed by all the nations of the world.

There can be no deduction made from the general features of the situation, other than that the distribution of this one class of merchandise at a practically free rate is nearly the sole reason for this wasteful overproduction.

When the pound-rate law was enacted, the distinct purpose was announced that its effect would be educational. The contrary is unmistakably the case. The reading of the 15-minute magazine article or the skimming of the Sunday paper seems to have become too often the limit of the intellectual activity of our people of average education.

To carry the Police Gazette at a cent a pound while charging eight times as much for a spelling book or Bible and then to claim that the law permitting this discrepancy was enacted in the interests of education is at least edifying. Archbishop Hare, in his bright little volume, Guesses at Truth, once remarked that a very bad reason was in producing effect next to a very good one.

Mr. J. N. Larned, the very eminent librarian, says:

"The so-called newspaper, which interests itself and which labors to interest its readers in the trivialities and ignoble occurrences of the day—in the prize fights and mean preliminaries of prize fights, the boxing matches, the ball games, the races, the teas, the luncheons, the receptions, the dresses, the goings and comings and private doings of private persons—making the most in all possible ways of all petty things and low things while treating grave matters with levity and impertinence—with what effect can such a newspaper be read? I do not care to say. If I spoke my mind, I might strike harshly at too many whose reading is confined to such sheets; but I will venture so much remark as this: That I would prefer absolute illiteracy for a son or a daughter of mine—total inability to spell a single printed word—rather than that he or she should be habitually a reader of the common newspaper of America of to-day, and a reader of nothing better."

According to Census Bulletin No. 57 for 1905, there was spent in the preceding year in the entire country for newspapers the enormous sum of $280,000,000, and for all textbooks for use in both public and private schools, sectarian and nonsectarian, and in all colleges, only some $12,000,000. More than $23 spent for ephemeral literature, much of which debases the literary taste of the community, for each dollar spent for literature whose function was technically educational.

To get a further idea of the literary pabulum that the Government subvention is creating for us, let us consider an average magazine of the so-called popular sort. Some one defines it as follows:

"A magazine is a small body of literature entirely surrounded by advertising. In this respect it resembles a railroad ham sandwich with the advertising bread cut very thick and the literary meat in especially thin slices. The situation is well summarized when Dooley says: 'Hinnessy, mon, last night on my way home from wurruk I bought one of them popular magazines expectin' after I had eaten me supper and put on me slippers and lighted me pipe to sit down for a quiet avenin's enjoyment looking over the advertisements; and do you know, mon, 25 per cint of the dommed thing was just nothing but "ltheracboor."'"

The magazine frequently gives great prominence to pictures of actresses—doubtless by favorable arrangements with their managers. With these may appear an article with an alliterative title, showing How Cleveland was Cunningly Conned; How Placid Philadelphia's Putridity was Purged; Why Denver went to the Devil; etc. Then may follow an article explaining how our reporter, Wily Willie, went under "Jawn Dee's" window and, by making a noise like an extra dividend, secured an interview with him. Then a trifling poem or two, and a long continued dry-as-dust serial story, which serves in some measure as the talcum powder to disinfect, so to speak, the rest. Then may follow a retraction article, showing that whereas we stated in our latest issue that an emissary of the Standard Oil Co. was responsible for the Chicago conflagration by sneaking up behind Mrs. O'Leary's cow and sticking a pin into her while she was being milked, we wish to inform our readers that we are now convinced that this was incorrect. Further investigation shows that the Standard Oil Co. was entirely innocent. It was an employee of the Packing House Trust who was guilty of the dastardly deed. Then perhaps will follow a passionate personal appeal from the publisher for subscriptions to about $10,000,000 worth of stock of the magazine company. (Send in any sum from $1 up; use the corner coupon.) All of this will be incased in a gaudy, if not neat, cover bearing a design showing a girl's face and some of her form. If you want to see the rest of that, look at the corset advertisements inside. An old lady lately said that when she read her modern magazine she felt that she had been to an undress party where the men all came in their "unions" and the women in their "nemos." Then will follow advertisements of soaps, soups, shoes, massage creams, and a thousand other articles.

Now, as compared with magazines and newspapers, let us see what good purpose the book serves. I quote again from Larned:

"You and I, who live at this moment, stand islanded, so to speak, on a narrow strand between two great time oceans—the ocean of time past and the ocean of time to come. When we turn to the one, looking futureward, we see nothing, not even a ripple on the face of the silent, mysterious deep, which is veiled by an impenetrable mist. We turn backward to that other sea, looking out across the measureless expanse of time past, and lo! it is covered with ships. We see them rise from beyond the far horizon in fleets which swarm upon the scene, and they come sailing to us in numbers that are greater than we can count. They are freighted with the gifts of the dead, to us who are the children of the dead. They bring us the story of the forgotten life of mankind, its experience, its learning, its wisdom, its warnings, its counsels, its consolations, its songs, its discoveries of beauty and of joy. What if there had been no ships to bring us these? Think of it! What if the great ocean of time past rolled as blankly and blackly behind us as the ocean of time to come rolls before us?

"What if there were no letters and no books? For the ships in this picture are those carriers of the commodities of mind which we call letters and books.

"Think what your state would be in a situation like that! Think what it would be to know nothing, for example, of the way in which American independence was won, and the Federal Republic of the United States constructed; nothing of Bunker Hill; nothing of George Washington, except the little, half true and half mistaken, that your fathers could remember of what their fathers had repeated of what their fathers had told to them! Think what it would be to have nothing but shadowy traditions of the voyage of Columbus, of the coming of the Mayflower Pilgrims, and of all the planting of life in the New World from Old World stocks—think what it would mean to know no more of the origins of the English people, of their rise and their growth in greatness, than the Romans knew of their Latin beginnings; and to know no more of Rome herself than we might guess from the ruins she has left! Think what it would mean to have the whole story of Athens and Greece dropped out of our knowledge, to be unaware that Marathon was ever fought, or that one like Socrates had ever lived! Think what it would mean to have no line from Homer, no thought from Plato, no message from Isaiah, no Sermon on the Mount, nor any parable from the lips of Jesus!

"Can you imagine a world intellectually famine-smitten like that—a bookless world—and not shrink with horror from the thought of being condemned to live in it? Yet the men and the women who take nothing from letters and books are choosing to live as though mankind did actually wallow in the awful darkness of that state from which writing and books have rescued us. For them, it is as if no ship had ever come from the far shores of old time, where their ancestry dwelt; and the interest of existence to them is huddled within the petty space of their own few years, between walls of mist which thicken as impenetrably behind them as before.

"How can men or women be content with so little when they might have so much?"

And the Government carries this kind of literature, advertising and all, at 1 cent a pound—$20 per ton, and charges for books 8 cents per pound—$160 per ton, and for the social letter and business mail, 84 cents per pound, $1,680 per ton!

Bryan's philosophy was sounder than it sometimes has been when he said:

"The Supreme Court has described unjust taxation as larceny in the form of law. If one citizen is compelled by law to pay $10 for the support of the Government where he ought to only pay five, and under the same law a neighbor is required to pay but five where he should pay ten, the law which causes this inequality simply transfers $5 from one man's pocket to another's."

Then a law which is each year taking over $90,000,000 of net profit, above cost of service, from the 93,000,000 people who benefit from letters, in order to give 30,000 periodical publishers service for $11,000,000 which costs many times that sum, is certainly not merely petty larceny or grand larceny, but larceny that is absolutely grandiose.

To illustrate: One publishing company, it is reported, made last year a net profit of over $2,500,000. Their postage was about $680,000, and it cost the Government over $5,500,000 to handle the output. Moreover, more than $20,000,000 of advertising was borne on the pages of those publications, and for it the company also received virtually free distribution.

While there is occasionally a periodical publisher crass enough to deny the evident inadequacy of the rate paid by second-class mail, yet a mere statement of the figures, without comment, is convincing enough. You do not have to appoint congressional commissions to make micrometrical measurements of a superdreadnaught battleship to enable you to decide whether it can be installed in an apartment house kitchenette. Some things are self-evident.

Had a special privilege as great as this of the second-class mail rate been enjoyed at national expense by any class of citizens other than its publishers, the publishers would not have permitted it to exist a year. Yet the loss has long been well known to post-office officials and Members of Congress, though for a time it was kept from the knowledge of the public, because practically the sole means the public has had of obtaining the knowledge has been through the columns of journals that enjoy the privilege. The North American Review for February, 1908, had a most scathing article by Prof. Munroe Smith, entitled "The dogma of journalistic inerrancy," that illustrated this situation forcibly.

No lobby sent to Washington in furtherance of corrupt legislation has ever been more persistent or dealt less fairly with both legislators and public than the lobby that has worked for retention of the second-class mail rate. Able editors have been rightly accused of hunting sedulously for other people's "pulls" while maintaining this heavy one of their own.

And the ceaselessly increasing monthlies of mammoth circulation that so nobly, though with somewhat of iteration, harp upon the graft of our plutocrats, our patent-medicine manufacturers, our frenzied financiers, our food trusts, our fraudulent insurance officials—is it possible that none of their diatribes, worthy though they may be, are never to be directed against themselves? Let us hope that some of these public-spirited citizens so patriotically intent upon ridding a much-suffering land of its various forms of organized rapacity, may be led to see a great light in connection with the one industry of this country that is by law largely relieved from subjection to those competitive forces to which producers and distributors of all other articles are keenly alive.

We may in time realize the truth of Emerson's remark that "though no checks to a new evil appear, the checks exist and will appear." For it is fast becoming notorious that that advertising, which is as the breath of life to all those low-priced periodicals, has passed the line of utility and does not always compensate the advertiser.

A generation ago an English-born resident of Australia was homesick. He thought how charming it would be to see gamboling about his place an English rabbit. He imported a pair. The soil and climate proved congenial. They multiplied with enormous rapidity, and recently the Australian Government had a standing offer of £25,000 for anybody who would devise some practical method of exterminating the rabbit pest. Another settler, this time a New Zealander of Caledonian birth, recalling to mind the rugged beauty of the Scotch thistle, imported that and planted it at his doorway. The resultant development was similar. There are hundreds and hundreds of square miles of Scotch thistles in New Zealand. A few years ago a scientist imported for experimental purposes the gypsy moth and caged it in his back yard in one of the suburbs of Boston. A storm of wind and rain wrecked the cage and some of the moths escaped, with the result that the State of Massachusetts has spent over $3,000,000 in an effort to exterminate this pest that is devastating its forests and bids fair to extend over the entire United States, with a resultant loss of countless millions of dollars.

In legislation as in biology, it sometimes seems easier, even with good motives, to spread noxious things than useful ones. Our postal legislation has bred a swarm of periodicals of which the vast majority are but a swarm of pests.

NOTE BY THE PUBLISHERS, MESSRS. HENRY SCOTT & CO.

In attacking them "at the source"—the cheap postage by which we ourselves superficially seem to benefit, we are entitled to no credit. On the contrary, while we think our action is in favor of the good literature which we try to serve, we still must own up to selfish motives. The rank growth of worthless periodical literature tends to smother the kind which we and a few of our colleagues are trying to make. We think some of those colleagues are standing in their own light when they advocate the policy which breeds their worthless competitors. Periodicals are like currency—the bad always drives out the good.

The publishers of this Review hope that, without having their motives misconstrued, they can add, from their own experience, a very suggestive illustration of the main contention of the foregoing article. Most of the readers of the Review are familiar with the Home University Library, and some of them have praised it highly. In England it has had a phenomenal success; in America but a very moderate one. The American publishers are constantly being told that in England it is on every railway news stand, and asked why it is not here. The answer is that here the flood of cheap periodicals leaves no room for anything more substantial. The Home University Library appeals to a popular constituency, and there is a tremendous popular demand for it in England, while in America there is none; its circulation here is virtually restricted to the highly educated. The rank and file of American readers have their tastes formed and supplied by the Sunday newspapers and the cheap periodicals. The idea of gathering a library of cheap books on substantial subjects is virtually unknown among them.

The worst feature of the whole case is that the enormous demand for inferior stuff limits the field for writers who can produce valuable matter, and consequently checks the development of such writers. It would be as difficult to produce a Home University Library in America as it is to sell it. We have men of the requisite knowledge, but our conditions do not attract them to cultivate the literary art. Few of our scientific men and scholars are writers, many more of those in England are. And as for imaginative literature!

The cheap carriage of our periodicals was avowedly enacted as a Government subvention to literature. Why was it not extended to books? In a year's shipments they do not bulk nearly as large as periodicals. Are we forced to the conclusion that at the present stage of evolution, a helpful subvention to literature is beyond the power of a pure democracy? If so, that is one reason for working all the harder to raise the character of that democracy. Would the withdrawal of the subvention be a good beginning?

The Food-Control Bill and the Barkley Amendment.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JULIUS KAHN,
OF CALIFORNIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to avail myself of the privilege, under the rules of the House, to insert a few remarks on the Barkley amendment, which proposes nation-wide prohibition on the so-called Lever food-control bill. In the first place, I want to again assert that I am a firm believer in temperance. Temperance in eating, temperance in drinking, temperance in exercise, temperance in all things is exceedingly desirable at all times for all American citizens. But everyone knows that prohibition does not make, and has never made, for temperance. Go into those States which have adopted prohibition legislation and you will find the laws against liquor are constantly being violated.

The proposed Barkley amendment is only an evidence of the hysteria that is manifest in our country to-day. Why, during the progress of the debate on this bill I asked the author of the amendment whether it would prevent the farmer from using his apples for making cider or the vineyardist from making wine out of his grapes. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] frankly admitted that his amendment would have exactly that effect. Even the farmer's wife will be unable to make cider vinegar or the vineyardist's wife to make pure-wine vinegar under this absurd amendment. It is asserted that this legislation is necessary so as to keep our soldier boys free from the temptation to partake of alcoholic stimulants. I remember the days when the canteen was permitted at the American Army posts. The soldiers were permitted to partake of light wines and beer at the Army canteen. Drunkenness was almost unknown. The profits of the canteen were used to furnish dainties for the soldiers' mess. Has the abolition of the Army canteen improved the morals of the soldiers? Ask any Army officer, and he will frankly tell you it has not.

This class of legislation, as I have stated before on the floor of the House, has a tendency to brand the American people before the world as a nation of drunkards who can not curb their own appetites. It gives the impression to mankind that only by passing prohibition laws can the people of the United States be kept sober. I emphatically protest against so branding my fellow citizens. We are a sober people in this country. More people in the United States die every year from overeating than die from overdrinking. Medical authority has asserted that repeatedly. I believe the food-control bill to be absolutely necessary for our success in the present war with the central powers. I voted against the Barkley amendment in the Committee of the Whole House and voted for the Lenroot amendment. I regret exceedingly that a majority of the Members have seen fit to add the Barkley amendment to the food-control bill. I simply wish to make my position clear in the matter. While I shall vote for that bill as a war measure, I do not approve of the Barkley amendment. If that amendment were offered as a separate measure, I should unhesitatingly vote against it.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DAN V. STEPHENS, OF NEBRASKA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Friday, June 29, 1917.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, war conditions invariably produce high prices. A food panic can be caused by the concerted action of a large number of people who have been convinced that a food shortage exists. Whether the shortage is real or fancied makes no difference in the result. Whenever a considerable number of people who deal in foodstuffs believe that prices are going to rise they are certain to be large buyers.

The fact that a large number of men who know the market situation are buying certain products starts other men, less informed, to doing the same thing. Legitimate dealers in food products catch the spirit of the environment and whisper to their patrons that a food shortage is imminent and that they had better lay in large stocks while they have an opportunity to do so. This advice is usually followed by those who can afford to, with the result that thousands of people become bidders for available supplies, which inevitably forces up prices.

The recent panic in wheat was greatly accentuated by the average citizen purchasing large quantities of flour. This in turn caused the retail dealer to renew his order for additional flour with the wholesaler, and the wholesaler in turn was compelled to place additional orders with the miller. Thousands of people doing this all over the country created in the minds of the millers a fear that they would not be able to obtain supplies of wheat in sufficient quantity to fill their orders. They therefore rushed into the wheat market and bought wheat, with the result that the price of wheat greatly advanced.

This situation was largely psychological. A few years ago the President of the United States made a statement that has been much commented upon, to the effect that the depressed business condition that appeared to exist at that time was a matter of psychology. Nothing could better illustrate the truth of the President's statement than the present food panic prevailing in this country. It is true that the last year's wheat crop was short; but the 1915 crop was excessive, and when the average of the two years is taken we find that it is about the average crop for the five years preceding the war. Therefore if there is not a great shortage then the excessive high price can not be justified on any other ground than that of public opinion. That is to say, whenever a large number of people believe that prices are going to rise, the very fact that they believe that they are going to rise stimulates buying to such an extent that prices are forced beyond a legitimate level. Whenever the people generally possess such a belief, everyone who can holds to what he has, and everyone who has money buys all he can get, with the natural result that usual available supplies at former prices are not to be had. A small panic begins in the minds of those who do not possess a sufficient supply for their needs and they rush pellmell into the market to buy, and the price goes up still higher as the eagerness of the buyers increases. Then more people catch the psychological effect of the mass in action and they, too, begin to buy. The foreign buyer sees the prices climbing and he rushes in, knowing he must have wheat and provisions for his customers, and the price again mounts up. The psychological effect is still further inflamed by the newspapers that print the stories of the people who are constantly filling their cellars full of flour and other provisions against the day of famine which they think is sure to come.

An assessor recently reported that a certain wholesaler carried in his warehouse 2,000,000 pounds of sugar, anticipating a scarcity and a rise in this product. That amount of sugar was probably fifty times more than this wholesaler was accustomed to carry, but he had been led to stock up to this unusual amount because of the unusual demand placed upon him by the retailers, who in turn were warning their customers of the higher prices of sugar that were sure to prevail later on. The result of this constant fear among the people of war prices has led them to accentuate our trouble by reducing available food supplies.

I have not much patience with this cry of "speculators," "thieves," and "highbinders"—terms that are constantly being used in characterizing imaginary people who are cornering the food market. The facts are the whole American people are chargeable with the present food panic. It can not be laid at the door of any particular class. The man why buys 10 or 15 sacks of flour, enough to last his family two or three years, is as reprehensible as is the man who gambles in grain on a much larger scale. Therefore the whole situation appears to me to be largely psychological and the resulting high prices largely unnecessary. The trouble could have been avoided under a more efficient system of distribution.

THE FOOD SITUATION GENERALLY.

Generally speaking, there is no shortage of food in the world to-day. It is true that the two great staple crops—wheat and potatoes—were short in 1916; but outside of these two products there was an average yield in all other farm products—generally speaking. In addition to this the prospects for 1917, for an average crop, are good. There is scarcely a country in the world that has not increased its acreage in all of the staple farm products. The only discouraging feature of the outlook is the shortage of the winter wheat crop in the United States. If, therefore, there is no extraordinary shortage in farm production, generally speaking, and the crop outlook appears to be an average one, why should there be any concern about the future? The answer to this question appears to lie in the fact that the world is at war, and extraordinary conditions are sure to prevail in the distribution of the 1917 crop. If the world were at peace there certainly would be no trouble in regard to prices of farm products. The wheat supply has been as low as it now is in former years, and the price never reached one-half the present figure. Even in the countries at war, especially England and her colonies, the production of foodstuffs has increased. In France there is a slight decrease, but in practically all other countries there has been an increase in food production since the breaking out of war. In all probability, if the truth could be known, there has been an increase in the food supply of the world since the war began, while there are about 7,000,000 less men to feed, due to the death toll of the war.

LOCATION OF THE TROUBLE.

Now, if there is no general food shortage in the world, then why are prices so extraordinarily high? That is the question, and if we can answer it we can easily settle our troubles. If the producer is doing his part and furnishes the supplies necessary to feed the people, then the trouble is not with the producer, because the producer has nothing to do with the making of the price.

There never has been a time in the history of the world when the farmer fixed the price on anything he was compelled to sell; and inasmuch as he is compelled to sell all of his surplus products it is apparent that the fault of high prices does not lie with him. Then there is just one other place where the fault can lie, and that is in the field of distribution. Somewhere in this broad field which lies between the producer and the consumer lies the trouble, and the main difficulty can no doubt be traced to the transportation system.

In our present highly organized state of society it is apparent that transportation is of prime importance. Whenever it breaks down at any particular point it disorganizes the whole system, and during the period of this war our transportation system has broken down completely. The inability of the railroads last winter to distribute the requisite coal supply of the country was apparent in every city of any magnitude. Factories found themselves handicapped for the want of fuel, and business generally was disorganized as a result of the railroads not being able to make deliveries. The fact that these deliveries could not be made enhanced prices in certain localities and caused food shortages in many large centers, which, in some instances, resulted in riots.

If the transportation facilities of the country were adequate and prompt deliveries could always be made, prices would tend to normal, because supplies would be constantly available. Therefore it seems to me that the first and essential requirement for stabilizing prices is the perfection of our transportation system; and if private enterprise is not able to furnish adequate means of transportation, then the Government itself should undertake to do it. Until this is done there is very little need of taking any other step, because it will be impossible to stabilize prices by keeping an adequate supply of food constantly available in every section of the country.

We have already passed a bill empowering the Department of Agriculture to make a food survey of the country and to stimulate production. This bill, when enacted into law, will enable us to make a complete survey of the food situation in the United States. This, in my judgment, is essential in order that the people may know exactly what food supplies we have. Knowledge of the facts will afford us great protection against food panics. This legislation therefore, coupled with a perfected system of transportation, will place us in a fair way to secure a proper adjustment of prices between producer and consumer. But this will not cover all of our difficulties. There is still a great deal to be done before the business of distribution is reduced to a proper and economical basis. The different factors involved in distribution are all kinds of transportation facilities, all wholesalers, retailers, grain exchanges, and so forth. Through all these numerous channels the products of the farm and factory must pass to the consumer.

The question, then, is how can the slack be taken out of these numerous instruments of distribution so that the price of the products of the farm and shop will not be enhanced to unbearable levels when the product reaches the consumer? In time of peace the waste in this field is not so noticeable, and the producer and consumer do not complain so much of the conditions under which they are working, though the waste is proportionately as great as it is in time of war.

THE MIDDLEMAN.

The trouble seems to be inherent to the nature of the work of distribution. The legitimate distributors consist of the wholesaler and the retailer. In addition to these, of course, there are many other factors entering into the distribution of foodstuffs, such as grain exchanges, commission merchants, and boards of trade. There is a constant spread in this field, with opportunities for adding cost to distribution that seems to increase as society becomes more complex. In early times merchandizing did not exist. The producer passed his product direct to the consumer, but now that method is impossible. The complex nature of production and distribution requires highly specialized talent. The skill required to produce is not adapted to distribution. The skill of the tradesman is not the sort required in production. So, as a result, the producer hands over his product to the salesman, the distributor. In fact, the distributor buys the product direct from the producer, so that there is a distinct separation between the producer and the consumer, due to the fact that the title in the product of the shop and factory passes to the distributor, and the distributor then is left free to do with it as he pleases.

This enables him, if opportunity affords, to monopolize the distribution of any product. Take, for example, the great grain companies of the country. There are not very many of them, and as a rule two or three of these companies will have an elevator in each town in the grain district. These great corporations buy all the grain. There is no one else to buy it; there is no one else who owns elevators where it can be stored, therefore the very nature of the conditions that exist and the capital required make the handling of grain in effect a limited monopoly. There can only be a few companies in the business at most, and they invariably pay the same price for grain. In the main it results in natural monopoly. The point I am about to make, however, is this: That whenever the title to the product of the farm and shop passes completely to the distributor there is a splendid opportunity for the manipulation of the market in one form or another.

The American people have always believed in competition—generally speaking—regardless of the fact that ruthless competition leads straight as a line to monopoly. This is true because sooner or later the inefficient and less competent are gradually driven out of the field, and some great dominating combination will control the market and the price. Many business men have recognized the danger of this policy and have been preaching for several years past that there should be some sort of sensible regulation of competition in order that there might be a survival of legitimate concerns engaged in distribution, so that competition in a legitimate degree could be maintained.

For example, the producer is vitally concerned in the distribution of his product. If his product is manipulated by the distributor in such a manner as to either enhance or depress the price above or below a reasonable figure, the producer is injured thereby. If the distributor secures control of his product and raises the price beyond a reasonable figure, he thereby decreases consumption, and as consumption falls off the producer of the product is proportionately injured, because his interests lie in an increased production.

On the other hand, if the distributor is able to control the product and has designs upon a competitor whom he wishes to destroy and reduces the price of the product below a reasonable figure at which it can be profitably sold, the producer again is greatly injured by making production impossible.

If either of these conditions prevailed for any length of time the producer would be utterly destroyed. He is therefore vitally interested in the distribution of his product. He in fact ought to be able to control its distribution as a matter of self-preservation. He then would not only be able to protect himself from ruin, but he would be able to protect the consumer from extortionate prices, which are as injurious to the producer as to the consumer.

In 1911 the courts held that the producer could not contract with the wholesaler and retailer to sell his product at an agreed price. The result of that decision has been to create a chaotic condition in the market. The producer finds himself as a result of it unable to in any manner protect either himself or the consumer from unfair methods of distribution. Not only are the consumer and the producer disturbed and injured by this condition, but legitimate distributors—the wholesaler and the retailer—are also greatly injured as a result of it, because the legitimate distributor is better off with a stable condition of profits and with a steady market for the products that he handles than he is in an uncertain market, where he never knows what either the price or the consumption is going to be. The producer under these conditions is left to the mercy of every price cutter whose aim is to drive out competition in the field of distribution so that he can become a price booster instead of a price cutter, and to the mercy of every speculator who has no interest whatever in either the producer or the consumer, with the appalling result as shown in the field of distribution to-day. A state of anarchy is the only term which fittingly describes it. It is a disorganized mass of struggling men engaged in the fiercest and most destructive competition, which results in monopoly on the one hand and ruin on the other.

Dr. Taylor, of the University of Pennsylvania, who spent some time in Germany last year studying the food situation, stated before a Senate committee that it was useless to attack the distributors of food first in an endeavor to eradicate the speculator and reduce prices to the consumer. He contended that the power and skill of the distributors, no matter what restraint is put upon them, will enable them to push down on the producer on the one hand and up on the consumer on the other, thus reducing both the amount of production and consumption by reducing prices below the profit point to the producer and beyond the pocketbook of the consumer. Dr. Taylor merely relates the experience of Germany and his conclusions drawn from the facts. The actual practice in food regulation by these countries at war proves exactly the contention that reputable distributors have made for years. They have insisted that an unregulated field of distribution, rife with ruthless competition, could result in only one thing—increased cost—and the cost had to be borne by either the producer or consumer or both in the long run. There is fierce competition in both the field of production and distribution, but the cost of the plant and the technical skill required to produce are both deterrents in production. But in the field of distribution even a truck driver becomes a small distributor. A farmer moves to town and starts a small grocery store, and amateurs of every kind branch out into some business of distribution in a field already completely occupied by experienced men who are giving adequate service at a nominal cost. The result that follows is to increase competition, because the distributors in the field have the advantage of established trade, and the newcomers feel that the only way in which they can get started is to cut prices and reduce margins of profit. As margins are reduced to the distributors, and the consumers apparently profit by it, a struggle begins at once by the distributors to buy their supplies cheaper from the producer.

Every device known to the trade is exercised to beat down the cost of production so that the margin which ruthless competition in the field of distribution had reduced could again be expanded to a living margin. Great distributors, like some of our great department stores and catalogue houses, go about the country among the hungry producers, who are struggling to meet pay rolls, and offer them enormous orders at cutthroat prices, with great success to themselves and ruin to the producer. A producer who needs orders will fall for a bait like that, with the result that the producer is gradually beaten down to the danger line by the distributor. This sort of pressure is constantly going on in the field of distribution, encroaching both on the producer and the consumer, constantly increasing the cost of distribution, as exampled by the fact that 65 cents out of every dollar paid for farm products go to the distributors.

The field of distribution is occupied not only by the reliable and dependable distributors, consisting of wholesalers and retailers, but also by a large number of speculating buccaneers, together with the ignorant interlopers into the retail field, who fancy they see great profits in this sort of business and who live for a brief day as price cutters. These two classes of price cutters and price boosters do more to injure the producer and consumer than all others combined. They gradually destroy legitimate margins of profit, which the distributor must make to stay in the business. The consumer generally makes no complaint against the price cutter, because he profits temporarily by buying his supplies at a lower rate. But gradually production falls off as producers fail and disappear, and a shortage of supplies finally manifests itself. When the shortage occurs, the pinch of high prices invariably follows, and then the consumer complains loudly and bitterly. This is especially apparent at the present moment.

PRICE MAINTENANCE DESIRABLE.

This condition could be greatly improved if the producers were allowed to control their own distribution through the present established wholesale and retail channels. A basic price should be fixed, and there is only one factor upon which a basic price can be made, and that is the cost of the product. There is only one person therefore who can fix a basic price, and that person is the producer himself. But the courts have held that he can not enter into a contract with a wholesaler and a retailer fixing the price at which his product is to be sold to the consumer, as it is contended that such a contract would be contrary to the Sherman antitrust law. The correctness of this line of argument has been questioned by a great majority of the business men who are vitally interested in having open and free competition in the field of distribution. They have felt that in order that there might be some stability to prices that the producer must control his own product and say at what price it is to be sold to the consumer. By this method wasteful and extravagant methods of distribution can be eliminated.

The fact that the Government to-day is before Congress asking authority to fix a basic price to the producer on food products is proof of the correctness of the theory that has heretofore been advanced by that class of business men who have contended that legislation should be immediately enacted empowering the producer to fix a uniform price upon the resale of his product to the consumer. They have sought legislation from Congress that would enable the producer to bridge the passage across the field of distribution to the consumer by fixing the profits that are to be made by the wholesaler and the retailer upon his products and the final price at which his product is to be sold to the consumer. By this method the price cutter and speculator are both completely eliminated, and the cost of their operations is saved to the producer and the consumer.

The court decision making such a contract illegal, above referred to, was an invitation to the buccaneer speculator and price cutter in the field of distribution to jump onto the producer and ruin his product by unfair competition and dishonest methods of merchandising. The producer could no longer protect the consumer of his product from either the speculator or the price cutter. If his product was the subject of speculation and high prices, consumption immediately fell off and the producer was injured by the loss of trade and the consumer was injured by being compelled to go without his product. The power in the distributor to run down the price to the consumer is also the power to raise it to the consumer. If the consumer could fix the price, he would not only ruin the distributor but the producer as well, and therefore he would ruin himself. It is quite apparent that the man who produces an article has an inherent right to price it. If no one wants it at his price, it is his misfortune; but he alone knows what it has cost him to produce it, and he alone knows how much profit he must take in order to continue producing it. The court, of course, admits that, but the court says he can not enter into a system of contract with his distributors fixing the price at which it shall be passed on to the consumer, because that would be against public policy and in restraint of trade. It is a strange conclusion to draw from the state of facts, because every producer is in the fiercest competition with other producers of like articles, each bidding for the consumer's favor in price, in quality, and in quantity. There can be no restraint of trade in such a practice, because competition is in no way interfered with.

As a result of this court decision a demand for remedial legislation has grown up among both distributors and producers asking that a law be passed legalizing a contract by a producer for the resale of his product through the wholesaler and retailer to the consumer at a price to be agreed upon. To that end a bill commonly known as the "price-maintenance bill," or "A bill to prevent dishonest advertising and false pretenses in merchandising"—Stephens bill—has been before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House for several years, and extensive hearings have been held upon the same. If this bill should become a law, it will aid very materially in protecting the honest merchant from the price cutter and speculator, who are both interlopers into the field of distribution, and thereby protect the producer from the encroachments of the field of distribution, and thereby increase production and gradually lower costs and prices.

The great advantage to the consumer in an arrangement like this lies in the fact that he has a steady market in which to buy his products as well as in which to sell. He pays a price for his supplies that allows an honest profit to the distributor, the wholesaler, and the retailer, and an honest competitive profit to the producer. These profits will be regulated by the power of the producer to guide his product across the turbulent field of distribution at a certain price. If he fails to maintain it, the price cutter—broadly speaking—will ruin the producer and the speculator will ruin the consumer; and they usually ruin each other in the end, only to be replaced by a new breed of price cutters and speculators as fast as their places are vacated.

FARMER HELPLESS—TOOK HIS CROP AT 10 CENTS A BUSHEL.

This great war was necessary to prove to the consumer the effect of unbridled competition on the producer and consumer alike. It is most marked of course on bulk goods, where the speculator has unbridled control. A producer of branded goods that bear his name and reputation can, to some extent, be protected, but the farmer producer is at present helpless. The speculator or dealer takes his grain and meat at his own price at the shipping station or central market. The farmer never in all his life fixed the price on anything he had to sell. He was compelled to sell. Those who purchased paid what they pleased without any regard whatever to the cost of the product. I have seen them take the corn crop in my home State at 9 and 10 cents a bushel, and force the producer to go in rags and without fuel until drouth or storms would come to his rescue and cut down his yield, and thus through great scarcity force the public to pay him a living price for his finished product. He has often been compelled to burn his corn to keep from freezing, because the crop could not be sold for enough to buy coal. There were plenty of people going hungry for the want of the meat that the 10-cent corn would produce in vast quantities, but the system of distribution killed the producer and robbed the consumer because we had not hit upon a method of regulation. We now see it would have been profitable to us all if the railroads would have exchanged the corn for coal by reducing transportation charges. We can now see that it was a crime to burn that corn for fuel while many people in other sections were hungry for the bread and meat it would produce. We can also see, now that the war has bred millions of speculators, that it is a crime to permit them to starve the consumers by making prices prohibitive. We can all see that now, and we are going about seeking quick methods for smiting the speculator and weeding him out of the channels of trade. But in times of peace, when the consumer was fairly comfortable with a reasonably full belly, there was no cry heard anywhere from him to protect the producer from this same speculator and his running mate, the price cutter, who were eating out the life of the producer. There was no cry from the consumer to protect the regular channels of trade, through which the producer must pass his goods, from the cutthroat methods of these two brigands of commerce.

The truth is, the so-called consumer is a bargain hunter who can not see an inch before his nose. He yowls for bargains in times of peace when a fair price to the producer should prevail, and encourages the price cutter. He yowls still more when the speculator pinches him in time of peace or war. In fact, he thinks only of his immediate needs, and what boots it to him how many producers fail if he gets a bargain? Maybe he is working on a salary for the producer whose business is being ruined by the buccaneers of trade. He seems to view a bargain as a separate fact from the life of the community in which he lives. He acts somewhat like the savage who throws away his blanket when the sun comes up in the morning, thinking he will never need it again.

The war accentuates all these mistakes in our system of distribution, and if the war is a big one our system breaks down completely, as in the present situation, leaving us face to face with the necessity of choosing a food dictator to protect us from the highbinders of commerce, whom we tolerated—in fact encouraged in times of peace—because of our own innate selfishness.

THE FOOD DICTATOR.

War invariably brings inflation of prices. The causes are many, but principally the expansion of credits and increased activities of the Government are the main factors. Money being available in large quantities and business enormously increased because of the increased activities of the Government, it necessarily follows that the demands for available supplies will be greatly increased. The added demands for practically the same volume of supplies is sure to cause a rise in price which will have little relation to costs of production.

Heretofore in all great wars the rapidly rising prices have been a great handicap to the belligerents as well as to neutrals. The habits of the people were completely disorganized and the burden of the public debt greatly increased because no check was placed upon rising prices. In fact, it was never thought possible or, if possible, desirable for the Government to interfere in matters that touched so directly the interests of the individual. Socialistic ideas were not so widespread among the ruling classes in former wars as they are to-day. The experiments in Europe have demonstrated by actual practice that the Government can check the wild rise in prices by legislation, much to the benefit of all the people.

In view of this experience of European Governments and the pressing need in this country of keeping prices barely above normal, this legislation proposing giving the President dictatorial powers to regulate prices of food, fuel, iron, steel, copper, and farm machinery is meeting with universal approval. The people prosper more under stable, fair prices than under high speculative prices, because they are assured of a safe and reasonable return upon their efforts.

If the producers were not of this opinion, they would not consent to a surrender of war prices for a fair price unless every class of business was placed upon the same footing. The cry for price regulation was emphasized by the high price of wheat during the spring months, when it rose to the record-breaking figure of over $3 a bushel. The wheat producer knows he would profit more during the war if let alone, but he has other considerations in mind. He knows that the grain dealers paid him about $1.25 a bushel for that wheat which finally sold for over $3 a bushel. He knows he never fixed the price on anything he ever produced which he had to sell. He knows the distributors invariably take his crops at their own price. Therefore he is not greatly disturbed about Uncle Sam taking it at his price. He guesses that Uncle Sam will have more interest in him than the distributors will, and I think his guess is good. He also has hope that something will come out of this great experiment by the Government in controlling prices that will be of great benefit to him after the war is over.

If the Government through a food dictator can protect the producer and consumer by keeping the cost of distribution down to a reasonable basis during the war, why will it not lead straight as a line to some sort of system of Government marketing in time of peace? That is the hope that is making this legislation popular among the producers.

Farmers as a class are wholly unorganized. It is almost impossible for them to organize into marketing associations on a scale of sufficient magnitude to cope with the large distributors who buy their crops. If they could organize they would, of course, force the distributors to pay them a fair price for their products. That would naturally lead to larger costs to the consumers if the distributors maintained their usual profits. Then, to make the system balance so competition would be fair, the consumers would have to organize to protect themselves from unfair prices fixed by the distributors. All of which leads one to wonder whether after all the best results could not better be obtained by Government control of some kind.

The Government has organized a shipping corporation for building up a merchant marine in order that the commerce of the country may flow freely between our own and foreign markets. It does not require a very wide spread of the imagination to see a practical application of the same principle in organizing through Government agencies, in cooperation with the producers, marketing associations that will be able to have something to say about the price of their own products. The unselfish interests of the Government would prevent unfair demands of the producers organized under such a governmental agency and at the same time it would sanction prices based on cost of production. The law of supply and demand is wholly ineffective when applied to agriculture, because it robs ruthlessly both the producer and consumers where it has a show to operate, but as a matter of fact it does not nor can not freely operate, there are so many artificial obstacles set up by the distributors to prevent it. No one in particular is to blame for the general conditions that exist, but in the aggregate the people are to blame for tolerating them, and it is up to them to find a solution.

It must be quite apparent to anyone that the producers of meat animals, for example, scattered on isolated farms and ranches all over the United States, are utterly helpless to protect themselves in the markets of the country. They produce blindly, at enormous expense, the meat supply of the country without the slightest assurance that they will even get the cost of their product when placed on the market. A few great distributors control the market. Now, these producers never can meet these distributors singly and get a profit for their product. It is unnatural to expect it. But if the Government could demonstrate in this great experiment of food control that it will be feasible for the Government after the war to say to the meat producers, "I will join you in organizing an association which will market your meat," it will be worth infinitely more than the war prices sacrificed.

The farmers would have confidence in such an association and their products would pass to market through it. The result would be most gratifying, indeed, for all concerned. The association would force the packer to pay a profit for the meat, an honest profit, because the Government would also represent the packer and the consumer as well as the producer. Under such a condition the cost of meat would be reduced because profits would be assured and great losses eliminated. There were in 1915 some 20,000,000 head fewer meat animals in this country than in 1900. This great shrinkage is due to the losses sustained by the producers who now refuse to produce the necessary meat under such hazardous conditions.

The same conditions prevail in the grain markets also. The producers of grain are utterly helpless to protect themselves against loss. The market conditions for farm products are inconceivably bad. There is no business known that suffers more than agriculture for the want of a sane market, one that is able to command a price that bears some relation to the cost of production. A manufacturer has some sort of notion of the demand for his product and adjusts his production to it. Besides that, he belongs to associations where producers of his kind act in harmony and for the good of their class. They figure up the cost of their product and add their profit, and as a rule they get their price. But with the farmer producer he must take what the distributor offers him, and it has no relation whatever to cost of production. Instead of the farmer making a profit, as a rule, he makes a loss and takes it out of his land. In other words, he has been selling the strength of his soil at so much a bushel to make up the loss sustained on the crops he takes from the soil. The east half of the United States has already sold most of its soil fertility, and the great grain belt is rapidly following suit. Soon it will be necessary to spend vast sums for fertilizers in the grain belt as a result of our stupid methods of marketing which leave the producer without means of replenishing his soil. The packer has made beef production so hazardous the farmer is forced to cut out, in a large measure, beef production, one of the principal factors in soil building. No matter how high or how low the price of corn goes the production of beef still remains more hazardous than gambling on the board of trade. I have seen the farmers of my State sell their corn at 8 and 10 cents a bushel and burn it for fuel, because it was cheaper to burn than wood and coal. He fed the country and went in rags, and the country accepted his sacrifice with perfect complacency. The result of this indifference of the people to his condition has greatly depressed agriculture, until to-day we produce less corn, wheat, oats, and cotton per capita than ever before in our history. Men of ability who were fortunate enough to get away have gone into other lines where greater profits with less hardships are obtainable. The country generally must pay for this loss to the producers in the end by being forced to pay a double price for its supplies.

Here are a few striking examples of how the farmer suffers from market conditions. In 1912 the farmers of this country raised bumper crops of corn with which to feed the hungry world. They cultivated 107,083,000 acres and raised 3,124,746,000 bushels of corn, for which they received $1,520,454,000. The price did not stimulate production, so in 1913 they reduced their crop 1,263,000 acres and their production 677,746,000 bushels, which was a tremendous shrinkage in the world's food supply. But mark the marvelous results to the farmer. He received for this greatly reduced crop $171,546,000 more than he received for the bumper crop of over 3,000,000,000 bushels in 1912. Now, let us look at the full story of the meaning of this crop shrinkage to the farmer. Here is about what the farmer saved in cost of production by reducing his crop 1,263,000 acres:

Saving in cultivating 1,263,000 acres, at $15	$18,945,000
Saving in husking 677,746,000 bushels, at 4 cents	27,089,840
Saving in hauling 677,746,000 bushels to market, at 8 cents	54,219,680
Increase in price of 1913 short crop over 1912	171,546,000
Value of 1,263,000 acres for other crops, $5 per acre	63,150,000
Or a total saving of	234,949,520

In other words, the farmers were nearly $235,000,000 better off as a result of giving the world 677,000,000 bushels less of corn. Inasmuch as the distributors take the farmer's corn at their own price, they did not show much interest in the general welfare in fixing the price so low on their bumper crop.

There has never been too much corn, nor there never will be, so the world would have been exceedingly wise to have taken the 1912 crop at a profitable figure to the producer and thereby made sure of a larger acreage for 1913. However, our system of marketing is so utterly stupid no such sensible policy is possible. We depend upon competition in a market of speculators, traders, and gamblers to fix a price upon the staple products of the farm, with the result that price has no relation whatever to the cost of production.

The same story is told by the crop figures on wheat in 1908 as compared with the 1913 crop. In 1913 we had increased our crop over that of 1908 by two and one-half million acres and our yield nearly 100,000,000 bushels, and the producer for his trouble and expense got nearly $7,000,000 less. In other words, he gave the world 100,000,000 bushels of wheat for nothing and then sold the rest of his crop for $7,000,000 less than his crop of 1908 brought him. To raise that 100,000,000 bushels of wheat for which he got nothing he used 3,000,000 bushels of seed and spent at least twenty-five millions in money to sow and harvest the crop, besides another five millions for marketing it. It is plainly evident that there is neither rhyme nor reason to a market that delivers such a staggering blow to the producer as this example shows.

The same experience fell to the lot of the cotton planter in 1911. That year he produced a bumper crop of fifteen and one-half million bales, for which the world paid him $60,000,000 less than it paid him for eleven and one-half million bales the year before. In other words, the world robbed him of 4,000,000 bales for which he had spent uncounted millions in labor and expense. With infinite pains millions of black men, women, and children toiled through an entire season producing that additional crop of 4,000,000 bales, for which they did not receive one cent. The world had more cloth, but these people had less bacon as a result of their added efforts.

Every time the farmer attempts to raise more crops in order that the world may be better fed and that he may also add to his own comforts of life, he is met with a rebuff in the form of a staggering loss as exampled in these three cases. He knows that there is no hope for him in the present markets of the country, because the prices worked out in these markets have no relations whatever to the cost of production. The prices of his products hinge upon a roaring battle between the bulls and the bears in the grain and cotton exchanges of the country. The advantage is sometimes with the bulls and for a day the farmer prospers, and then the tide turns and the bears come in for a killing and the farmer suffers. So the fight goes on year after year, decade after decade, with production per capita constantly falling off. Nothing can be so stupid as this system of setting a price on the products of the soil. Why does not the manufacturer have the price of his product fixed by the bulls and the bears in a similar market to that which preys upon the farmer? Because he has a better method. He bases his price upon his costs of production. But the farmer has not been able so far to do it. Maybe the food dictator can show us how it can be done. If I did not believe that such a thing is possible I would never support this legislation. War conditions create a good market for the staple products of the farm. The bears all become bulls during a war, and the farmer comes into his own at such times in spite of all obstacles. That being true, why should the farmer give away his opportunity for gathering in war prices now, when for generations past and gone he has been compelled to submit to this alleged law of supply and demand, otherwise known as the law of bulls and bears, much to his sorrow? Because he feels it his patriotic duty to do so, believing it will strengthen the arm of the Government in this war; and second, because he hopes that from this great experiment in the Government control of the market a new and valuable lesson may be learned. If the President is able to select a food controller provided for in this proposed legislation who is a wise man, a patriotic man, a man with a far-reaching vision, he will open a wonderful future for the farmers of this country. He will demonstrate in the greatest experiment ever tried out in the world the fact that food can be profitably and cheaply produced in great abundance. If he does this, then the country will be doubly blessed. But if he is not wise and patriotic to a marked degree he is sure to bring widespread ruin upon the country. But we can console ourselves in taking this chance in the thought that war is a great gamble at best. We will have to accept the results, whatever they may be.

The Picket and the Public.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RAKER,
OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, July 3, 1917.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with consent granted me by the House to-day, I am inserting an article in the Woman Citizen of date June 30, 1917, the official organ of the National American Woman Suffrage Association. The honorary president of this association is Dr. Anna Howard Shaw; its president is Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt. Both Dr. Shaw and Mrs. Catt have been in this work for many years, and they not only have national but international reputation for the splendid work they have done on the question of equal rights for women. The National American Woman Suffrage Association, through its various officers, have repeatedly stated their position in regard to picketing. The editorial in the Woman Citizen clearly and forcibly presents to the American public where the National American Woman Suffrage Association and its officers and members stand and have stood on this question of picketing and their want of any connection therewith and their repudiation of the picket tactics. The editorial referred to is as follows:

THE PICKET AND THE PUBLIC.

The National American Woman Suffrage Association, comprising the great body of organized suffragists the country over, deplores as absurd, ill timed, and susceptible of grave and demoralizing suspicion the tactics of the isolated handful of suffragists at the National Capital who think to advance the cause of suffrage by demonstrations like the recent banner episodes at the White House.

Is that plain?

The National American Woman Suffrage Association likewise deplores as unfair and wasteful the reiterated demands upon it from friend and foe of suffrage alike to "repudiate," "denounce," "state its position on the subject." It can, apparently, repudiate and denounce and state its position till the crack of doom and still be left at the mercy of clamorers for more denunciations and more repudiations. These clamorers, particularly those who are suffragists, could be about a bigger business than such footless insistence. Concerned as it is with a great constructive, forward-looking, forward-leaping program for furthering the suffrage cause, the National American Woman Suffrage Association deplores having its time, energies, and attention constantly deflected to offset the effects of publicity tactics with which it is not and never has been in sympathy and which it has emphatically condemned and never condoned.

Is that plain?

And now—

The National American Woman Suffrage Association wants to point out that it is not blind, if the clamorers are, to the fact that every time it concedes to the clamor it is but playing the publicity game into the hands of the small group of suffragists to whose campaign publicity is fundamental.

For where agitation is the watchword publicity is the achievement.

Can it not be understood once and for all, by suffragists, by press, and by general public, that the White House tactics of the picketers are but a detail of a publicity campaign which suffragists and press and general public immeasurably further by the attention which they center upon it? (The lady from Missouri who tore down the pickets' banner built up the pickets' publicity as no picket and no banner could have done.)

Not all such publicity aids are hostile in their animus. There is no question that men are encouraging the small group that is committed to picket tactics. As grown-ups encourage a froward child whose antics are plaguing other grown-ups, so do men of otherwise discriminative intelligence encourage the banner bearers.

And despite an increasingly fine balance of judgment on the part of editors and reporters, there is no question that the attitude of a part of the press is an encouragement. From the viewpoint of news a defy to the President of the United States, even flaunted on a pretty little purple and gold banner, is highly available "front-page stuff," and there is the gayest and friendliest of understandings between many newsmen and the banner bearers.

While we are placing the blame, therefore, let us divide it fairly and squarely, none at all to the suffrage cause, none to the organized suffragists who resent having that cause drawn into such fracases, and one part to the pickets who incite these ructions, one part to the press that spreads the story in the way most calculated to make a prolonged sensation of it, and one part to the public that thrills humanly over its own shocks.

It is a fact that there remains in America one man who has known exactly the right attitude to take and maintain toward the pickets. A whimsical smile, slightly puckered at the roots by a sense of the ridiculous, a polite bow, and for the rest a complete ignoring of their existence. He happens to be the man around whom the little whirlwind whirls—the President of the United States.

The National American Woman Suffrage Association respectfully urges the rest of the country to take example from him in its emotional reaction to the picket question.

The River and Harbor Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. GRAHAM,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 27, 1917,

On the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, there are two reasons why I do not find myself able to support the rivers and harbors bill now presented. Without encumbering the RECORD unnecessarily I desire to briefly state the reasons.

In the first place, no reason presents itself to me why this bill should be presented and urged for passage at this session of Congress. When the President convened the Congress in extraordinary session it was for the purpose of passing upon the question of whether a declaration should be made that a state of war existed between this Government and the Government of Germany, and for such other measures as might be necessary if such declaration of war was made. Congress was not convened for purposes of general legislation. No bills on general legislation have been considered by or reported out of committees of this House; in fact, the Members have not asked for such committee consideration. I dare say there is not a Member of the House who has not some general legislation that he desires to have passed. But it has been the general expression of this House and the country at large that we ought only to give our attention now to such matters as have to do with the conduct of the war in which we are now engaged.

However, and notwithstanding this, we find the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors insisting on the passage of this bill at this special session, and for many days it has been debated and has received the consideration of this House. It is not a war measure in any respect. There may be items in the bill of merit, such as the improvement of the harbors at our principal seaports. But as has been so ably shown by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], there seem to be ample funds on hand with which the work on these projects can be carried on until Congress shall meet in regular session in December next.

It has been stated to me, in answer to my inquiries while this bill was under general discussion, that if these appropriations were not made we would lose, by the action of the water and the elements, the benefits of immense sums we have already spent on these rivers and harbors. The evidence given before the committee when this bill was being considered showed that approximately $5,000,000 would suffice to maintain the works mentioned in this bill for the period covered by the bill. But the bill calls for an expenditure of approximately $27,000,000. This sum, added to the amounts already in the treasury and available, make a large total of money which the proponents of this bill now propose to expend. Only a small proportion of the money proposed to be expended is for maintenance, and the great bulk of it is for new projects and new work. Practically all of the new work proposed in this bill could not, reasonably, be expected to be finished during the present war with Germany, and much of it is on inland waterways of absolutely no importance in connection with the carrying on of this or any other war.

We are preaching economy. We are telling the housewife to be frugal and to save; we are passing laws to encourage the farmer to aid production and conserve his forces; we are preaching economy to the laboring man; we are threatening the mine operator and the middleman with prosecution if they take unfair or excessive profits from the consumer; the administration has stated that it must have laws passed giving governmental control of necessaries and such powers have been ungrudgingly granted by this House. We, on this side of the House, have, by our votes, helped to give to the President every power he has said he needed for the successful carrying on of the war. Not the least of these requests has been one for national economy. But now this rivers and harbors bill, approximately $27,000,000, the greater part of the expenditures of which are unnecessary at this time, is produced and its passage is insisted upon, and it is stated here in argument that the entire bill has the approval of the President. At a time of national stress, when we are bending every power to the conservation of our national resources, is an exceedingly poor time to appropriate moneys to make a survey of or dredge some nameless River of Doubt so that some Member of Congress may receive the plaudits of his admiring constituents. Economy, like charity, should begin at home.

Some attention, at least, should be paid to the psychology of the situation. The administration must have the sympathy and support of the country if it is to successfully carry on this war. Some things have already been done that have impaired the confidence of the people. It is highly inadvisable to pass at this time what the people, almost generally, believe to be a measure for the distribution of political favors. Rightfully or wrongfully, the impression prevails throughout the country that this and all like measures are "pork-barrel" bills. To pass this bill at this time simply induces the belief in the minds of our people that the Congress and the administration are insincere, and in the same breath preach economy for the people and political pap for themselves. Surely, at such a time as this, we can forego this semiannual visitation, the rivers and harbors bill.

There is another absolutely sufficient reason why this bill should not pass. Omnibus legislation is wrong; every omnibus bill is wrong; the system is wrong. What is the system? Those who are framing these bills know perfectly well that a bill calling for appropriations for some of the desired improvements only would never become the law. So items are included calling for improvements in other States and districts. Some of these projects may be laudable; some may be an absolute waste of the people's money. But by the patchwork method, a distribution of money to various localities, enough votes are secured to pass the bill. A Member of Congress who represents a constituency where improvements are proposed to be made by items in the bill finds himself in the position where he must either vote against his constituents and their private interests or for the bill with all it may contain. This is the underlying evil in all such legislation and is a practice that ought to be stopped. Omnibus bills, such as public-buildings bills and rivers and harbors bills, are all of this nature and are vicious. I have had several men in this House, men whom I highly respect, tell me that they would vote against this bill if it were not that it contained appropriations for their districts, and they must therefore support it. Everyone here knows and concedes that this bill contains indefensible items. Everyone here knows that the bill would fail if it did not have items in it that immediately affect, financially, the districts of a majority of the Members of this House.

It has been said that it is necessary to thus cumulate these items in order to get needed improvements. I do not believe it. Instead of this old, vicious method of logrolling and pork, a proper budget system should be developed. A man ought not to have to vote for something that is wrong in order to vote for something that is right. In law it is the rule that a pleading that in part is obnoxious to a general demurrer is bad in toto; a drop of poison placed in a mass of liquid nevertheless disseminates its poison throughout the whole mass. The same method of reasoning applies here. If there is vice in the bill, the whole bill is bad. We should create a governmental commission, with semijudicial functions, to pass upon the feasibility and worth of the various plans submitted for waterways and harbor improvements. Remove the matter from politics and make it a scientific question. Substitute a careful budget system for the present careless, wasteful, vicious system. If this be done, river and harbor improvements can be had that are really needed, and many hundreds of millions of expenditures obviated. If this be done, Members of this House can vote for such measures without feeling in their consciences that they are doing something unworthy of them as Members of the greatest national assembly of the world.

Food-Control Bill—Deliberation Rather Than Mere Ratification in Legislation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. S. D. FESS,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, before the day is closed this House will pass by a large majority this bill, a piece of legislation that is so unlike anything this country has ever attempted that it is almost revolutionary. During the debate, when numbers of us have cautioned against delegation of too broad powers to the President, it was frankly admitted by various Members that autocratic power was sought in the measure in the conviction that history proved that no great war was ever won except by autocratic power. Of course, this statement is not historically true, but it was not controverted on the floor. It shows the temper of this Congress in the face of what may be dire fatality unless met by speedy action; this membership is willing to go to almost any extent if it appears necessary to meet the crisis.

Mr. Speaker, as I said under general debate, I am one of the Members who are jealous of the prerogatives of this body. I have watched with keen scrutiny ever since I have been a Member the extension of executive over legislative function in our Government. However, I have felt that the exigencies of the case justified this measure, which is the ground for my assistance in whatever way I could render it to the chairman of the committee, whose conduct of the bill is at once a real joy to his friends, which practically include every Member of this body. But this desire to see the measure carried to a final vote does not justify the strictures of many Members, especially Democratic Members, against other Members who exercised their rights to attempt to change the measure, to perfect it as they deemed wise. Some of these critics intimate a partisan source of objections, which is totally without foundation. Such a revolutionary piece of legislation should be carefully considered and widely discussed in its every detail and without the charge of partisan bias, mainly because I am quite sure that the measure when it goes into effect is destined to prove a dismal disappointment to the public, due to a wrong hope produced by what I fear have been unwise utterances here on the floor and carried by the press throughout the Nation.

The major portion of this debate has been cast upon the plane of exorbitant prices due, as they declare, in the main if not totally to the food speculator and gambler. These "sharks" have been pilloried in this House, dire execution has been ordered, and every such utterance was greeted by loud applause, indicative of a sincere conviction that the speaker had properly apprehended the culprit and his crime. This legislation is avowedly proposed as a remedy for the protection of the public. When it goes into effect, if the Senate passes it—and there can be little doubt of its passage—the people thus prepared have a right to expect falling prices in a marked degree, and at once, not to rise again.

Mr. Speaker, herein lies the source of our disappointment if not danger. When the Government assigns causes and affords remedies the people have a right to expect results. The figures quoted on prices of flour in England as compared with what we must pay are misleading and bound to produce disappointment which may lead to serious conditions here in American cities. The flour made out of wheat purchased at $1.08 per bushel can be sold cheaper than that made out of $3.25 wheat. The high prices are due to a combination of forces, all dating back to the complete interruption of the world's production and consumption of food supply. When the world borrows money to purchase what must be had to avoid national disaster, if not death, the price is no item in the purchase. Food and feed as well as fuel must be had in time of war, no matter what may be the price. What is asked is paid. This produces an inflation which will be felt in every possible transaction of sale. This explains why enterprises which are in no way connected with war business are also stimulated.

This bill will enable our authorities to prevent the outside world bidding in the open market for breadstuffs and food that must be supplied to the world's armies and navies to avoid fatalities. What is true of foodstuffs is likewise true of fuel. The bill will also be able to guide production and regulate consumption as well as to conserve against waste. This is the merit which we may hope to realize. We can not hope for much more. It will take the allies out of the open market by governmental regulation of exports. To provide for this power, where we could both buy and sell so far as our rationing Europe goes, we were required to take quite serious steps from the standpoint of our theories of government, not because of choice but rather of necessity.

Instead of scolding this body for deliberate action on such momentous matters and abjuring us to quickly ratify a bill without any mature consideration, time will prove to the public, if not to these critics, the wisdom of taking time to deliberate. This measure was brought to this House, which began its consideration only last Monday, the 18th. It has occupied the attention of the country for less than a week. It will pass to-night, after but six days of consideration, both under general debate and its reading for amendment. It does not only comprehend the control of food, feed, and fuel by placing vast powers into the hands of the President, but the conservation amendment just enacted by a decisive vote, which forbids further use of grains in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages for the period during the war, a measure which I supported with all my heart as the wisest step we can at this time take to avoid a wicked waste of our food supply. By this amendment the measure goes vastly further than food conservation; it reaches into the wider field of vital conservation, which, after all, is the real function of legislation in its final analysis. When the character of such legislation, its far-reaching effects, are properly comprehended, no man in or out of Congress has any ground for stigmatizing this House for moving deliberately. Mr. Speaker, the real danger in a body like this is not too much deliberation, but rather too great haste. Especially is this true in times like these, when men demand action and care little for mature consideration. This Congress has been the target for that precise reason of caustic comment, especially by the cosmopolitan press. The whip and spur have been freely applied because we have not gone rapidly enough. The criticism is unfounded and unwise. There is no period in legislative history which will show such expedition in the enactment of laws, both in stupendous importance, because of the character of legislation, as well as the volume of legisation. This Congress came into special session in response to the hurry call of the President on April 2. The House wasted no time in effecting an organization, notwithstanding the strength of the two parties was such that an indefinite amount of delay might have resulted had there been a disposition to do so. The House heard the President at the joint session of House and Senate on the same day of convening on the critical theme of a state of war with Germany. Without delay a joint resolution embodying a recognition of the existence of a state of war between our country and the German Imperial Government was presented and debated in the full realization of the awful consequences of our country's entrance into the world holocaust, a step we had earnestly hoped we need not take, yet many of us feared we could not avoid. The debate began at 10 o'clock April 5, and the vote was taken, after 17 hours of continuous discussion, at 3 o'clock the next morning, with but 50 Members voting against it. The fateful step having been taken with an appreciation of its meaning, this Congress at once set itself to the task of putting our house in order. It immediately authorized an issuance of $7,000,000,000 worth of bonds. Our national debt, which was but $973,000,000, jumped overnight to the staggering figure of nearly $8,000,000,000. It is true that $2,000,000,000 of this was short-time certificates, upon which no interest was to be charged. It is also true that $3,000,000,000 were designed as loans to our allies, with expectation that it will be paid back to us in time.

This measure was passed on April 14 by a comparatively unanimous vote, but two Members voting "present" and no one voting "no." The Congress, having thus provided the money power necessary, took up at once the problem of organizing the man power of the Nation. It took up the matter of providing an army, and in the short space of two weeks it adopted conscription, a method totally repugnant to a democratic or republican idea of raising an army, and a method which after three years of the world's greatest war the leading powers of the allied forces in Europe have not been able to adopt as a policy. Here, Mr. Speaker, was a complete overturning of our very genesis as a Nation, but done aboveboard by the Nation's Representatives, with their eyes wide open to the innovation, but convinced that the exigencies of the situation demanded this exceptional venture. With the most powerful argument against the employment of conscription until the volunteer method had been first tried out, a position with which I agreed and so voted, yet the opinion of the country seemed to favor the draft system, and it was not only passed, but by early June under the law 10,000,000 of our youth had registered and now stand ready to be called to the colors. In the face of such measures as these, unlike anything in this or any other country, this Congress is held up by the critic and a large portion of the press, which is impatient, as a laggard body, wasting valuable time in useless discussion.

This Congress has also enacted an espionage law, which could not have been passed at all were it not for the emergency that faces us.

This is a new field opened to us by the necessities of war. We have here entered the realm of legislation against sedition and espionage. We have dangerously approached a strangling of free speech and the throttling of a free press. We have in a few days' time, in the interest of national safety against possible dangers of enemy spying, written into statutory law the most drastic provisions against giving information to the enemy. Had this House pursued the advice of some Members and had accepted the bill as handed down from above, in the theory that Congress should disclaim either the right or the wisdom of deliberation as contrary to congressional duty in time of war, we would have at this moment as a statute on our law books a more drastic censorship of the press than is exercised by any Government now at war. It was this body, after many heated contests both among ourselves and with the body at the other end of the Capitol, that saved to our people their right to the freedom of the press to give such information as the country has the right to know. As the law was finally enacted it is an important piece of legislation stripped of the dangers of a muzzled press.

This Congress also enacted a law authorizing the Government to take over the German merchant vessels which were voluntarily tied up in American waters when the war cloud broke upon the world. This was an important step of international significance, and it unfurled the Stars and Stripes over more than 50 merchantmen, one of which is the largest vessel of its kind ever launched from any shipyard in the world. While this act was expeditiously passed it was fully discussed in the House as befits a legislative body dealing with international issues.

This Congress also modified the Federal reserve act as a war emergency measure permitting a mobilization of the reserve and granting the power to further expand the credit of the country. The tremendous demand upon the world's exchanges argues for greater expansion of credits. While I am convinced this was a wise measure in the main, yet the possibilities of inflation involved in the authority of a member bank to use the gold and gold certificates it holds as collateral for Federal reserve notes as a part of its reserve upon which Federal reserve notes may be issued is a most dangerous power, especially in times of abnormal conditions in the business world. In such times inflation is the tendency of trade and should not be stimulated by law, but rather retarded. More time for deliberation would have certainly led to a modification of this provision by order of the House.

But, Mr. Speaker, the most striking comment of what ill-advised and undigested legislation may result when expedition rather than effective legislation is the order is the revenue bill, which provided for raising by taxation $1,800,000,000 and which was passed through the House on schedule time. Usually such a measure would take weeks of consideration. The Senate will take time, but not so in the House. The bill has the anomaly of being reported by a unanimous committee and yet disowned by every Member as a foundling. It was a good example of a necessary evil to be accepted in order to get rid of it. The chairman of the committee frankly stated that he proposed to shut his eyes, hold his nose, and swallow it whole. Milder apologies were made by other Members. Indefensible items were readily acceded to, and the ready defense was "we must have the money." The bill covered every conceivable phase of taxation known to the political economist and involved others never yet tried, such as the retroactive feature, the horizontal tariff, and gross-sales tax whether upon a profit or loss basis. For mere self-defense the committee invoked the rule to prevent the addition of any other item. Bad as it was, the committee believed the addition of other items would make a bad situation worse. The monstrosity so frequently thus denominated was sent through this House with great expedition so as to serve the Senate a skeleton upon which to work. Most naturally the Senate is exercising under the right of amendment of revenue bills its prerogative, and through its Finance Committee it is taking its own good time, where it still is safely ensconced. But we are told that it will in due time come forth a new bill, with no marks to identify it as the House bill.

This war-revenue bill, a mere hodgepodge, in sacred phraseology fearfully and wonderfully made, was jammed through this House under the whip and spur of great necessity, and with the one persistent answer to every objection, "We must have the money." This body rushed the bill through with all its crudities, its dangerous innovations of retroaction included, in the hope that the Senate might correct the errors. Undue haste was displayed here, where it was considered but a few days and sent to the Senate, where for weeks it has rested in the Finance Committee, which as yet has not seen fit to report it to the floor of the Senate. The impatient Members of this House who freely lecture this membership for taking time to inquire into the character of all legislation here proposed, and especially when of a revolutionary character, involving both policies of doubtful constitutionality and unwise expediency, might well, not only for their own standing but for the sake of their country, take a few moments to consider the consequences of measures whose far-reaching effects are not easily fully discerned. With whatever else we may be charged, this Congress can not be condemned for too much time in deliberation. In but a little longer time than it will take to tell it we have, by resolution of this Congress, entered the world war to make the supreme test of mankind in this frightful human cataclysm. We have enrolled ready to be called to the national colors 10,000,000 young men. We have authorized an increase of our public debt eight times what it was before we entered the vortex. We have authorized the President to commandeer the shipyards and munition plants if he finds it necessary to do so. We have passed appropriation bills carrying staggering sums to take care of these various authorizations. The general deficiency bill, carrying $163,841,400, became a law 14 days after it came to the House. The sundry civil bill, carrying $147,363,928, became a law 10 days ago. The Army appropriation bill, carrying $273,046,322, became a law the 12th of last month. The Military Academy bill, carrying $1,344,896, became a law May 29. The military and naval deficiency bill, carrying the bewildering sum of $3,281,094,541, came to the floor of this House April 30, passed the House May 2—after but three days of discussion—and the Senate May 16, sent to conference June 7, was agreed to June 12, and approved June 15. Here are five appropriation bills amounting to nearly $4,000,000,000 which have passed the Congress since we met in special session April 2. These figures do not include the proposed $600,000,000 for aviation, which the country will almost certainly demand before we finish our war preparation. No wonder we are charged with spending public money like drunken sailors.

Among the most important items in winning the war is the food question, both for ourselves and the armies in Europe fighting our enemy. The first step was the food-survey bill, to ascertain the food situation, as to quantity in existence, where it is held, in what condition, and the prospects both for increasing production and reducing waste. This bill was passed through the two Houses and awaits action in conference. The bill which we will pass before the day closes, and the deliberate consideration of which has provoked caustic criticism of impatient Members, is designed to promote production and conserve against waste of all foods, feeds, and fuel as well as articles used in the production of them.

Mr. Speaker, I am not here attempting to indicate what has been done for and by the various military and naval divisions. It is sufficient to say that the entire national activity, comprehending the Nation's vast resources, has been largely mobilized. The entire industrial life of our people, including the rural activities, both the capital and labor of the country, the scientific and professional ability of the Nation—in fact, the entire population—is being rapidly enlisted to win the war. Our Navy is in action, and Admiral Sims is in command of the Irish waters in the campaign against the submarine; the Army is mobilizing the man power of the Nation; Gen. Pershing is now being consulted at the front; our boys are in the training camps; the captains of industry are organizing the money power of the country; the Council of National Defense is seeking to insure fullest utilization of America's varied ability of resource; and the press, aided by various adjuncts, is creating a sound public opinion to assist in winning the war in the shortest possible time at the least possible loss of treasure. The President, as Commander in Chief of all the land and sea forces, must depend upon Congress, the war-making power, to find the means. When the work of this Congress is reviewed it will be readily conceded that no such volume of important measures, both emergent and stupendous in consequences, ever passed a legislative body in so short a time. It is indicative of the grasp of this Congress of the vitally serious situation confronting the world and the very large part our country must now play in that world situation.

Mr. Speaker, as a Republican, I desire to remind the country in this crisis that there is and has been no delay in the needed legislation to carry our flag to the front. While the administration, both executive and legislative, is in the hands of the Democratic Party, and while this House has a greater Republican than Democratic membership, and could thereby make untold confusion for the party in power, from the very first the Republican Members, both of House and Senate, have taken the lead in pressing these measures for final action. There has been no obstruction from this side of the aisle. Changes in proposed laws, which were made to strengthen them, were most largely suggested from this side.

Some of the most important measures were pressed to final and successful action by Republican leaders and against Democratic leaders. This is not to say the Democrats are less patriotic, but simply to remind the country of the unfailing support of the Nation in this hour of crisis by Republicans who refuse to make any political capital out of an emergency. There are many occurrences that Republicans condemn and which would be bitterly condemned in normal times. But to-day we realize the difficulties attendant in passing from a peace to a war basis, and recognize the impossibility of avoiding mistakes. While attention has been called to some such occasion, always in a constructive way, the spirit of destructive criticism has not found place in Republican councils and will not while the war is on, only to that degree where mistakes must be corrected and errors of policy must be avoided. The work of this House especially is not open to the criticism of Democrats, either from the standpoint of delay, obstruction, or lack of support by Republicans. The RECORD votes on all these measures will indicate the Republican attitude when the Nation faces a crisis, even though the entire administration is Democratic and frequently subject to severe criticism for narrow partisan action. At a time like this, when the Republic is to bear the chief brunt of the world's greatest disaster, mere partisan criticism will not be indulged, notwithstanding the provocation invited by the silly campaign slogan in the last campaign, "He kept us out of war," upon which Democracy retained control of the administration. It is our duty now to forget the cheap demagogy of a campaign and support the Nation's honor, dignity, and sovereign rights. The RECORD shows how this policy has been carried, so far as Republicans are concerned. It has been done calmly and deliberately. When the war ends Republicans will then answer the frequently propounded question, "After the war, what?" When the problem of readjustment comes Republicans will point the way. Until that day, while Democracy is responsible for policies, Republicans will be found, in the future as in the past, standing as a solid bulwark for the Nation as headed by Wilson, a Democratic President. But they will not hesitate to scrutinize every proposal, to alter by amendment wherein the proposed measure may be strengthened, and to substitute better ways when and where in their judgment the general welfare of the country will be enhanced. It is only in this way that the best national service to country can be rendered, especially in times of crisis where undue haste is counseled and where, as Lincoln so well said, "No good cause can be harmed by taking time."

This advice is especially true when we must be aware that many steps taken in times of war will never be retraced.

The Food Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. M. CLYDE KELLY,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 23, 1917.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this Congress will go down in history as the one which called for more sacrifices in manhood and money than any other which ever sat beneath this dome. We have been compelled, through force of fateful circumstances, to demand an outpouring of offerings from the American people, for the safety and security of the Republic.

Nobly has the answer been given in 10,000,000 young men enrolled as defenders of the Nation and $3,000,000,000 subscribed to the liberty loan. Right here and now is the opportunity of Congress to "do its bit" in the conduct of this war, by interning the liquor traffic for the period of the conflict. It is the biggest "bit" this body will have a chance to perform. Here is a chance to prevent the destruction of 11,000,000 loaves of bread a day, besides vast quantities of other foodstuffs. Here is a chance to make sure that the alcohol now in existence shall not be used to debauch and degrade men, but instead shall be utilized for the manufacture of necessary munitions of war, or fill a hundred hospital needs to save the lives and relieve the sufferings of wounded soldiers on the battle front.

I know all the arguments of those opposed to this action. But I will say that if I hesitated a moment in my belief that the public welfare demands the elimination of the liquor traffic at a time like this, the very arguments put forth by these interests would convince me and spur my action.

I am willing to let the liquor traffic prove why its doom should be sealed during the conduct of this war. I have at hand a booklet issued by the Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association of America. It is called the "Antiprohibition Manual," and was published in Cincinnati in 1915. In the introductory chapter it attacks the statistics used by temperance reformers, declaring that they are uniformly distorted. It declares that the reason for publishing this book is that the true facts may be known and that every figure used in it is authentic and beyond dispute. Therefore if I use the arguments of this book, so frankly self-praised and self-guaranteed, I shall certainly not be accused of unfair tactics.

On page 13 I find the following:

> According to the United States Statistical Abstract there are 300,000 farmers raising corn, barley, rye, hops, and fruits that go into the production of liquor. When you hear a prohibition speech you would imagine that only corn, and a small percentage of that, is used. The brewers and distillers of Peoria alone consume the entire surplus corn crop of Iowa and Illinois, after feeding and seeding. Figure up what that means in dollars and cents to the farmers of the country.

I submit that what is needed now is to figure up what that means to all Americans. Herbert C. Hoover, in a letter sent to all parts of the country, states that "the waste of a single ounce of food each day in every home means a yearly waste of nearly 500,000,000 pounds of bread." Yet here is a waste of 7,000,000,000 pounds of food yearly, enough to furnish food for an army of 7,000,000 men. Hoover also states that "the waste of a single slice of bread in every home each day means the daily waste of a million loaves of bread." Yet the liquor traffic wastes each day 11,000,000 loaves of bread.

Since the war declaration by this Congress every department of Government has been seriously considering the food problem. Gardening associations have been formed by the thousands and everything done to increase the acreage for food crops. In the meantime, prices of the foods essential to life itself have soared to such heights that the average home has faced privation and suffering. Almost every item in the daily menu for the average dining table is twice as high as a year ago.

Besides the necessity for food at home, there are the requirements of our allies to be considered. France faces a deficiency of 127,000,000 bushels of grain. England is resting in the shadow of the meal ticket. If we are to win this war—and anything short of complete victory is unthinkable—we must eliminate all waste of food. Every bushel of grain is a factor in our triumph and every ounce of food is of value.

In the face of such a situation here come the liquor interests glorying in the fact that 300,000 food producers are spending their entire time and using up their entire yield of foods to supply the demands of the liquor traffic.

When thousands of persons are crying for bread with upraised hands and famished lips the liquor traffic gloats over the grain it destroys in the manufacture of poison. When food riots bring storms of fury in city streets the liquor interests declare that all the surplus corn of the two greatest corn-producing States in the Union goes into the vats of the breweries and distilleries of a single city.

When the Government bends every energy to add single bushels to the production of food supplies this destroying force takes 150,000,000 bushels of grain from the national supply and wastes it in iniquitous fashion.

Waste? It is waste from every standpoint. The Liquor Dealers' Manual for 1917 states that there are 225,000 acres of land now being used for the growing of rice for the manufacture of liquor, 45,000 acres for hops, 700,000 acres for the production of molasses, 6,500,000 for grain. This makes, approximately, 7,500,000 acres whose entire yield goes into the manufacture of liquor. Under the intensive farming of Holland that tract of land would supply foodstuffs for every man, woman, and child in America and there would still be enough left for all the people of valiant France.

Then, there is the transportation of these wasted food products. In transporting its raw materials the liquor traffic uses 200,000 cars annually. Perhaps twice as many cars are used for carrying the finished product of breweries and distilleries. The ship tonnage used for the transportation of liquor could be used for food and munitions for the men who are fighting our battles against the Kaiser.

All these direct wastes call loudly upon this Congress to throttle this enemy within our gates for at least the period of the war.

But there are still other arguments in this book of liquor facts. On page 39 we have the following:

Prohibition means that billions of dollars must go into other lines of industry now crowded and surrounded by keen competition. Thousands of men and women will be without employment and compelled to compete anew with all labor. Then what happens to the labor market? It is flooded.

Is there any danger of flooding the labor market of America during this war? Is there not rather the danger that we will not have the labor necessary to carry out the plans for national defense in the mobilization of productive industry? During the debate on the bill permitting our allies to recruit their own countrymen in this country the one objection raised was that it would result in many laborers being taken from their places of employment in this country and thus handicapping industry.

The wage earners now employed in the liquor business could be vastly better employed in useful occupations. Nor would they have to change their trades in the vast majority of instances. The census report for 1910 shows that there were 69,920 wage earners employed in the production of liquor. Fully three-fourths were engaged in occupations not peculiar to the production of liquor. For instance, 15,351 teamsters were employed. Are they going to suffer irretrievable loss if they become teamsters in industries which mean a better, safer America instead of one which means a weaker, more degenerate America? There were 15,000 laborers employed in the liquor business. Would it not be better if they labered in constructive work instead of destructive? There were 3,000 stationary engineers. Would they not fill the same kind of positions in the mills, which are working night and day to defend America, and to much better advantage? The rest of the wage earners included blacksmiths, carpenters, coopers, electricians, machinists, painters, plumbers, and other mechanics, and every one of them could be an efficient unit in an efficient America.

As for the office force employed in the breweries and distilleries, there were 8,743 persons working as bookkeepers, stenographers, cashiers, clerks, and so forth. Every one of them could be absorbed in productive industry within a week, and their work would mean betterment instead of degradation.

As for the 938 distillers and rectifiers and the 11,088 brewers and the few others whose occupation is peculiarly that of the liquor business, we need have no fear of their inability to find decent employment. Even if they could not, we need not be distressed, since they have been receiving the savings of hosts of men long enough to be assured against any danger from the wolf at the door.

But the Liquor Dealers' Manual for 1917 goes still further than the Antiprohibition Manual. It declares that the "production and distribution of alcoholic beverages altogether gives employment to 1,200,000 people." Here are workers enough to take the places which will be left vacant by the first million men who are called into the American Army. Here are workers to build the ships which we must build faster than Germany can sink them.

Again, for the very reasons claimed by the liquor interests as their right to protection, I demand that the business be eliminated during this war. There is no place to-day for the "slacker," and neither is there any place for the "destroyer." It is time for lifting up, not tearing down; for construction, not destruction. By all the force of the demand for America united and efficient, the liquor traffic must be forced to take its palsying hand from the activities of the Nation.

Of course, there is the stock argument that workingmen are opposed to this action. I saw the unsigned advertisement in the Washington newspapers in which it was stated that 2,000,000 workingmen petitioned the President and Congress against cutting off such a habitual temperance beverage as beer. It was a defense of beer only, for the distillers seem to be left friendless and alone in this hour of dire peril.

That advertisement is the most astounding piece of false pretense I have yet seen. It would give the impression that 2,000,000 men have signed a petition against the action now proposed. But when you inspect it you see that it gives the names of trades councils and local unions and places the entire membership on record against this proposal to conserve foodstuffs in time of war. In the Pittsburgh division, for instance, it gives the names of organizations, with their memberships. I know personally hundreds of the members of the organizations so classified to be stalwart supporters of nation-wide prohibition in time of peace as well as in time of war. Yet they are here formally arrayed in opposition to a cause they have maintained vigorously for years. Could anything be more insulting to the intelligence of this Congress or a more slanderous assault upon the good faith of vast numbers of American workingmen? For my part, I am convinced that the average worker in America wants to sidetrack the beer wagon and give the bread wagon the right of way.

When you talk of labor's answer to the question forced upon us by the liquor traffic listen to the answer of leaders. Hear John Mitchell, idol of the coal miners of America: "I believe that liquor has contributed more to the moral, intellectual, and material deterioration of the people and has brought more misery to defenseless women and children than has any other agency in the history of mankind." Hear the answer of John B. Lennon, treasurer of the American Federation of Labor: "Go anywhere where liquor influence is felt, and you will see the demoralization it brings. Never a foul plot is organized to injure public rights and social well-being but liquor influence is behind the job."

That same answer comes with monotonous similarity from every person and force interested in the public welfare of America. It comes from medical colleges and hospitals, from charitable institutions and places of detention, from every place where the degenerating influence of the liquor traffic can be seen and measured. With a hundred new reasons for action brought about by this war in which we are engaged, America will commit a colossal blunder if she fails to act now.

But let us go a little further in this book of liquor "facts." On page 33 of the Anti-Prohibition Manual I find the following:

Remember that the United States Government is in partnership with the liquor business. The United States demands and receives a percentage of the profits but contributes nothing to the investment and pays no part of the expenses of the business.

Think of that. Uncle Sam pays no part of the expenses of the liquor business when it costs him $1,373,000,000 to pay for the courts, jails, and police necessary to take care of the finished product of the business.

No part of the cost when it takes many times the amount of revenues received to keep up the insane asylums, reformatories, and other institutions made necessary by the liquor business.

No part in the cost when the Nation's drink bill each year amounts to two and a half billions of dollars; enough to banish poverty from the land; enough to take up the entire Liberty Loan just placed; enough in three years to take up the entire bond issue authorized by Congress, the most stupendous measure of its kind in the history of the world.

Oh, yes; Uncle Sam pays all of the expenses of the liquor traffic in the end. His policy of taking in pennies that he may pay out dollars is suicidal at any time and especially now in this moment. It should not be longer tolerated.

Of course the liquor traffic is begging to have heavier taxes laid upon it now, and some wise men are sincerely convinced that liquor revenues are needed in the conduct of this war. But let us consider the question from a business standpoint: The argument that the Government can not afford to lose revenues from such a source is a devil's argument at any time. It is putting dollars above lives, money above human souls. But aside from that phase it will be the best business move ever made by the Government if it refuses now to accept another additional dollar from the traffic and outlaws it completely. Russia has profited in a financial way from such action, and the United States will have the same experience.

We will admit that the Government of the United States is in partnership with the liquor business. It has been ever since that dark day in the Civil War, when the liquor dealers, knowing their business to be an outlaw, pleaded with the Government to put an internal-revenue tax on their products. They plotted to get the Government financially interested in the traffic, and the plot succeeded. For a long time President Lincoln resisted the adoption of such a policy. He saw with the prophetic vision characteristic of him the results which would follow such action. Finally, in the face of the imperative need for war funds and after every congressional leader had promised that the tax should be abolished as soon as the war was over, Lincoln submitted to the imposition of the tax. Then when the war was over Lincoln had met a martyr's fate and the tax has not been repealed to this day.

That the partnership has been in force, none can deny. And the liquor traffic has shown its gratitude for the privileges given it by the Government in evil conspiracies against that Government. Not only have they poisoned the very spring and source of government by their corruption in politics, but they assailed the authority of the Government by forming the first criminal monopoly in this country. The famous whisky ring of 1874 has led the way for the brood of trusts and monopolies that have so menaced the safety of the Nation during the past generation.

Yes, we admit the partnership, and we propose to end it now. We have paid full price and more for it. It was made while war was raging. Let us end it now in this time of war. The continuance of the partnership means only shame and dangerous liabilities in time of peace, and defeat and disaster in time of war.

Mr. Speaker, every sane consideration demands the elimination of hostile forces inside the Republic during this war. The greatest and most destructive enemy to our efficiency now is the liquor traffic.

However much they desired to avoid that conclusion, every nation engaged in the great war has been forced to recognize the fact.

Russia put the ban on the liquor traffic at the outset. It was an act of self-defense, for vodka had rendered a mighty people helpless. Continuance of the conditions would have meant speedy disaster when the nation faced the enemy in the field.

The results proved that it was more than an act of self-defense; it was a stroke of enlightened statesmanship, seldom equaled in the history of nations. The Russian minister of finance, in his report for 1915, made the following statement:

The suppression of the Government alcohol monopoly entailed a decrease of 470,000,000 rubles in the budget of 1914; but the benefits of this suppression are already felt. Though it was feared that the calling of so many men to the colors would seriously embarrass industry, it has been found that, thanks to the suppression of the traffic in alcohol, the results of labor are from 30 to 50 per cent higher than before.

Nor is that all. It has been stated by Arthur Hunter, actuary of the New York Life Insurance Co., that the loss of half a million men in war can be made good in less than 10 years through abstinence from alcohol by the inhabitants of Russia. This declaration comes from no temperance "fanatic" or "visionary," but from a statistician who bases it purely on scientific investigation.

Those who have personally investigated conditions in Russia declare the results of prohibition little short of the unbelievable. In 1913 the savings banks deposits of all the people engaged in industry and agriculture amounted to 38,000,000 rubles. In 1915, in the midst of war, the amount had risen to 958,000,000 rubles. The people were not only producing more but were saving more, and the money thus saved made possible the taking up of Government bonds for the prosecution of the war.

Then, too, a Russia sober was of necessity forced to become a Russia free. Despotism could not hold sway over a people whose brains were clear and whose judgment was steady. The revolution in Russia, one of the greatest forward movements in the world's history was accomplished practically without bloodshed, simply because it came as a matter of course, a procedure almost universally accepted. The masses, freed from the bondage of alcohol, could not tolerate the chains of autocracy.

Russia in order to preserve her own existence was forced to outlaw the liquor traffic. From that act of self-defense has come a troop of benefits over and above mere self-preservation.

In England the deadly danger of the liquor traffic in time of war has been forced home just as surely. The present premier, Lloyd-George, at the very beginning of the war, said:

We are fighting Germany, Austria, and drink, and as far as I can see the greatest of these deadly foes is drink. It is doing us more damage than all the German submarines put together. If we are to settle with German militarism, we must first of all settle with liquor.

The powerful interests back of the liquor traffic prevented for a long time root-and-branch treatment, although many restrictive acts were passed. But the price of such refusal has been staggering and has cost Britain countless blood and treasure.

Early this year a petition of thousands of the leaders of English thought was presented to Parliament, with an urgent demand for the complete prohibition of the liquor traffic. No moral argument was used, only the one outstanding fact that the continuance of the traffic meant defeat and disaster in the war. These men—army and navy officers, heads of war industries, scientists, and educators—presented an indictment which, while one of the most bitter on record, was fully borne out by the facts.

Among other things, they said:

The liquor traffic hinders the army, delays munitions, keeps thousands of men from work daily, makes good workmen second rate. It hampers the navy, delays transports, places them at the mercy of submarines, slows down repairs, and congests docks. It threatens the mercantile marine, absorbing during the war between 60,000,000 and 70,000,000 cubic feet of cargo space, and retards the building of ships.

It destroys food supplies. In 28 months of the war it has used up over 3,500,000 tons of food supplies and consumed more sugar than the army.

It wastes our financial strength. In the first 20 months of the war our people spent on alcohol £300,000,000. It diverts the nation's strength. It uses 500,000 workers, 1,000,000 acres of land, and 1,500,000 tons of coal yearly. During the war it has involved the lifting and handling on road and rail of a weight equal to 50,000,000 tons.

The men in the trenches are betrayed by an enemy at home.

France, fighting for her life, was compelled to abolish absinthe and put the iron hand of repression on all alcoholic liquors. Italy has taken a similar course, and every other nation engaged in the war has been compelled, whether it desired or not, to deal with this internal foe.

Three centuries before Christ, Aristotle said to Alexander the Great, "The enemies of your army are in your own camp." His statement was given tragic proof when Alexander, invincible before any armed foe in the world, died in a drunken debauch in his own camp.

Mr. Speaker, America has entered the great war. She dare not advance against the foe without while she leaves unhindered and unscathed her deadliest enemy within. To so act will be suicidal policy, against which every nation at war protests out of its own bitter experience. Drink and efficiency in war can not go together. The liquor traffic must be dealt with as a foe of America.

Dealing with it thus, every law of self-defense demands that it be robbed of its power to injure and destroy. It has sealed its own doom as the wanton waster of a nation's food; as the costly burden upon the back of the Republic; as the transformer of useful labor into forces of destruction, as the lifter of the black banner, with emblazoned skull and crossbones for its standard in this day when unity and cooperation is needed if America is to endure.

If the liquor traffic is interned for the period of the war America will be sure of winning from this conflict a boon well worth almost any price of sacrifice. She will show to the world that her battles against evil power across the seas can be matched by the same battles at home. America invincible at home and abroad means America sober. If her ideals are to triumph in the future, the country must be freed from the dominion of the liquor traffic and right now America may speak a word and perform a deed for her ideals which will be heard and felt around the world.

The 1917 River and Harbor Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. MANSFIELD,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 26, 1917.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the discussions of this bill, and the more I hear them the more I am confirmed in the opinion that it ought to be enacted. In fact, the only objections seriously to be urged to it are, it occurs to me, that the appropriations for some of the items are inadequate in amount, while other projects, seemingly deserving, have been omitted, the result, as I conclude, of an unconscious surrender on the part of the committee to an inordinate desire to subserve the interests of economy. Whilst the motive which prompted this action of the committee is to be commended, the action itself is to be deplored.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has made the charge that the bill is a piece of Democratic extravagance, and by this statement he challenges comparison with the appropriations made by the Republican Party for like purposes. In answer to this I call attention to the fact that from March 4, 1909, to March 5, 1913, the four years of President Taft's administration, a Republican Congress, under a Republican President, appropriated for river and harbor improvements sums aggregating $184,329,365; while from March 4, 1913, to March 5, 1917, the four years of President Wilson's administration, a Democratic Congress, under a Democratic President, appropriated but $108,790,250 for such improvements, a cash balance in favor of the Democratic Party of $75,539,115. But I am not to be understood as criticizing the Republican Party for these expenditures. Rather would I compliment that party for making such necessary improvements, and the comparison is drawn for the purpose only of answering the charge made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has made the claim that it is a "pork-barrel" bill, and this charge has been echoed by others. Yet we find that not an item of it was added on account of the influence or "pull" of any Member of Congress, but, on the contrary, the bill was drawn by the majority of the committee from data furnished by the engineers, approved by the President, Secretary of War, and Secretary of the Navy, and does not contain an item that is without such approval. If it is possible to have a bill drawn that will more clearly refute the charge of "pork" I would like for those gentlemen to tell us how to do it.

The charge is also made that money has been ruthlessly wasted on projects embraced in former bills, due to the approval of the same board of engineers that has approved this bill, and the inference is left that the engineers of the War Department are either ignorant or corrupt, or both. The motives of those who favor river and harbor improvements are also impugned, and by innuendo they are accused of reprehensible methods in securing the passage of so-called "pork-barrel" appropriations, but such persons are absolved from "swerving a hair from the standards of individual honesty," and by this qualification the pungency of the sting is somewhat mollified (?).

Regardless of what others may think, I shall continue to support this bill, and, until I am furnished with further and more convincing evidence of the corruption or incompetency of the engineers of the War Department, I shall continue to rely upon their scientific knowledge in questions of this kind. To do otherwise, it occurs to me, would be inconsistent with a vote for appropriations for the West Point and Annapolis Acadamies. If the men turned out by those institutions can not be relied upon, let us do away with the worse than useless expense of maintaining them.

Gentlemen opposing the bill have found but one item upon which to center the force of their opposition, and that is the $30,000 appropriation for clearing the southern waters of hyacinths. This amount is intended for five States, and those who are familiar with the hyacinth know that it constitutes a serious obstruction to navigation. The reasons for the maintenance of this item are the same as those which cause the Russian Government to operate ice breakers to clear the port of Archangel. For the information of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who has suggested that the hyacinth might be utilized as a food product during the war I will say that it is in no sense considered a wholesome food for man, and I believe it to be as unsuited as a ration for the Army as was the "embalmed beef" of Chicago, upon which we fed our soldiers during the Spanish War.

I am not disposed to give much weight to the contention that the rivers are not being utilized, and that the tonnage carried diminishes in proportion to the improvements made. Under normal conditions that would constitute such an inconsistency upon its face as to need no answer. If the rivers have been carrying freight before being improved, and then cease to carry it after they have been rendered in better condition for that purpose, then there must, of necessity, be some outside cause to produce such unreasonable and absurd results.

In this connection permit me to suggest that the bitter opposition that is being waged against river and harbor bills in Congress is largely responsible for such conditions, and in many instances deprives the people of a great blessing they have in part paid for. When funds have been expended on a river, but before it is finished so as to facilitate the movement of freights, a great opposition springs up in Congress, and the necessary appropriations to complete the improvements are defeated in whole or in part, then the charge is made that there has been no increase in tonnage, even before the stream is rendered in condition for boats to navigate it.

People will not put their money into boats for that purpose until they have reasonable assurance that the necessary improvements will be completed, and as long as the present fight is made against the completion of the improvements that have been commenced who could be expected to invest hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars in transportation facilities upon streams that may never, on account of such opposition, be rendered in a navigable condition?

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] has suggested another matter that might be considered in this connection. I refer to the opposition to river improvements by the railroads when they are to be rendered competitors by reason of such improvements. They have in many instances reduced rates so low that the boats can not compete, and after forcing them out of business the same old high rates have been restored. In other cases the railroads have purchased the boat lines and then ceased to operate them in competition with their own lines. Of course the river tonnage would then be diminished, and this result would be cited as an argument against river improvement.

In reply to the charge that the projects embraced in this bill are not necessary for the prosecution of the war, I desire to call attention to the fact that the one item which above all others is peculiarly a war measure, encountered the most bitter opposition from the gentlemen making this charge. The canal to connect Delaware and Chesapeake Bays is of the most vital interest to the Navy Department, and yet all the furies of the opposition were centered upon it in a determined effort to have it stricken from the bill. The inconsistency of those making this contention needs no further answer.

The War-Revenue Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. ROBERT CROSSER,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, May 22, 1917.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, justice should be the constant aim of all government. In peace or war, midst plenty or want the benefits and burdens of government should be measured to all with a just hand.

The Government must have money. War is costly business. But there is a right and a wrong way, a just and an unjust plan of taking from the people by taxation a large sum of money as in collecting a smaller amount. The Ways and Means Committee has tried to prepare a bill that would be fair to the people, but because of the principle adopted it has not succeeded.

Much has been said about forcing the rich to pay the cost of the war, but the bill before the House will not do this. The taxes proposed in this bill will increase the cost of food, telephone service, railroad tickets, drugs, patent medicines, toilet articles, and so forth, and put a tariff tax on all goods which for many years have come into this country free.

All this is wrong. Instead of forcing the rich to pay most of the cost of war it burdens the consumers, the people who must use electricity, tea, coffee, drugs, patent medicines, and so forth. It is true that the bill taxes incomes, but certainly not enough. This nonsense in taxing the consumer is an old thing in this country. According to an old saying, "It is the way to get the most feathers with the least squawking." This Government in the past has gotten most of its money by taxing the things consumed by the people instead of taxing men according to the privilege they enjoy. A tax on the cost of things consumed, on food, clothing, shoes, and so forth, is a tax which must be paid chiefly by those who have little.

Two per cent of the people of the United States to-day own about two-thirds of all the wealth, and yet the other 98 per cent, or 100,000,000 people, who own only one-third of the wealth, need as much food, clothing, and other necessaries of life as the few who own two-thirds of the wealth. Those who must work hard for the little they get are thus taxed indirectly and pay the greater part of the expenses of the Government. These same people are the ones who must do the fighting on the battle fields.

But we are told that the wages of labor have been increased and the laborer can bear these taxes. Is this true? Statistics show that from the year 1900 to the outbreak of the war in 1914, the average increase of wages was 27 per cent, but statistics show also that during the same time there was an average increase of 40 per cent in the cost of necessaries, such as food, clothing, rent, household utensils, and so forth. During the last two years, however, according to the New York Times Annalist, the cost of these things increased 74 per cent. This figure is very low, for the Old Dutch Market, of Washington, gives the cash sale price of 60 articles of food in April, 1914, and in April, 1917, showing an average increase of 92 per cent, or almost double the price of three years ago. On the other hand, the Bureau of Labor Statistics shows that between January 1, 1912, and January 1, 1917, the average increase of the wages of union labor was 9 per cent. What then becomes of the claim that wages have been advanced. The value of wages depends upon what they will buy. The wage earner must now pay almost $2 for what he could buy three years ago for $1, and yet there has been added to his wages only 10 cents for every dollar he received three years ago. When we consider these facts, the wonder is that the man who works for a living can exist at all. Yet, in spite of all this, the workingman is told to "look pleasant."

Surely, Mr. Chairman, in view of such conditions the wage earners of the country should not be more heavily burdened.

The bill before the House taxes incomes more heavily than any bill we have yet considered, but it also taxes the necessaries of life more than we have taxed them for many years. Taxes should be placed according to the privileges men enjoy and not according to the amount of food, clothing, and other things men must have for their families. We should encourage men to progress, to increase production, and to purchase in abundance the things necessary for decent living.

Most of the taxes proposed by this bill and by every tax law in the country tend to retard progress and production. Taxes placed upon food, clothing, houses, improvements, and other necessaries increase their price; higher prices mean fewer sales and the fewer the sales of anything the less labor is required to produce it.

Governments should not demand taxes from the people as a punishment, but rather as payment for the privilege they enjoy at the hands of the Government, or, in other words, at the hands of all the people.

The bill H. R. 4024, which I have introduced and which is before the Ways and Means Committee, provides for raising $2,000,000,000 according to the privilege which the people grants to each person. The $2,000,000,000 is to be apportioned among the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia in proportion to the population, and is to be raised by a direct tax on the value of land without regard to improvements.

The purpose is to get the money required by the Government by taxing land values only. I know that many sincere people object to such a plan of raising revenue, but I shall try to show that their objections are due to misapprehension.

The prevailing idea about taxation is that the more men produce the more should be taken from them by the Government. This is injustice of the worst kind, because it means that if one man works longer and harder on his farm or at some other kind of business and therefore produces more than the man who does not work as hard or as long, the Government taxes him more because of his greater effort.

The slogan of people who believe in this kind of taxation is, "Take from the fellow who has." Those who say this fail to realize that in so doing we generally take the product of men's toil. That is not their object, but seeing somewhat vaguely that great fortunes have been gotten unjustly and without labor, and desiring to take as much of their wealth as possible for the expense of government, they propose to put the taxes on goods, buildings, and so forth, without stopping to think that such a tax would be added to the price of goods or to the rent of the tenant, whereas if we should collect all our taxes from the rental value of land the tax could not be shifted to the tenant. If the land were vacant, the owner would be compelled to use it or let others use it in order to pay the taxes. If the money necessary to pay the expenses of government were procured by a tax on land values, without regard to improvements on the land, the result would be to encourage the farmer more and more, and likewise to encourage every other kind of producer to increase his output, because once having paid the taxes on the land was necessary for his business, anything he might earn above that would be his own.

One of the objections often made to a tax on land values only is that the man who has his money invested in stocks escapes taxation, but we must remember that every business requires the use of land in some form or other; and if a corporation should pay the taxes on the value of land held by it, a stockholder would in that way pay his proportion. If the ore land, the oil and the coal lands, and so forth, which are owned by the corporations throughout the United States were taxed at their real value, the Government would derive from them a great deal more revenue than it gets by the present system of taxation.

Another objection sometimes raised is that we could not determine the value of land separately from the improvements upon it. This is a great mistake. Land in any locality has its generally known market value. In the big cities of the country each foot of land fronting on any street has a very definite value, just as has each acre in the country districts. The fact is, however, that in many States of the Union the value of the land and the improvements are now assessed separately. But even if it were not possible to determine accurately the value of houses and other improvements for the purpose of relieving them from taxation, would that be any reason whatever for continuing the injustice of taxing them at the present assessed value?

The beneficiaries of any injustice or special privilege always find some bugaboo with which to frighten a class of people numerous enough, if misled, to defeat any legislation aimed at the destruction of such special privilege or injustice.

Those who by monopolizing the bounties of nature have been able to rob the producer, always have such a bugaboo on exhibition. They have pretended a deep sympathy for the farmer; they know, of course, that if the farmers can be deceived by the land speculators and monopolists, they can defeat any measures proposed to destroy their monopoly.

Now, the truth is that instead of injuring, a tax on land values only would greatly benefit the farmer, because it would take the tax off his buildings, his machinery, his stock, his fences, and so forth. As a result, the men who get hold of vacant land, and hold it idle while waiting until the surrounding farmers improve the community by their toil, and so enable him to sell his land at a higher figure, would be compelled to pay the same tax per acre as his neighbor who builds a house, barns, and so forth, and improves his farm generally. Those in the towns and cities who buy for a trifle outlying land, or hold land vacant in the midst of the city or town, awaiting the advance in price before selling, would pay a great deal more in taxes because they would be required to pay the same as those having land of equal value who had improved it.

This is not theory only, for actual investigation has proven this to be the case. Not long ago a careful calculation was made in Oregon to show what proportion of taxes would have been paid by farmers and what by other classes if a tax on land values only had been in force in 1900. It was shown that invariably the farmer's tax bill would have been less. In Multnomah County, where the city of Portland is located, the total assessed valuation of all kinds of property amounted to $247,267,520. The assessed valuation of farm land was $6,957,626. The assessed value of farm buildings, stock, and improvements was $3,943,197. The total amount of taxes paid to the county was $4,394,537, of which the farmers paid $193,573. If land values only had been taxed in the county, in order to raise the total amount the farmers would have been taxed but $172,585; or, in other words, $21,000 less than they did pay under the present system. Lands held for speculation and franchise corporations would have paid more. A like calculation for the whole State of Oregon showed that farmers would have saved nearly $1,800,000 on their tax bill, and the speculators and monopolists would have paid much more.

In every case the farmer who works his land, who really uses it, would pay less taxes, while the land monopolists who, waiting for a higher price, hold idle high-priced land in cities or idle acres in the country would be compelled to pay more taxes.

Every kind of tax put on buildings, machinery, equipment, and chattels is shifted by the one paying the tax to the user or purchaser of such things, because in order to make a profit it must be included in the cost of construction or production by everyone building or producing similar structures or goods. The farmer, mechanic, or other user or buyer must therefore pay these taxes as well as the taxes levied directly upon him.

A tax on land values can not be transferred to the tenant, and by him to the person who buys his goods or services, because if it were attempted the user of the land would seek unmonopolized land at the natural rate of rent, and so force his landlord to continue to rent at the natural rate of rent of his land.

A tax on land values can be collected more easily, more cheaply, and with absolute certainty. Instead of having a horde of tax assessors, inquisitors, and collectors searching, investigating, and cross-examining the people as to their ownership of furniture, jewelry, money, etc., and failing to discover most of such things, the proper official would simply charge the tax against the value of the land appearing in the names of the owners. This would save governments much expense for tax collecting and would remove the temptation to perjury in order to avoid paying taxes.

While, however, the taxation of land values only is the correct system of taxation, the real advantage, the grandest result of its operation would be to establish justice in the distribution of wealth.

Because they can do so at practically no cost, the few are now able to hold great and valuable tracts of land out of use, not only in the industrial and city districts, but also in the rural sections, while awaiting its increase in value as a result of the growing demand for the use of such land on account of the increase of population near it. The tax upon idle land at present is so small that it is possible for the owners to hold it without improving or using it.

It is these monopolists of land, these dogs in the manger, who will neither properly use nor let others use the land without paying extortionate prices or extortionate rent; it is this kind of special privilege which causes unemployment, low wages, and small returns to all kinds of producers.

In city or farm sections, in every kind of community, the land speculator watches the growing population increasing the demand for land. As the city grows, he reaches out to the nearest farm land and options or buys it. By drawing imaginary lines, he divides it into small lots, and waits until the people compelled to have it pay him far more than its real value.

As far out from the city as time and the means of travel make it possible for the people to live while working in the city, the speculator continues to monopolize the land and practice his extortion upon those who must have a place to live or do business. So determined is the land speculator to have his price that he holds plots of ground here and there long after buildings have been put up and improvements made all around them. The result of all this is congestion of population, in-sanitary conditions, cheaper houses, and all the evils that are caused by poverty born of injustice. As population grows, so grows the demand for places in which to live and places of business. Rents go higher and accommodations become poorer. The poor are therefore compelled to crowd into smaller quarters to be able to pay their rent. If they attempt to escape to the vacant land at the outskirts of the city to build a modest home, they are stopped by the speculator with his land-monopoly bludgeon. Hence we have what, by the ballroom reformers, by those whose egotism deceives them into believing themselves to be intellectuals, these pink-tea heroes call the slums.

In every city of the country land suitable for factories, mills, and business places is held out of use in the same way. Men anxious to engage in manufacturing or commerce can not do so unless they are willing to pay the land monopolist an extortionate sum for the ground upon which to build their plant. Then they are, of course, compelled to sell their product at a price high enough to pay the interest charge on the price paid for the land.

While the evils of land monopoly are far greater in the cities because of the greater population and improvements, neverthless the rural communities suffer very much also from the same trouble. The real estate speculators, who call themselves specialists in farm lands, are sure to be on the ground. As the increased demand for farm products causes a greater demand for farm lands, the speculator grabs the vacant farm land and with his weapon, monopoly, extorts for it much more than its actual value from those who want to do real farming. Generally he gets a considerable cash payment and takes a mortgage for the greater part of the purchase price, thus continuing to be practically the owner and receiving tribute from the hard-working farmer, or he may sell the mortgage to a bank or some other person, who therefore becomes the real owner and collects the tribute.

We make land monopoly easy; we enable men to hold great areas of vacant land in city and country because we tax it so little that it is not unprofitable to keep it idle. We have relieved the holder of idle land of paying a reasonable tax on such land by adopting the silly plan of taxing the man who works. the man who builds on his land or otherwise improves it. We tax him upon every piece of machinery he buys, upon his horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, furniture, house, barns, sheds, fences, the tile in his field drains, and so forth; we have taxed all these things and thus relieve the speculator, the man who holds land idle. from paying his share of the taxes which have been unjustly heaped upon the machinery, equipment, buildings, and improvements of industrious farmer or city man. These men are fined through taxation, while the speculator, the land monopolist, is freed from the taxes which the industrious and enterprising must pay. By freeing the idle land of the speculator from the taxes which we put on products of industry and enterprise, we encourage and make it easy for the speculator to hold land out of use until people are compelled to have it and pay him his extortionate price.

And while it is this kind of thing that enables the land monopolist to take all but a bare living from the total product or earnings of the man who wants to erect in a town or city a factory, a mill, a store, or who wants to engage in farming, it is also the cause of the congested population in the cities, with the increase in disease and crime and the cause of the sparse population in the farming districts, with its lack of social intercourse and community conveniences.

How unnecessary, how wrong is this.

There are to-day 400,346,575 acres of idle farm land in this country, yet good farm land, within reasonable distance of the markets, has become so high-priced that few young couples can start in life with a home of their own. Farm tenantry is increasing enormously, and the old sturdy class of independent farmers is rapidly disappearing. More than three-quarters of the improved farm lands of Texas, for example, is either rented or encumbered. At the same time about 117,000,000 acres in Texas are held out of use on speculation. In Illinois from 40 to 50 per cent of the farmers have already become tenants. If the taxes now put upon the products of labor, including buildings, machinery, equipment, and the things which are necessary to life, were put upon the idle land it would not be long before the land monopolist would be compelled to make use of the land or else let some one else use it. In either case those willing to work would have a fair opportunity, and this would abolish the intense competition for jobs that exists in ordinary times. This would mean higher wages and the increase in production or supply would mean lower prices. The speculator in land would cease to get from labor and honest business the fat income which he has always had because he controlled the land and natural resources from which by the application of labor and capital all wealth is produced.

How long will the American people tolerate land monopoly with all the misery which follows in its trail?

How long will they be satisfied with dramatic demands for the lowering of the price of this article or that, or with the glorifying of this or that man as the ideal person to stand with rod in hand to order the terms of sale of everything supplied from the reservoir of nature?

When will men stop prattling about great victories for the people which are in fact nothing more than changes from one kind of special privilege to another? When will they boldly urge the equal and common right of all men to nature's reservoir?

Let us open the door of opportunity to all by making it unprofitable to withhold the earth from use. Unto the weary and heavy laden who must beg a brother of the earth for leave to toil, for a chance to earn their daily bread, let us say: "Be of good cheer; the power which has robbed you of your heritage shall be destroyed; the land grabber shall be forced to pay the public the yearly value of the use of the land." By this means land and the natural resources would be forced into use and thus would be furnished unlimited opportunity for remunerative employment. With such opportunity always open, want and the fear of want would vanish. Reasonable effort would provide a proper livelihood. Involuntary poverty would no longer exist. The charity which causes men to palliate the cause of injustice would go out of fashion. Instead of the long, dreary hours of drudgery now necessary to get a miserable existence men would have reasonable working hours and have leisure time for intellectual improvement and recreation. In a word, men would have an opportunity for the comfort, peace of mind, and development which it was intended the human race should have.

Such would be the result of taxing land values only, a tax which would benefit instead of burden the people.

The Chattahoochee River.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM C. ADAMSON,
OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, July 3, 1917.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include some articles from my home newspapers. One of the chief subjects is the improvement of the Chattahoochee River by private capital, and there is a little article or two about complying with the law and enforcing the law.

The articles are as follows:

[From the Atlanta Journal.]

OUR WEALTH IN WATER POWER, ESPECIALLY THE CHATTAHOOCHEE.

Of the 60,700,000 water horsepower in the United States, only 5,300,000, or less than 9 per cent, is being utilized. When that vast remainder, a large part of which is in the South, is developed the country will be incomparably richer, and many industrial and even social problems which now perplex will be solved. It will be many, many decades, of course, before these latent resources are brought fully into use, and a long time before even a half of their potential force is actually needed. But the present rate of development is slower than it should be—slower, that is to say, for the country as a whole. In some regions the development of water-power sites, which is always a more or less precarious venture, has been carried as far, or even further, than practical conditions justified. Such instances, however, are merely illustrative of those blunders of judgment which the shrewdest business minds sometimes make. There are scores, perhaps hundreds, of sites which could be developed to the country's advantage, and which will be developed when legislation on such matters is made more consistent with the interests and risks of investors.

Commenting on the broad benefits that will follow a liberal and constructive policy in this regard, the New York Commercial says:

'Proper development of our idle water powers could supply our farmers with nitrates and make this country independent of Chile, whose deposits of nitrate of soda are not inexhaustible, though they will last through our generation. Cheap fertilizers mean more and cheaper food. Another angle of the food problem is that by the development of water power in arid and semiarid parts of this country large areas of land can be irrigated cheaply because the cost of constructing the works can be divided between the farmers and the manufacturers who use the power. The water that runs through a turbine can not only provide electricity for the surrounding country, but also can irrigate the land, and part of the power can be used by railroads and trolley lines to give such sections proper transportation."

Georgia is uncommonly rich in water-power resources, and here, as in the country at large, development has barely begun. Consider, for example, the immense possibilities afforded by the Chattahoochee River both for industrial power and for navigation. Competent engineers estimate, on a basis of Government surveys, that this river above Columbus is capable of producing 250,000 horsepower. That would be enough to provide industrial employement for one and a quarter million people. It is computed that one of the dams which engineers have recommended for construction in Heard County would afford enough power to manufacture all the nitrate needed for the fertilizer supply of Georgia and Alabama combined.

The Chattahoochee is eminently worth developing for transportation as well as for water power. According to the latest Government reports, the towns and cities that would be directly concerned in such development have an aggregate freight tonnage of approximately 12,500,000, of which more than 3,000,000 would move by water if the river were navigable; and that volume of traffic would be greatly augmented, of course, by the new industrial enterprises which the cheap and easily available water power would bring forth. In the year 1916 the cotton output of the counties bordering the river was considerably in excess of half of a million bales. The Government investigators emphasize the additional fact that a number of the towns adjacent to the Chattahoochee are cotton textile centers and that a number are supply points for large areas. Whitesburg, Newnan, Franklin, La Grange, West Point, Columbus, Eufaula, Fort Gaines, Columbus, River Junction, and numerous others would profit directly from the river's being made navigable and all would contribute an ever-increasing volume to its commerce. Atlanta's interests in the matter are peculiarly vital. For this community the development of the Chattahoochee would open a water route to the Gulf and a vast new empire of commercial opportunity.

Fortunately, the building of the locks and dams and other construction work needful to develop water power would come so near completing the channel that comparatively little would remain to be done to make the Chattahoochee navigable between Columbus and Atlanta. The enterprise thus commends itself on the score of economy as well as engineering feasibility and industrial and commercial opportunity.

The State-wide anticonscription meetings planned for Saturday and bearing all the earmarks of having emanated from Hickory Hill created hardly a ripple upon the placid surface of Georgia's patriotism.

BREEDING TROUBLE FOOLISHLY.

Somebody is busily engaged in "breeding trouble" throughout this section, and the worst feature of it they are likely to get young men in trouble.

It is a fearful thing to misuse ones influence, whether it be the editor of a paper or whether it be but a plain, "everyday" citizen. There is a certain paper with a general circulation throughout this section of the State whose editor, wonderfully gifted though he be, is a born agitator and whose highest aim seems to be to satiate his greed for power, popularity, and pelf and whose dictum is greedily swallowed by thousands of men. A misuse and abuse of such gifts and such power is a fearful thing.

We have been informed that a propaganda of nullification of the selective conscript law is most assiduously being developed by nightly meetings and organized efforts where speeches are made and pledged, and that these agitators are viciously attacking the President, crediting him with responsibility for this war.

The worst feature of this agitation is that whether the selective conscript law was best or not is no longer a debatable question; it is the law of the land and must and will be enforced; indeed, there is no choice; to falter now would be ignominious and would bring on our heads contumely and to our forces defeat and disaster.

The war is a most horrible disaster, but it is on us and must be met. To hesitate is to be damned.

Suppose the conscript law could and should be repealed, what would take its place? The propaganda that has been used to bring it into disrepute would—indeed has already made it impossible to secure an army by the volunteer system.

For weeks and months the administration has been on its knees begging for sufficient volunteers to man the vessels and raise the Army to the insignificent maximum of 300,000 men, and yet it is 70,000 shy of that number, while the enemy has a mobilized force of 6,000,000 fully armed, trained, and equipped men already in the field, and we are daily reminded that they look in contempt on us and our efforts.

There is no recourse for us but to fight. The unfortunate part is we have waited so long that the resources of those who stand between us and our implacable foe are well nigh exhausted.

What sort of spectacle do we present to the world, hesitating and bickering among ourselves as to details, insignificant in themselves, while our enemy is marshaling all of his resources to crush us as he did Belgium, Serbia, Roumania, and is now crushing and devastating France?

What have these agitators to offer when they nullify the conscript law? In destroying that, they have destroyed the possibilities of the volunteer system, for it seems impossible now to enlist the pitiful number of 300,000 men, a mere handful, but a corporal's guard, as compared with Germany's 6,000,000.

Yes; the agitators are breeding trouble not only on their own heads but most unfortunately on the heads of innocent young men who have the right to look to these older men for guidance.

Such propaganda will force the administration to take hold of the situation with a mailed hand, and when it does, woe to the men responsible for the trouble.

Patriotism, love of home and country, should make us come to the rescue of our country, and it is a thousandfold better for us to fight Germany beyond the Atlantic than to wait for her forces to come here.

Ask Belgium, ask Serbia and Roumania what a German invasion means, where men have been enslaved, women outraged, and children starved and murdered.

Instead of opposing laws passed by our lawmakers, men we have delegated this authority to and men who are in a position to be and who necessarily are better informed than we are, let us all encourage the young men to do their duty and to respond to the demands made upon them.

If the administration is to be criticized, it is for delaying action so long. War should have been declared at least two years earlier than it was.

Already Germany expresses only contempt for us and holds us in derision. The world will be justified in expressing the same feelings if we do not desist from such folly as marks the opposition to our leaders.

Sooner or later we must whip Germany or else she will whip us. The longer we defer the job the harder it will be of performance.

In closing, just a word to the men engaged in this agitation: Stop, and stop at once, else the law will be speedily invoked and severe will be the punishment inflicted.

No good can come of such agitation. Congress can not be coerced into repealing the law. It would be the laughingstock of the world were it to even discuss such a thing.

Nor can the President be bulldozed and browbeaten into the nonenforcement of the law. Opposition now can only breed trouble, while a vigorous policy of aid to the allies and opposition to Germany is all that is left to us. Any other course will bring disaster and ruin to us.

GEORGE W. HARPER'S WEEKLY LETTER—HUNTING ELEPHANTS.

It's great sport, but in some cases the "native helpers," with long sharp knives, hide, and when the elephant "charges" they leap out behind him and "hamstring" the great animal; then brave (?) men like Teddy and myself shoot the disabled brute.

Hamstringing anything is cruel, unfair, cowardly, and if it is our Government we hamstring, it has all the elements of treason.

In monarchies many things are treasonable that are not in our Government. We confine it to the "actual levying of war against the United States, or an adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

Every word we utter against our Government gives the Kaiser "aid and comfort," and when we do it we "hamstring" Uncle Sam.

Are there men in Carroll giving the Kaiser "aid and comfort"? There are. Are there men in Carroll who are hamstringing Uncle Sam? There are. Are they doing these things knowingly, with malice aforethought? No. Why do they do it? For pure cussed ignorance. I say "cussed" because there is no excuse for one to be so "cussed" ignorant as not to know what will give "aid and comfort" to the enemy.

When one of Uncle Sam's boys reads that there was a riot in Germany at a certain time it gives him "comfort."

If a few of the folks of Carroll meet and chip in with their dollars to have the selective conscription law annulled, and the Kaiser reads it, it gives him "comfort," if not "aid and comfort." To give "aid and comfort" to the enemy is treason. The extreme penalty for treason is death, and to hamstring the method of raising an army to preserve the continuity of this great and glorious United States of ours is giving both "aid and comfort" to the arch enemy of the freedom of the world. And the one that does it is technically a traitor, yet not a man who is doing these things thinks he is.

Millions of men all over the United States are ready to die to preserve the liberty you have enjoyed since your unfortunate advent into the glorious sunshine that is over us all, and you, gathering at different places and with a sharp tongue, hamstringing the only means that is possible to save your homes and mine from the despoiler.

You say by your acts that you approve the rape of Belgium, the stripping of the women of Roumania to a nude condition, and marching them up and down the streets, the flying over defenseless countries and dropping bombs and killing women and children, the drowning of hundreds of our own women and children, the blowing up of our factories, the blowing up of our bridges, the plotting against us in thousands of ways. Your acts approve these acts, but you don't see it, and the trouble is you will never see anything only through another's eyes.

Your great prophet and god "plants his footsteps" on Jefferson, but he will never print what Jefferson wrote to Madison after the disgraceful defeat at Bladensburg.

You won't read it from me, but I'll quote it and ram it down your goozle anyway. Here it is:

"It proves more forcibly the necessity of obliging every citizen to be a soldier. This was the case with the Greeks and Romans and must be that of every free State.

"Where there is no oppression there will be no pauper hirelings. We must train and classify the whole of our male citizens and make military instruction a regular part of collegiate education. We can never be safe until this is done."

Here's your "Jeffersonian democracy" that you think is oozing from every pore. How does it compare with what you are trying vainly to do and with the teachings of the little fellow by whom you are being taught?

Be a man. How does your god and the god he claims his inspiration comes from compare?

I'm trying to jar you and save you from trouble. There is one of two things, you are a fool or I am. One or the other of us is at least fooled.

If you will read you will find that Washington, after his bitter experience in the Revolutionary War, was "convinced that only by universal service can democracy save itself."

President Wilson, Taft, Teddy, Root, Hoke, Harper, and millions of other great men and women are on the same line as Jefferson; that is, "We must train and classify the whole of our male citizens." Why? Because what has happened in the last three years "proves more forcibly the necessity of obliging every citizen to be a soldier," as Jefferson says.

You and your oracle is as far as heaven is from hades from being "Jefferson Democrats." You are hamstringers. You don't want to help defend your homes and are trying to prevent Uncle Sam from doing so.

You have lived your worthless lives under the protecting arm of your country, and now when your country calls for your help you hamstring it!

Your effort will not prevail.

Those deluded women who kept out pickets and unpatriotic banners around the White House were annoying and hamstringing the President, and while men and women were patient, for months the nuisance went on, but patience ceased to be a virtue, and the pickets and banners were not. Hamstringers ought to take warning.

I'm not trying to argue the question with you. It's settled. The game is on, and woe to him who continues to persevere in hamstringing his Government, especially in war times.

Before I close let me call your attention to assertions you make:

You say that "if an enemy was to land on our shores you would fight." You are another. Were they to come to New York you would say, "let them come to Atlanta and I'll lick 'em"; then if they got to Atlanta you would say, "If they come to Carroll I'll knock the fire out of them"; then were you to hear they were on their way to Carroll not one of you but would be in a cave on Turkey Mountain in Alabama quicker than a gopher can get into his hole. I know you and know you to be nearly as cowardly as I am. You are a great big blubber and only speak the things you read in your weekly. Now, go on and continue to be led and educated in the hamstringing business till the patriots all over this glorious land say "enough." Don't flatter yourself that such a time is not coming. Those who are going to defend your folks, their folks, and my folks won't put up with hamstringing but a short time.

If you are going to continue to hamstring our President, our Army, and everything American, get out and join the Kaiser while getting out is good. Those not willing to do their bit and as much more as they can are hamstringers. The armies of Uncle Sam and the Kaiser are in shooting distance and if ours is not hamstrung will reach heights that will give them great advantage, yet a few stop the march to have constitutionality as to the method that brought our soldiers into line tested in the courts.

The right of petition for the redress of grievances is law, but would a sane patriotic man invoke that right when it would enable the enemy to gain the heights?

Shucks! It's no use to talk to hamstringers.

"The Conscription Law Both Just and Constitutional."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL VINSON,
OF GEORGIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tuesday, July 3, 1917.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an article by William H. Fleming, on the subject of "The conscription law both just and constitutional."

The article is as follows:

THE CONSCRIPTION LAW BOTH JUST AND CONSTITUTIONAL.

[By William H. Fleming.]

What is the measure of duty the citizen owes to his country? Has he a right to refuse military service? What is the limitation on a nation's powers for self-defense? Must it rely only on volunteers?

DUTY OF SERVICE.

No writer on general public law has ever questioned the power of a nation to exact nor the duty of a citizen to render full service.

Indeed, under the principles of general law, a State has as much right to exact service as it has to exact money. It is just as logical to claim that war must be carried on by volunteer taxpayers as by volunteer soldiers.

Benjamin H. Hill, with his usual clearness of vision and felicity of expression, said:

"The obligation is on every man equally with his neighbor to render military service.

"A citizen is under as much obligation to defend a republic as a subject a crown, and the greater since the republic is formed by his consent."

Such being the unquestioned power of a sovereign state as recognized by all authorities, it becomes necessary only for us to inquire whether our own Constitution of the United States forbids or fails to confer that power of enforced draft or conscription.

The language of that Constitution on this point is:

"Congress shall have power * * * to raise and support armies," etc.

FIRST CONSCRIPTION BILL.

The earliest movement for action under this power was during Madison's administration, in 1814, when James Monroe, Acting Secretary of War, recommended an enforced draft or conscription law, and the bill passed the Senate by a vote of 19 to 13.

The House still had this or a similar measure under consideration when word came that the treaty of peace had been signed at Ghent, and hence conscription was no longer necessary.

The chairman of the Military Committee of the House, which reported favorably on the conscription measure, was no other than George M. Troup, of Georgia, a profound statesman and consistent advocate of State's rights.

In his report he says: "But is there no mode for filling the ranks [of the Army] but voluntary enlistment? I have always thought this Government, when administered in the spirit of the Constitution, the strongest Government in the world, even for the purpose of war; but if the doctrine set up of late be true, this is the weakest and most contemptible Government on earth; it is neither fit for war nor peace; it has failed of all the ends for which governments are established."

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Thomas Jefferson, the great Democrat and defender of the rights of the individual citizen, wrote to W. H. Crawford, of Georgia, under date of February —, 1815, as follows:

"Nothing wiser can be devised than what the Secretary of War [Monroe] proposed in this report at the commencement of Congress. It would have kept our Regular Army always of necessity full and by classing our militia according to military ages would have put them into a form ready for whatever service, distant or at home, should require them."

Mr. Jefferson had previously declared himself in favor of universal military training, embracing necessarily enforced service.

Witness the following from a letter to James Monroe dated June —, 1813:

"But it proves more forcibly the necessity of obliging every citizen to be a soldier; that was the case with the Greeks and Romans, and must be that of every free state. Where there is no oppression there can be no pauper hirelings."

Again, in a letter to Thomas Cooper in 1814, he said (referring to the Greeks and Romans):

"Their system was to make every man a soldier and oblige him to repair to the standard of his country whenever that was reared. This made them invincible, and the same remedy will make us so."

WEBSTER ASHAMED OF HIS SPEECH.

It is true, on the other hand, that an association calling itself the American Union Against Militarism has recently printed and spread broadcast over the country a speech made by Daniel Webster against this conscription measure in 1814, in which he declared conscription was unconstitutional.

It is doubtful if Mr. Webster, supposing him to be now cognizant of mundane affairs, will thank these petty patriots for unearthing that speech, of which he is said to have been so ashamed that he did not have it printed in the official record, and which his own son omitted from the publication of his distinguished father's works, and which Daniel Webster himself omitted from the volumes he had published.

As an offset to Mr. Webster's fine oratory and poor logic on that subject, it is stated that Langdon Cheves, Speaker of the House, and John C. Calhoun, then the rising leader of his party, were both open in their support of this conscription measure.

UNITED STATES CONSCRIPTION ACT HELD VALID.

In 1863 the Federal Congress passed a conscription act.

The only case involving directly the validity of that act was one that went to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, where, on rehearing, the law was declared valid. (See 45 Pa. Stat., 238.)

While the Supreme Court of the United States has had no opportunity to pass directly upon the validity of that conscription act, there can be no doubt as to what its decision would be judging from the following plain language in One hundred and thirty seventh United States, page 153:

"The Government has the right to the military service of all its able-bodied citizens; and may, when emergency arises, justly exact that service from all."

To same effect see Tarble's case, 80 U. S., 408.

CONFEDERATE STATES CONSCRIPTION ACT HELD VALID BY SUPREME COURT OF GEORGIA.

But why should Georgians waste their time now in thrashing over old straw, when our leading lawyers and our Supreme Court long ago settled these legal issues.

The Confederate Congress, in 1862, passed a conscription act whose validity was challenged in Georgia. (See 33 Ga., 347.)

In a masterly decision written by Judge (afterwards governor) Charles J. Jenkins, and concurred in by his associates, Chief Justice Joseph Henry Lumpkin and Judge Richard F. Lyon, the law was upheld.

In a later case (see 34 Ga., 28) the court, after going over the whole ground anew, reaffirmed its former decision.

It is a matter of no small satisfaction to know that the lawyers who appeared before our Supreme Court in the last-mentioned case, in support of the law, were Joel Branham, Robert Toombs, and Linton Stephens.

Decisions to the like effect were rendered by the Supreme Courts of Texas and Alabama and Virginia. (See 26 Tex., 386; 38 Ala., 429; and 16 Gratt (Va.), 470.)

To clinch this argument it is only necessary to add that the language of the Confederate States constitution on the subject of raising and supporting armies is taken verbatim from the Constitution of the United States.

No man in Georgia perhaps ever had greater power of presenting the truth with clearness and beauty than Benjamin H. Hill, and an intellectual treat is in store for any who will read his great speech on the conscription act delivered before the General Assembly of Georgia on December 11, 1862. (See "Life of Benjamin H. Hill," p. 251.)

MEANING OF GERMAN SUCCESS.

Let our people be assured that the conscription law is not in violation of our Constitution. Nor is it a badge of disgrace, but rather a basis of equality.

No war ever waged in recorded history had more of good or ill to mankind dependent on its outcome than has our present war upon Prussian militarism.

After centuries of laborious toil there had been evolved a system of international ethics or morals, which mitigated the horrors of war and gave some hope of eventual world peace. The German spirit of military tyranny has rejected all ethical standards, renounced all moral obligations, and made solemn treaties mere "scraps of paper."

German success will mean the enthronement of might over right. German defeat will mean the revindication of what we have hoped and believed was the great fundamental truth of Christian civilization, namely, that the moral law is the law of progress in human society.

Let us cease from carping criticism, and unite as one man with "heart and nerve and sinew" in support of the Government, the President and the flag.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
OF OHIO,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Friday, July 6, 1917.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, throughout the entire debate upon the food-control bill that passed the House the other day, one effect of which was to prohibit during the war period the manufacture of malted liquors, there was one phase of the question that was entirely overlooked. I mean the question as to the possible effect upon the supply and price of bread if all the breweries of the country were closed down. I think no one who supported the Lever bill—and there were only five who voted against it—either desired or expected that any provision of the bill would result in increasing the price of bread in this country; and yet, gentlemen, we have done just that thing.

This matter was not brought to my attention until after the House had acted, but a careful study of the question, supplemented by conversations and correspondence with experts, has convinced me, as I believe it will convince anyone who takes the trouble to investigate it, that the prohibition of beer manufacture would immediately result in a shortage of not less than 40 per cent in the supply of yeast in this country, and as a consequence would inevitably cause a corresponding shortage in the bread supply and a great enhancement of its price.

I hold in my hand two papers of extreme interest, which I shall print in the RECORD. They throw a bright light upon this question and are expressed in terms which it does not require technical knowledge of the process of manufacturing yeast to understand.

The first is a memorandum prepared at my request by Mr. George B. Lester, who is vice president of the Fleischmann Co., which you all know is by far the largest yeast-producing concern in the United States, or, for that matter, in the world. The Fleischmann Co. produces 90 per cent of the yeast used by bakers in America and generally supplies yeast corresponding to 20 per cent of the home baking. It is estimated by Mr. Hoover and his aids that it provides yeast for more than 50 per cent of the entire population of the United States. Thus the statement of a high official of this company must be regarded as authoritative upon the yeast question and of the interdependence between its manufacture and the manufacture of malted liquors:

MEMORANDUM COVERING THE MANUFACTURE OF COMPRESSED YEAST AND ITS RELATION TO THE MALTING INDUSTRY.

There was grown in the United States, during the year 1916, 181,000,000 bushels of barley, 60,000,000 bushels of which were malted, the malted barley going principally into the production of beer, distilled spirits, and the manufacture of compressed yeast. In addition to the product malt obtained from the malting of barley, there is a by-product known as malt sprouts, which is of high commercial value in the manufacture of compressed yeast by modern processes. Malt sprouts, so called, are the sprouts obtained by the growing of the grain in the process of malting, the sprouts being separated after the malting period is over. These sprouts, as put into commerce, are dried substance and are sold for feed and for the manufacture of compressed yeast, as stated. Their essential value in the manufacture of compressed yeast by modern processes is due to the presence of a protein, known to chemists as "asparagin," which is highly nutritious in the culture and propagation of the yeast cell.

In the manufacture of compressed yeast by the modern process, which is generally described as the "aereated process," a mash is made of approximately one-third barley malt, one-third corn, and one-third malt sprouts by weight. This mash is cooked for a certain period and a corn-and-malt extract obtained by filtration, which extract is known technically as the "wort." In this extract or wort the propagation or growth of the yeast takes place, the yeast cell feeding on this extract and reproducing itself.

The principal problems of the yeast manufacturer are, first, to obtain as large a quantity of compressed yeast as possible; and, second, to obtain a yeast of high-raising strength and baking efficiency. Under our methods of yeast manufacture we obtain a yield of yeast of 32 to 35 per cent; that is to say, 35 pounds of commercial, highly efficient, compressed yeast from 100 pounds of material in approximately the proportions above stated. Such a yield can only be obtained by the use of malt sprouts as one of the principal and essential ingredients of the mash.

This company, as well as all other yeast manufacturers who operate the aerated process, are dependent upon the malting industry for their supply of malt sprouts as this part of the barley, after malting, is not usable in the brewing or distilling industries. The price of malt sprouts in normal times is approximately $20 per ton, but owing to the high price of grain of all kinds obtaining during the past year the price of malt sprouts has been advanced to about $34 or $35 a ton. This company uses 60,000,000 pounds of malt sprouts per year. If the brewing and distilling business of the country is abolished by legislative enactment the malting business of the country automatically ceases, except in an inconsiderable quantity, for it is safe to say that of the barley malted in the country over 90 per cent is used by brewers and distillers.

With the closing up of the malt houses there will be practically no malt sprouts obtainable and the present process of yeast manufacture by this company will have to be abandoned and antiquated and expensive processes, which have been in a large measure abandoned in this country, will have to be resumed. By this reference I mean that yeast can be made by what is known as the Vienna process, which is a process adaptable only in distilleries, under which process a yield of not over 12 per cent to 13 per cent of commercial yeast is obtainable, and from which process the by-product alcohol is obtained in such large quantities as to present an economic impossibility from the merchandising end, even if the law permitted the sale of this product for beverage purposes. With the distillation of potable spirits prohibited, a still further economic loss would result. In either event, assuming the by-product alcohol could be disposed of at prices far above the present prices, the yeast production would be so enormously reduced as to threaten the bread industry of the country, as the following will demonstrate.

The Fleischmann Co. manufactures and distributes nearly 90 per cent of the compressed yeast used by the bakers of the United States. The total output of yeast from our factories at the present time is over 50,000,000 pounds per year. With the closing of our two distilling units, which amount to 6,500 bushels of grain per day, in which units we are able to produce, when running at full capacity, approximately 30,000 pounds of yeast per day; our nine other factories, operating the aerated process, will be taxed to their fullest capacity running at the highest obtainable yield. Now, if our process is changed through our inability to obtain one of the essential ingredients of our yeast manufacture, namely, malt sprouts, our yeast production in our aerated-process factories will be reduced at least 40 per cent, resulting that there will not be sufficient yeast manufactured in the United States, or capable of being manufactured in the United States, to supply the baking trade of the country, or anywhere near it. Additional factories, of course, can be built, but under present conditions building operations are subject to almost prohibitive delays, and as all the machinery used in our yeast manufacturing process has to be specially constructed, it would be 10 months to a year and a half before new units could be built and put in operation, and even when constructed the economic loss in running a low yield, with no market for the alcoholic by-product, would make such a plan prohibitive.

In addition to the actual shortage of yeast which would immediately ensue by discontinuing the malt business, the economic loss resulting from running a low yield under present processes would be prohibitive. The prohibition of beer brewing, resulting as it would in the closing up of the malt houses, would have the further resultant effect of entirely discouraging the growing of barley, for the farmer, although he needs a large portion of the barley grown, knows that he has a ready market through the malt houses for his choice barley for the making of malt. As soon as this market is taken away the farmer will cease to grow barley in any considerable quantity, in which case there will be no barley malt for the manufacture of compressed yeast in the country. While this contingency would not affect the crop for the year 1917, it is a practical certainty that if brewing and distillation both are abolished by Congress at the present time there will be no planting of barley for the year 1918, for there would be no object for the farmer to raise it at all. In the absence of a sufficient quantity of barley suitable for malting, the compressed-yeast industry of this country would be entirely wiped out, as no compressed yeast of any nature or description can be made without barley malt.

I may add that our company requires for its annual operations the malt sprouts obtainable from the malting of approximately 40,000,000 bushels of barley. In other words, we require the malt sprouts obtained from over one-half of the malting done in the United States.

In conclusion, let me point out that the prohibiting of the brewing of beer and its consequent effect upon the yeast industry would practically defeat in itself the immediate object and purpose of the food-conservation measure, as the bread of the country is the basis from which real economy and price reduction must start.

I may also add that every manufacturer of compressed yeast in the United States who uses the aerated process in the manufacture of his product would be similarly affected through his inability to obtain malt sprouts.

I shall supplement this memorandum with a statement of Dr. Taylor, one of Mr. Hoover's principal aids. This statement reduces to writing the results of a conference participated in a few days ago by Mr. Hoover, Dr. Taylor, and Mr. Lester.

I want to call particular attention to one of the closing paragraphs of this statement, which sum up the conclusions of Mr. Hoover and Dr. Taylor, as follows:

No matter how the matter is twisted or turned, there seems to be no escape from the contention of Mr. Lester that the sudden and unadjusted application of prohibition would result in insufficiency of yeast in our cities for a considerable period of time, in some places so extreme as to make it impossible for the bakers to supply their normal trade.

STATEMENT OF MR. G. B. LESTER, OF THE FLEISCHMANN YEAST CO.

This company cultivates the yeast by a special method of modification of the aeration process that they have developed. They use about 1,800,000 bushels of malt and about 60,000,000 pounds of malt sprouts. In the ordinary act of malting about 6 per cent of the weight of the original barley is recovered as sprouts. Sprouts are employed largely on account of the content in asparagin. Using their method, with the culture medium containing malt and sprouts according to their formula, they obtain a yield of yeast of 35 per cent. If they were deprived of the use of sprouts they could employ a modified medium (using rye instead), which, however, does not give a yield of over 18 to 20 per cent. The yeast is just as good by the second process. The price of sprouts used to be $22 per ton; it is now $35 per ton. The price of malt used to be $0.60 a bushel; it is now $1.55. If distillation were cut off they could not, in their present plants, make enough yeast for their trade with the second method, yielding 18 to 20 per cent. They would have to enlarge their plants very greatly, and this could not be done within six or eight months. Dr. Taylor inquired whether distillation could not be continued just the same as at present, with the distillate sold not as alcoholic spirits (as whisky or gin) but as industrial alcohol, the recovery of yeast being the same. Mr. Lester replied that this would be attended with marked economic loss.

The Fleischmann firm sell 240,000,000 pieces of yeast every year. Each piece makes from five to six loaves of bread. To bakers they sell 50,000,000 pounds. Mr. Lester stated that our estimate that 40 per cent of our population consume bakers' bread agreed with their estimate. This firm supplies yeast corresponding to 20 per cent of the home baking. They supply 90 per cent of the yeast used by bakers. Thus, this firm prepares yeast for 52 per cent of our entire population. The remainder of home baking is accomplished by fermented dried yeast, yeast flours, and self-rising flours.

This discussion eventuated in the statement that while it would be possible to change their practice and place their business gradually on a prohibition basis, there would be considerable increase in the cost of production, due to the expense of greatly enlarged installations. If suddenly applied, prohibition would result in their almost immediate inability to supply yeast to the bakers' trade all over the country up to their demands, and in certain sections of the country it would lead to a production of yeast so low as to practically paralyze bakers in cities.

The amount of sprouts employed by this firm corresponds to the normal malting of nearly 40,000,000 bushels of barley. The firms who supply dry yeast do not employ the same method of yeast manufacture. If 40,000,000 bushels of barley were malted for the purpose of yeast manufacture alone and the remainder of malt sold for food and industrial purposes, it would represent a considerable economic loss. This, of course, could in itself be adjusted by the selling price of yeast. On the other hand, the excess malt could be employed in the manufacture of a near beer containing only 2 per cent alcohol, and greatly minimize the economic loss. But no matter how the matter is twisted or turned, there seems to be no escape from the contention of Mr. Lester's, that the sudden and unadjusted application of prohibition would result in insufficiency of yeast in our cities for a considerable period of time, in some places so extreme as to make it impossible for the bakers to supply their normal trade. Whether to what extent and within what time the other yeast manufacturers could, with their methods that do not include the use of malt sprouts, alleviate the situation can not be judged at all from this interview; certainly the task would be a large one.

To sum up briefly the facts stated in these two papers, the situation seems to be indisputably this: Malt sprouts under modern processes of yeast making are an absolute necessity, forming as they do one-third of the contents of the mash from which yeast is developed. By the use of malt sprouts a yield of yeast of 35 per cent is obtained. Under no other process is there a yield of more than 12 to 18 per cent. Malt sprouts are obtained only from the malting of barley, and barley is only malted in this country in the manufacture of beer. Thus if the manufacture of beer should be prohibited by law, the yeast makers would be forced to abandon the modern process of making yeast and go back to the old methods, which are greatly more expensive and inefficient. The necessary result would be that even if all yeast producers in this country remodeled their factories and their machinery, or should build new factories and equip them with new machinery, for at least a year there would be a shortage in the yeast supply of the country of not less than 40 per cent, and probably not for many years to come, if ever, could the present yeast supply be restored. Under such circumstances, it seems to me that Congress should pause and think most carefully before taking any step, no matter from how high motives, the result of which would be to diminish the supply of bread in this country and to enhance its price. If there is one object above all others sought to be accomplished by the passage of the food-control bill, it is, as it seems to me, to provide at all hazards an abundant supply of cheap bread for the people of America while the war lasts. How then can we excuse ourselves if the result of our action shall be to curtail our present bread supply and to increase its price?

Personally I am opposed to the prohibition of the manufacture of beer for other reasons. I do not think that we can well dispense in times like these with the immense revenue derived by the Government from beer. Above all, I would think it monumentally unwise to prohibit at such a time as this the manufacture of the poor man's drink, comparatively innocuous as it is. But if neither of these reasons were controlling with me, the one that I have stated in the body of my speech would be. No matter what one's views may be upon prohibition as an ethical question, it seems to me that our highest duty as Members of Congress is to see to it that through no action of ours may a shortage by any possibility be caused in the bread supply of the country while we are at war.

I sincerely hope, when the bill returns to us from the Senate, that we may reverse our hasty and undeliberate action of the other day and permit, under reasonable regulations, the manufacture of malted liquors while the war lasts. To me it seems as clear as day that this is the wise, prudent, and patriotic course.

America's Aerial Future.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MURRAY HULBERT,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, July 3, 1917.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an article from the New York Globe on the subject of "America's aerial future," and also a joint resolution introduced by myself and a letter.

The article and joint resolution and letter are as follows:

[From the New York Globe.]

AMERICA'S AERIAL FUTURE.

The joint resolution introduced in Congress by Senator SHEPPARD and Representative MURRAY HULBERT for a comprehensive study of aerial navigation by a commission should meet with no opposition. The United States is far behind other nations in the development of the flying machine, and if we are to gain the place to which we rightly are entitled, we shall have to take up the subject in a more serious manner.

The proposed commission would not concern itself so much with the military phase of the subject as with the commercial possibilities of the airplane. England is planning a permanent peace air service, with a personnel larger than the United States Navy at full war strength. France, Italy, and Germany, too, are making plans to provide for the future in this respect. If we do not soon do something to develop our aerial resources, we shall be left far behind.

A few years ago no one realized the tremendous part aeronautics would be playing in the world to-day. Supremacy of the air probably will be the deciding factor in the war. And aerial navigation is only in its infancy at that. The next decade doubtless will see even more remarkable progress. The possibilities of the heavier-than-air machine are boundless. It is a creation of American genius, and we must look to our laurels if we are not to be outstripped in making full use of it. The time to get ready for the future is to-day.

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 114) providing for the creation of a commission on aerial navigation.

Resolved, etc., That a commission is hereby created consisting of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, not more than two of whom shall be of the same political party; also three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, not more than two of whom shall be of the same political party; one officer of the United States Army, who will not rank below the grade of brigadier general; one officer of the United States Navy, who will not rank below the highest grade of rear admiral; and one civilian mechanical engineer; the latter three to be designated by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and said commission is hereby authorized and directed, under such rules and regulations as it may adopt, to investigate the feasibility and advisability of a comprehensive system of aerial navigation for military, naval, and commercial purposes, and to consider and study the subject of air currents, direction of the wind and velocity to be expected at different altitudes, and for other forms of air charting as an aid to air pilots in aerial navigation, and to determine what air levels are best suited to military, naval, and commercial air traffic, including mail, passenger, and freight, with a view to determining lanes of travel, and rules and regulations covering the same.

Said commission shall investigate and report upon the use now being made of aerial transportation for commercial purposes in the United States, including the service heretofore inaugurated at Atlantic City, N. J., and Tampa and Miami, Fla., and shall consider and report upon the advisability of establishing an aerial coast patrol and life-saving service for the defense of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific seaboards and the protection of human life and shipping on the high seas contiguous thereto.

Said commission shall investigate and report upon the program for commercial development of aerial navigation in England, France, Italy, Germany, and any other foreign country in which plans have been adopted or are in progress of formation respecting the same.

The members of said commission shall serve without compensation and shall submit their report to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives on or before the first Monday of December next.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 2, 1917.

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Relative to the importance of having a congressional committee, such as proposed in your joint resolution, I desire to call to your attention the fact that if no further advance were made in aeronautical science, we have already developed the cruising type aeroplane to such an extent that it is capable of competing seriously with railroads and steamships in the safe and rapid transportation of passengers, mail, and express freight.

The type of air cruiser now building for the United States War Department is capable of carrying 4,000 pounds at a speed of 100 miles per hour and can remain in sustained flight for 15 hours.

But I assure you that we are merely at the inception of attainment in this wonderful science. In order to appreciate the probable aerial development of the immediate future we should remember that when the locomotive and the steamboat were invented mechanical science was extremely crude and progress in railroad and steamship transportation could advance only so rapidly as the many necessary and ancillary sciences could be developed. Therefore, we may expect the strides in aviation to be unprecedented in all mechanical history, since we have already many ancillary sciences highly developed, with data adapted to the demands of the new art of aviation.

Respectfully, JAS. V. MARTIN.

Capt. Martin is a poineer in aviation; a large number of the most noted fliers on the western front were his pupils, one of whom has become a general third in the command of Gen. Haig. Capt. Martin is now building a tractor biplane for the Army and consulting in aeronautical construction work for the Navy Department.

Winning the War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE HUDDLESTON,
OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, July 9, 1917.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, the one great thought which should fill every American heart at this time is how we may win the war—how we may win quickly and with the least loss of blood and treasure and the least sacrifice of American ideals.

War is an accomplished fact. The time for discussion is past. It is no longer desirable to consider the causes which led to the war, nor whether we might have avoided it. War is now a fact, not a theory. The way out of the war is through it, and on the other side is the end. Every American should put his shoulder to the wheel and push the war through to success.

Success in winning the war requires teamwork, unity of purpose. If we have had differences of opinion as to the causes for the war, let us sink them now. Personalities should be lost sight of, political hatreds and discordant criticism of officials should be hushed.

I have been so much impressed with the necessity that those responsible for Government should work harmoniously together that during the present session of Congress I have frequently suppressed my views upon public questions so as to be in harmony with the majority. I have sat in silence while measures which I did not approve were being considered and have been content merely to register my vote against them rather than to combat them with an opposition which might have proved harmful. I have supported measures on final vote which I did not approve in their details. I have felt that now was the time when Members of the great legislative branch of the Government should pull together.

I have been anxious to aid in every way in carrying on the war. I voted to provide funds by the great bond and certificate issue of $7,000,000,000, and for the revenue bill to raise $1,800,000,000. I voted for the loans to the allies and for an appropriation for war purposes of $3,000,000,000, the largest ever granted by any nation in the history of the world. Each of these measures had details of which I could not approve, but I felt it necessary to support them in the whole. I have voted for every measure which could be said to in any way tend to promote the war except the conscription bill, which violated a sacred principle of human liberty, and to which therefore I could not honestly submit. I was willing to vote men and ships to any numbers that might have been asked for, but I could not bring myself to vote away the right of a free people to choose whether they would go into the trenches.

The present is no time to indulge political jealousies. Factional politics and selfish scheming to destroy officials whom some men do not like are out of place.

This war is already more terrible than all previous wars and its burdens in proportion will necessarily prove a grievous load to our people. Many as yet do not understand the seriousness of the situation, do not realize the pangs that the future has in store for us, nor the awful cost which we will be compelled to pay in blood and money.

This is no time for men to think of pleasure and easy living, nor for greedy captains of industry to fill their pockets. The burdens of the war must of course fall in chief upon the plain people. In chief will they be called upon to do the fighting and the dying, and it is out of their tears and suffering that the vast sums of money must finally be coined which will be required to pay for it. For this reason as well as for the general public good should the people concern themselves with seeing that the war is well and efficiently carried on.

THE PEOPLE RULE.

America is the land of the free, the land of democracy and political equality. Each citizen is entitled to an equal voice in Government. Old-world ideals of kings and hereditary rulers have no place here. An American citizen is a sovereign and has no superior. His officials from the highest to the lowest—from President to constable—are not his rulers but are his servants. In this thought and by ever keeping it as a light for our feet may we be true to the course of liberty. Once shall we lose this faith of freemen then will we soon be shorn of all the precious privileges of self-government.

Subjects of foreign powers under their worn-out systems owe loyalty to kings. Free Americans owe loyalty to country, not to officials of high or low degree. Officials are mere servants, but are to be respected and supported when faithfully performing the work of their masters—the people. When in this great democracy officials of high position are obeyed as masters by the people, then indeed will we have come upon unworthy times.

This war is the people's war. It is not the war of Congress nor of the President. If it was not entered into in obedience to the will of the people, then were Congress and President guilty of usurpation and moral wrong? It is the people's war. They must furnish the men and the money. They have the right to direct its course and to decide on the terms of peace. The people must not be kept in ignorance. They have the right to be informed of all facts known to the Government which to disclose will not benefit the enemy. They should be consulted in carrying on the war. Let no man nor set of men dare to an action which may affect the future of our country without consulting the people, its rightful rulers. Free speech and free press as guaranteed by the Constitution must be preserved. The people must be given information so that they may carry on their business of governing themselves intelligently. No excuse of war necessity must be made for withholding knowledge which the people are entitled to receive.

This is the people's war and they are entitled to conduct it as they please. They have the moral and constitutional right to know all the facts connected with it. Officials can not withhold such facts without violating their oaths of office. Newspapers have the high moral duty imposed upon them to keep the people honestly informed. Only a dastard and unworthy press will color facts in this time of the Nation's peril in order to satisfy personal grudges and political schemes.

We have recently heard much from sources of doubtful patriotism, of standing by the President. Chiefly this has come from unworthy newspapers who were standing by the President merely because they and the greedy interests for which they speak are trying to use the President for their selfish purposes. It is "stand by the President" when it suits them and their schemes, but no such slogan is heard when the President favors bills to curb the license of the press and to lay war taxes upon them and the big business interests which they represent. The press is indeed powerful. In a recent pamphlet upon the subject, Joseph I. C. Clarke, himself an old newspaper editor, says:

The press appears to be the master of Congress. In all else the press backed President Wilson, and he succeeded. In the censorship they opposed him utterly and he failed. To every Member there seems to be at least one newspaper before which he cowers, and when the writers of 5,000 papers, daily and weekly, assailed all attempts to "muzzle the press," to limit "freedom of speech" and called on all the gods of the newspaper world to punish anyone denying them the right to say what they pleased, about anything, no wonder the Congress sidestepped. In its haste to purge itself it rejected the whole plan of government, and therefore responsible, delimitation of what is news of the war from what is direct aid to the enemy.

THIS IS THE PEOPLE'S WAR.

This is the people's war and the people rule in America. Sometimes I fear that they are in turn themselves ruled by the newspapers. With an independent and honest press all is well. In the old corrupt days the selfish interests ruled the country by big contributions to campaign slush funds. Now, as it seems, the same interests are seeking to dominate through control of the newspapers.

This is the people's war, but the disposition is shown in some quarters to suppress free speech in regard to it. It is sought to bully the people out of discussing how the war should be carried on and what our war aims are. It is said that we must leave all this to the President.

True, the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, but under the Constitution his every action is subject to the direction of the people's Representatives in Congress. When the people speak through their Representatives it becomes the duty of the President, their servant, to obey. The President is merely the instrument through which the people work their will in carrying on the war, and it is for the people to decide what are to be our war aims. The President is the agent and adviser of the people. He is in no sense their master. This is not the President's war; its aims are not his aims. Presidents come and go, good and wise men are they all, but in the end they fold their hands and molder into dust. Our country must not die. American ideals and institutions founded upon the equality of man, human liberty, and the right of men to govern themselves must not be allowed to perish from off the earth.

America entered this war in vindication of her national honor and dignity. Germany had sunk our ships, destroyed the lives of our people, and had violated American rights. We did not enter the war as a party to European quarrels nor to further the selfish aims of nations now associated with us in opposing Germany. We did not enter the war to preserve the balance between European powers nor to affect the adjustment of national boundaries. We fight for America, for our own interests, and for the security of American rights and dignity.

We war with Germany for the preservation of our national interests alone. We do not fight for the realization of dreams of political freedom for all mankind. The true American looks to the interest of America alone. Dreams of world liberty are sublime; they are fitting for philanthropists and internationalists; they do not belong to patriots. Patriots can not afford to jeopardize the interests of their own country by idealistic meddling with the affairs of other nations. American patriots fight for America, for American interests, and for an American peace, and do not sacrifice the blood of our people and our national hope for a future in the vain pursuit of world democracy.

The world can never be made "safe for democracy"; never, so long as greed and selfishness exist. So long as there is striving and competition, never will that justice which is democracy be assured. Democracy is not even safe in America; even here is there oppression, injustice, and cruel wrong. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." So long as men are men and the perfect spirit of Christianity has not subdued humanity, liberty and democracy must be manfully defended always and everywhere.

This is the people's war, and theirs is the responsibility The people should see to it that the war is carried on efficiently and well; that necessary soldiers and money are provided; that taxes are laid justly and equitably; that supplies are bought at honest prices, and that greedy contractors are not permitted to rob the Government. The people must see to it that selfish interests do not take advantage of the war period to rob the people of their liberty nor to intrench privileged classes in positions of oppression and wrong.

SOLDIERS FOR THE BATTLE LINE.

The present war has called to arms men in numbers beyond the wildest dreams of the past. Our own contribution may run to millions of our best and bravest men. We have temporarily abandoned our traditional voluntary system. Congress has decided to raise the necessary soldiers by conscription. I think this was a serious mistake. I opposed it as un-American, unnecessary, undemocratic, and unwise. I opposed it as violating a sacred principle of human liberty. I knew that the forces behind it were the militarists and the big-business interests who desired it not for national defense but in furtherance of their own selfish purposes.

However, conscription is also an accomplished fact. For the present war it has become the national policy and the law should be obeyed faithfully and in a cheerful spirit. The conscription law was enacted against the will of the great silent majority of our people and without consulting them. I have been proud to observe the obedient spirit in which the people have accepted the law notwithstanding they were opposed to it, I have been especially proud of my own district, where registration for conscription went far beyond all calculations. It is the duty of patriots and good citizens to obey a law even though it be unjust and oppressive, and our people recognized this principle.

However, the duty to obey the law does not carry with it any obligation not to favor its repeal. The people of the country have been put on their guard. They are aroused. They submit to conscription for the present war, doing so with the knowledge that the militarists and big business interests intend to try to make the system permanent, so that after the present war is over the system of compulsory military service may be perpetuated. The people are determined to resist this by all legitimate means. They will not give up their liberties without a struggle. I warn the conscriptionists that they have before them a bitter struggle with our liberty-loving people before they will be able to make permanent the detestable system of forced service.

The unfairness of conscriptionists is characteristic. They realize the weakness of their cause. They realize that the great masses of the people are opposed to compulsory military service. With characteristic unfairness and intolerance the conscriptionists have been unwilling for the opposition to be heard. They have attempted to hector and bully those opposed to forced military service into silence and by abuse and ridicule to suppress all opposition. For weeks before the measure was acted on by Congress the newspapers were full of arguments in favor of it, but they printed nothing that any one might say against it. The press bullied some Members of Congress who opposed conscription into voting in favor of it, and those whom they could not bully they abused beyond measure.

When Speaker CLARK and others who opposed conscription distributed their speeches against it among their constituents and friends, the newspapers covered them with abuse and pretended to think that they were seeking to discourage registration. The people had the right to read the speeches against conscription and to weigh the arguments. Members of Congress had the right to explain their views. But these rights vicious newspapers would have denied. These vicious elements knew that every Member of Congress had advised his constituents to obey the law, and that there was nothing in their speeches to the contrary. They could not answer the arguments against conscription, so they resorted to abuse and misrepresentation. Having misrepresented and falsely criticised Members for voting against the measure, the newspapers would have denied them the privilege of explaining their views to their constituents.

The people have been very patient and are to be commended for their forbearance. The hectoring and bullying efforts of the conscriptionists and their newspapers to put over the odious system of conscription and to suppress all opposition to it has been trying to the people. They have also been tried in patience by the shouting and flag waving of swashbucklers who never performed a patriotic act in their lives and are trying to get others into the trenches when they have no thought of fighting themselves. It is always thus. A few braggarts make the speeches, wave the flags, and shout, while quiet and unpretentious patriots do all the fighting and suffering.

It is the duty of the people to obey the conscription law, but apart from this we must remember that our country is in peril. We need soldiers, vast numbers of them. Duty calls, and patriots must respond to service. Patriots must not allow conscription to dampen their ardor, but should shoulder arms cheerfully and gladly because the country needs them.

The one great thought that should fill every patriot's heart is, "How may I best serve my country?" If it be as a soldier, then it is his high duty to present himself whether he has been conscripted or not.

MONEY FOR WAR.

As was said three years ago, this war must be won with silver bullets. Money is required. Vast sums of it must be poured out. For war now is a competition of machines. The supplying of vast armies, the immense quantities of ammunition required, the ponderous cannons, aeroplanes, and other mechanical appliances cause war expenses to mount quickly into billions. The total war expenses of all the nations to this time is estimated at over $125,000,000,000. It is said that our own expense for the first year will reach $8,000,000,000.

The problem of statesmen is to raise the necessary money to carry on the war. The money must be raised in the wisest way, in the way which will prove least harmful to our national future. The big business and financial interests have insisted that the money for the war should be raised by bond issues, arguing that as the present generation must fight the war future generations should pay for it. They have assumed that the men who do the fighting are the same that would pay the taxes, when the fact is that the big interests who ought to pay the taxes are not to be found fighting in the ranks. The fighting will be left largely to the great mass of the people, and captains of industry and finance will continue to serve as heretofore in their easy chairs and luxuriously furnished offices. It would be monstrous that our soldiers should come back maimed and crippled from foreign battle fields to find that grievous burdens of taxation had been laid upon their shoulders in their absence. Future generations will have their own burdens to bear. Let us not destroy them in advance with a vast bonded debt.

President Wilson in his war message urged that the money for the war should be raised largely from taxation so as to protect the people against the hardships of the inflation of values produced by bond issues. Large bond issues inevitably cause a great rise in prices by the reduction of the purchasing power of money. The bonds are used as a basis of credit and the effect is similar as though actual currency had been put in circulation, so that money is greatly cheapened temporarily. The rise in cost of the necessaries of life is due in many instances to speculation, extortion, and hoarding, but, generally speaking, it is due to the influx of European gold paid for war supplies and the flotation in this country of several billions of bonds and securities from Europe and the increase of more than $1,000,000,000 in our circulation which has resulted. Our per capita circulation is greater to-day than ever in our history, and the issue of our own bonds will greatly increase it. Prices will continue to rise. Of course the price of labor will rise last and least, so that much hardship and suffering must ensue. The only way to curb this is by taxation, which will restrain speculation and wildcat enterprises, will curb investments and preserve the equilibrium of business. This was the idea that the President put forward in his message.

SLACKERS OF GREAT WEALTH.

But the big, selfish interests have not been willing to "stand by the President" in this respect. They want the opportunity to invest their money in Government bonds. Big financiers have even prided themselves on buying liberty bonds. "Enlist or buy a bond" was the slogan used. The president of the biggest bank in America said in the course of the bond-selling campaign that the man who bought bonds was as much a patriot as though he had enlisted as a soldier. A patriot at 3½ per cent in nontaxable bonds—an investment, in an absolutely safe loan, equivalent in most communities to 6 per cent! Of course we had to sell the bonds, and men should have bought them, but the buying was a very cheap form of patriotism, not worth boasting about.

The selfish interests oppose the President's plan because they do not want to pay taxes on incomes and the swollen profits they are making. They are now making the fight of their lives in Congress to keep down taxes on incomes and profits. The total levy recommended by the Senate committee is only $532,000,000 on incomes and $523,000,000 on profits. The committee proposes to tax tea, sugar, and coffee, $86,000,000; tobacco, $56,000,000; and other necessaries of life, $50,000,000; and to raise $50,000,000 by increasing letter postage to 3 cents and the poor man's postal cards to 2 cents. In short, they want the common people to pay a large share of the war cost by taxes on the necessaries of life and things that common people use.

The selfish interests have the stage carefully set. They have carried on a propaganda over the country through their newspaper organs and otherwise to create public opinion in favor of their views. They have insisted that "business should not be hampered," as though business would be hampered by a tax on the incomes of the rich and by taking a part of the vast profits that contractors and munitions makers are making out of the war. These are some of the profits which the war-contracting corporations are making:

The total of 37 leading corporations for 1914 was $67,034,364. The same concerns in 1916 made net profits of $851,093,509, an increase of $784,019,145. This shows why war contractors love war. During 1917 their profits will perhaps be doubled. It is said that the United States Steel Corporation, which earned only $23,496,768 in 1914, is earning net profits at the yearly rate of $474,000,000 for 1917.

It seems fundamental to me that there should be no profits in war; that neither financiers nor war contractors should be allowed to make money out of their country's misfortune and from human misery and suffering. Men are being conscripted for the war. Why should not profits and incomes also be conscripted? What moral right is there in big business concerns piling up swollen fortunes while the country is being bankrupted and bled white? This war should be paid for by those who are able to pay, by those who make a profit from it. They should not be permitted to come out richer than they went in, while the plain people come out decimated, starving, and impoverished.

I lay down as fair and honest principles of taxation applicable alike to peace and war that those who benefit by government should pay for it in proportion as they are benefited and according to their ability to pay. Taxes should not be laid on the necessaries of life until all other subjects of taxation have been exhausted. Taxes laid upon necessaries which are used by all are per capita taxes of which each citizen pays a nearly equal amount. Such taxes are unjust, because under them the benefits of government derived do not relate to the share of its burdens which is imposed upon the citizen.

SOME MORE SLACKERS.

Newspapers and periodicals in this country receive a subsidy from the Government of $90,000,000 annually. This immense sum is donated to them through the Postal System by which the second-class postage rate is fixed at 1 cent per pound, when it actually costs the Government 6 cents per pound to carry it.

Publishers may send their publications from Boston to San Francisco at $1 per hundred pounds, whereas the rate on ordinary freight shipped by rail is $2.25 per hundred pounds, and if sent by express is $10.50. One hundred pounds of newspapers carried from Boston to San Francisco costs the publisher $1, but 100 pounds of letters sent by the people cost them $32. A publisher may send a magazine to a subscriber at 1 cent per pound. If the subscriber desires to return the magazine to the publisher he is required to pay 4 cents per pound in order to do so.

A publisher sends 100 pounds of newspapers from Boston to San Francisco for $1. This service actually costs the Government about $15 for transportation alone, yet when the newspapers reach the post office they must be handled by clerks and distributed through carriers—additional service, which costs about one-fourth of a cent for each paper handled. It is practically as much trouble to carry a newspaper through the mail and deliver it as a letter, yet the publisher pays 1 cent per pound and the letter writer 32 cents per pound.

The publishers attempt to justify the rank discrimination in their favor by claiming that the Government should encourage newspapers for the education of the people. No printed matter has the same educational value as the same weight in a letter. To write a letter or to receive one is of more educational value than several times the letter's weight in printed matter. Besides, magazines and newspapers average more than half advertisements. Some of them are seven-eighths advertisements, and are run purely for advertising purposes. Advertising has little, if any, educational value. Besides, if we are to pay a newspaper subsidy for educational purposes, why should we not allow the newspaper remailed at the same rate? Why charge the publisher one-fourth of what everyone else has to pay for mailing the same matter?

Schoolbooks are carried by parcels post. The rate for 50 miles is 5 cents for the first pound, and, carried from Boston to San Francisco, the rate for 1 pound would be 12 times the newspaper rate. Surely schoolbooks have as much educational value as advertisement-padded newspapers.

I believe in a free press as a matter of principle. I believe that newspapers should be permitted to print what they choose without censorship and be subject only to prosecution for libel and for disclosing military secrets in time of war. But publishers are in business for private profit; they are not philanthropists. There should be no discrimination in their favor. They should not be subsidized out of the Public Treasury. Recently it has seemed that many of the newspapers are of doubtful public value and are largely engaged in promoting the selfish and illegitimate advantage of financial and business interests, or are vehicles of dishonest political propaganda and of the private malice of their owners. Still, I have thought that the remedy for such evil conditions is not by censorship or suppression, but by training the people to distrust dishonest critics and editors.

It seems outrageous that unworthy agencies of public information should expect aid from the Public Treasury to carry on their foul work. Owners of newspapers should have the right to carry on a propaganda for their selfish purposes, but their scheming should be at their own expense, and they should be required to pay out of their own pockets the cost of distributing their sheets.

We need money for the war. The first step is to choke off the grafters. I can think of no better place to begin than with the publishers. We should increase their rates so as to require them to pay the actual cost of the service rendered them and thereby save $90,000,000 every year.

The publishers strenuously object to the increase in their postage rates. They have nothing to say in opposition to the increase in letter postage. They have failed to mention the proposal to increase the common postal card to 2 cents. Letters are now being carried at a profit to the Government. Yet the proposal is to increase letter postage to 3 cents, so that every time a letter is mailed the writer must pay 2 cents more than the cost of carrying it in order that some publisher may be enabled to send his newspaper through the mails at 1 cent a pound. If we are to give the publishers a subsidy, it should be done frankly and not by subterfuge. It should be paid out of the Public Treasury, and the letter writers of the country should not be forced to stand the expense.

THE BOYS ARE MARCHING.

The boys are marching, the bands are playing, and the starry flag is waving all over the land. American valor and patriotism is again being brought to the test. The response comes from every plain and valley. Men are recruiting, notices of conscription are being sent out, mothers sit white faced and helpless, and young men are girding themselves for service. Soon they will be assembled in vast camps and soon thousands of them will be arrayed on European battle fields.

It is sweet to serve one's country, to go forth with the consciousness of the performance of a high duty, to take up the challenge in defense of liberty and justice. It is sweet to serve—even to die—for one's country, to embark in a just cause upon the great adventure.

Our boys are marching. They are putting on their uniforms, they are burnishing their arms, their hearts are flaming with the passion of patriotism. In my soul I envy them. I would that I might recall the days of my young manhood's strength and enthusiasm so that I might take my place beside them. I envy our brave boys who go into the field of battle. God grant that peace and victory may soon be ours, that our soldiers may return unscathed, and that loved ones may be reunited. God grant that this may be the last war, and that out of it mankind may learn some saner, juster way to settle differences and conflicting interests than by an appeal to arms.

The Revenue Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. CLAUDE KITCHIN,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, May 10, 1917.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope no one will interrupt me until I can give somewhat of a bird's-eye view of this bill. After that I will be glad to be interrupted and answer questions.

Mr. Chairman and gentleman, on April 13 the Ways and Means Committee offered for the consideration of this House a bill making at one time the most stupendous bond authorization in the history of the world. To-day we propose a bill that raises more additional taxes than any bill that has ever been presented to any legislative body on earth. This bill, if passed, will produce more revenue by five times than any revenue bill ever presented to the American Congress.

I was delighted to observe that when the big bond-issue bill of April 13 was voted on every Member casting a vote voted for it. It was unanimous. It was courageous in Members of the House; it was patriotic in them to impose upon their children and their children's children a burden of billions of dollars. I trust, gentlemen of the House, when we vote on this bill which imposes a burden, not upon our children but upon us, who declared the war and who are to wage the war, that we will show the same sacrificial spirit and the same courage. [Applause.] It is not a time, my friends, for a man to say this bill taxes an industry in his district or in his State; it is not a time to say that these taxes will destroy this industry or that industry; it is not a time for the American patriot to think of self. His first and only thought should be, How can I best serve my country in this hour of her trial. [Applause.] It is not for the man who goes out to the front to meet the bayonets and the guns of the enemy to reason why. It is for him to obey and go. In obedience to the call of country a million and more of the best young men of this country will sooner or later face the enemy's guns. No man who has to pay a dollar of the tax in this bill who remains home while the boys are at the front should protest against it. [Applause.]

As the young men of this country are willing to sacrifice all profit, all business, all career, and offer up their lives, every taxpayer, if he be a patriot, ought to be willing to sacrifice at least a part of his profits and to offer to his country his dollar. [Applause.] If we can sacrifice our sons and our sons can sacrifice their lives, the true American who remains at home and risks not his life ought to be happy to say, "I will pay my part—take all my profits if necessary—to defend my country and maintain her cause." [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I hope that there will not be a man in the House who will get on this floor and complain that this bill is taxing his State or his district or his industry. [Applause.] The Government is going to conscript my State and my district. It will conscript your State and your district. The boys who are going to be conscripted have a right to demand that American statesmanship shall conscript the dollar to sustain them in the field while fighting for the flag. [Applause.] One of the most delightful observations of my life in Congress, one of the happiest reflections upon my retirement from Congress, is that when the 23 members of the committee on Ways and Means met—Democrats, Republicans, and Progressives—there at once appeared, in thought and word and act, but one aim, one aspiration, one effort—to prepare a bill for the consideration of the Congress which in their patriotic judgment was the wisest, the most just, and the least burdensome to the American people, in order to raise this enormous amount of money. I shall enjoy the recollection, too, that in the committee conferences, of weeks of labor, there was not one vestige of partisanship. [Applause.] Partyism was eclipsed by patriotism. In the many votes taken in the committee there was not a single instance in which the Republicans lined up on one side and the Democrats on the other. The vote was according to the conscience and judgment of each man, and in every vote cast there were Republicans and Democrats on either side. [Applause.] Not one word was spoken, not one sentiment uttered, not one act done that even suggested that members of opposite parties were sitting around the table. [Applause.]

Another thing, gentlemen, I will never forget, inasmuch as it is so contrary to my experience in helping to frame and consider revenue measures in the House, that not a man on that committee—Republican, Democrat, or Progressive, though some of us thought this or that tax was too high or too low—even hinted that this or that tax would bring disaster to his district or his State or to the industries of his State or district, and therefore should not be imposed. [Applause.]

Not one asked or sought to take this or that tax off because it fell upon the people of his State or his district or the industries of his State or district. I trust that the example of patriotic aim and effort of the Ways and Means Committee, of men of all parties on that committee, will be emulated in this House in the consideration of this bill and the vote upon it. [Applause.]

This bill does not suit me in every particular. I presume that if Congress would authorize each individual in the House to go out and take weeks of time for investigation, as we have done, and bring back a bill for the consideration of the House, to raise $1,800,000,000, that not one would write a bill exactly like this; each would write a different bill. I did not want all of the things in this bill which are in it. I wanted some things to go into the bill which are not in it. I thought some of the taxes were too high, some too low. Every man on the committee had his ideas about this or that. This bill is not the individual thought of any one man, but, sitting around the table with the facts before us, with the results of our study and investigation, after thrashing out the pros and cons on every proposition that was submitted, this bill is the resultant product of the most diligent investigation, of the best wisdom, of the best judgment, of the best patriotism, of the 23 members of the Ways and Means Committee. [Applause.] It is not a Democratic bill, nor is it a Republican bill. Republicans, Democrats, and Progressives equally are responsible for it.

There is hardly a title or section or paragraph or item in this bill that in ordinary times of peace would not be a cruel injustice upon the people of the United States. There is hardly a title or section or paragraph or item in this bill that I would vote for in ordinary times. This bill can only be justified by the hard and inexorable necessities of war.

Every dollar of the $1,800,000,000 proposed to be raised by this measure is absolutely necessary. The administration tells us, the Secretary of the Treasury tells us, our knowledge of conditions convince us, that the financial needs of the Treasury demand that we raise that amount by new taxes. My fear is that while the administration says that we need for the remainder of this fiscal year and for the next fiscal year to meet war expenses $3,800,000,000, that we will need nearer $5,000,000,000 before the end of the next fiscal year.

Some say, "Why not raise the necessary funds to finance the war by bonds?" Why, gentlemen, we are raising of that $3,800,000,000 necessary for war expenses for the next fiscal year $2,000,000,000 by bonds. We authorized in our bill of April 13 the issuance of $5,000,000,000 of bonds, $3,000,000,000 of which is to be loaned to the allies and $2,000,000,000 to help defray our own enormous war expenses.

If I were to put, or attempt to put, all the burden of financing this war, by authorizing tremendous issues of bonds, upon my children and my children's children—to make them finance a fight in which I engage—I would condemn myself as a miserable coward. [Applause.] This is our fight, and we ought to be willing at least to help pay for it. [Applause.]

If we could, we should defray the whole expense by taxes. If able, this is the manly, patriotic thing, but perhaps we are not able to do this. Probably it would not be unfair to put upon posterity half the burden. We of this generation should at least bear the other half. If I consent to put half of it upon my posterity, I should be willing to go into my pocket and pay my share of the other half as long as this war lasts, and that ought to be the patriotic impulse of every man in this House and in this country. [Applause.]

Your children and mine had nothing to do with bringing on this war. They had no vote on it. Many who will have to pay the bonds are yet unborn. We have spoken for them. It would be unjust and cruel and cowardly to shift upon them the burden of a single dollar more than was absolutely necessary. They will have troubles and obligations of their own to meet and finance. We ought not to transfer to them a single obligation which we ourselves are able to meet.

The taxes proposed are enormous. They are going to be hard to bear, but not a tax in the bill will cripple a single industry nor will it seriously embarrass a single individual.

In framing this measure we concluded that about half of the taxes should be collected from incomes and profits; that the other half should be collected from the people generally, distributed so that all would pay some, and that in the general consumption tax we should collect as much as possible from luxuries and semiluxuries in order to lighten the tax on necessities. This is the policy we pursued in framing the bill before you.

In the preparation of this bill to raise money to sustain the Government in the mightiest undertaking and struggle of its life, I have been surprised and amazed to observe that there have been, by a hundred times, more protests and more complaints against taxation from men throughout the United States, from every class of people who are to be taxed in this bill, and found more unwillingness to pay than I ever heard or observed during the preparation of the many revenue bills in peace times which I have assisted in framing.

If one-tenth of what has been told us by the men who and whose industries will in the first instance pay these taxes is true, instead of raising $1,800,000,000, we will not raise $100,000. There is hardly an item in the bill that has not been protested and condemned as bankrupting and disastrous to them and their business. We are told that we will collect nothing from excess profits and nothing from income tax, because the bill will destroy all sources of income and profits. So, gentlemen, when men from your district and from your State write and tell you that this or that tax is going to ruin their industry and destroy them, you should know beforehand that every man who is taxed in the bill has already written and wired us, and some of them came to Washington and told us the same thing. [Laughter.] They are all willing to fight this war out if somebody else will do the fighting. They are all willing to pay for the war if somebody else will do the paying.

But, gentlemen, we have caught everybody in the United States [laughter], and I will tell you how we got them. Gentlemen would come into my office and into the offices of other Members to show us how we could raise every dollar of tax needed by "putting it on the other fellow," and as soon as he left our office the other fellow would come in and show us how to raise it by "putting it on him," and so we put it on the other fellow and on him, too. [Laughter.]

As I said a moment ago, the committee thought it the wise policy, as it would be the least burdensome, to collect about half of the required amount, $1,800,000,000, from incomes and profits and the other half from a general consumption tax; that of the general consumption tax we should collect as much as possible from luxuries and semiluxuries before levying on the necessities.

Pursuing this policy, the bill levies on incomes of individuals and corporations, in addition to the income tax under existing law, in round numbers, $641,000,000, and on excess profits, in addition to the excess-profits tax under existing law, $200,000,000 and about $6,000,000 additional on estates or inheritances for the first year, making $847,000,000. We raise about $420,000,000 from luxuries and semiluxuries, such as liquors, wines, soft drinks, manufactures of tobacco, and admissions to theaters, circuses, moving-picture shows, baseball games, and other places where admission charges are made; sporting goods, jewelry, musical instruments, pleasure boats, and automobiles, and so forth. [Applause.]

I wish to remind my friends from Michigan, Mr. DOREMUS and Mr. KELLEY, of my happiness to know that automobiles are necessities down in my district and State. I have wires and letters from my people informing me that an automobile is an absolute necessity and no longer a luxury. [Laughter.] We use them in our business. We use them to go to church, and to picnics, and to baseballs, and to theaters. [Laughter.]

I did not know until we were preparing this bill that life—human existence—had so many requirements. Strenuous attempts were made to convince us that everything proposed to be taxed, from a glass of beer or cigarette to a racing yacht, were absolute necessities of the people. We discovered that golf sticks—what do you call them?—golf equipments, baseballs, tennis rackets, fishing poles, perfumery, powder puffs, and Coca-Cola were prime requirements of human existence [laughter], and it was mighty hard to lay the finger of taxation upon them, but we did so—reluctantly. [Laughter.]

The remaining amount, about $550,000,000, we collect from the general necessities of the people. No man could justify his vote for such taxes except by the necessities of war. These include a tax on passenger tickets; freight and express bills; light, heat, and telephone service bills; fire and life insurance; stamp tax on deeds, notes, and other instruments and documents. They include also the tariff provision of a 10 per cent ad valorem duty on all articles on the free list and a 10 per cent additional duty on all dutiable articles imported.

Now, gentlemen, with your permission and patience, I will proceed to explain the bill more in detail. But first let me say, and you should bear it in mind, that the tax in the pending measure on incomes, excess profits, estates, or inheritances, and on articles now taxed is in addition to the tax imposed by existing laws, and such laws remain undisturbed.

TITLE I.

This title provides for a war tax on incomes. We have made pretty big increases over the present income tax. Such increases will produce, in round numbers, $533,000,000. This, remember, is in addition to the amount now being raised by the present income-tax law, which for this fiscal year will reach approximately $330,000,000. We have lowered the exemption and increased the normal tax by 2 per cent, and the 2 per cent rate applies to corporations and individuals alike. We lowered the exemptions of single persons from $3,000 to $1,000, and married persons from $4,000 to $2,000. The additional 2 per cent we put on catches the single man who has an income of more than $1,000, and the married man who has an income of over $2,000. Now, in all cases of married and single persons who pay on incomes under existing law, they will have to pay by virtue of lowering of the exemption $40 more. The surtaxes or additional taxes we have placed pretty high. I am called sometimes, by the ultraconservative, a radical. But I had to balk and hesitate a little at some of the increases. Compelled to raise the enormous amount of money, we had to greatly increase the surtax rates, and especially was this so in the case of the larger incomes.

The surtax, or, as it is called by the law, the additional tax, under the present law begins at $20,000 then rises between $40,000 and $60,000, $60,000 and $80,0000, and so forth. In this bill we begin the surtax or the additional tax at $5,000. On the income between $5,000 and $7,500 the rate is 1 per cent additional. That is going to catch all of you gentlemen. From $7,500 to $10,000, 2 per cent. From $10,000 to $12,500, 3 per cent; from $12,500 to $15,000, 4 per cent; from $15,000 to $20,000, 5 per cent.

From $20,000 and up we keep the brackets that we have under the present law. The additional tax on incomes from $20,000 up to $40,000 is 6 per cent; from $40,000 to $60,000, 8 per cent; from $60,000 to $80,000, 11 per cent; from $80,000 to $100,000, 14 per cent; from $100,000 to $150,000, 17 per cent; from $150,000, to $200,000, 20 per cent; $200,000 to $250,000, 24 per cent; $250,000 to $300,000, 27 per cent; $300,000 to $500,000, 30 per cent; and on the amount which exceeds $500,000, 33 per cent. These rates are in addition to the present law. So that on incomes of over $1,000,000 one pays a total tax under the present income tax and the tax in this bill, ranging from 40 to 50 per cent of the total income according to the size of the income. [Applause.] I shall presently give tables showing the rates, respectively, under the present law and under this bill.

These are mighty hard and high. I know one gentleman in this country who has an income of $20,000,000 or more. To take about $10,000,000 from that fellow out of his twenty millions struck me at first blush as being so cruel and unjust that I could hardly stand it. But after it was determined upon, reflecting on it over night, I thought to myself, why can not that gentleman struggle along without wearing patches on his trousers or having his shoes half-soled on the $10,000,000 a year we leave him? [Laughter.] But the country needed the money, and we are not going to drive him out of business—not one of these taxes is going to crush anyone, or cripple any business.

I said awhile ago that everybody in this country had protested or would protest against paying more taxes, but I was mistaken. There is a group that I never heard of before, that I never dreamed existed, for I did not believe that it was possible that there was any human being in America who wanted to pay taxes and more taxes than the law made him pay; but one day KEATING, of Colorado, came to me and said, "KITCHIN, will your subcommittee just hear half a dozen gentlemen for me?" I said that we were not having any hearings, and he said, "Now, you never heard anything like this before." I asked him what it was and he said, "I have some gentlemen down here whose incomes are $100,000 and over and they want to come before your committee and advocate a bill to tax them gradually just as you have up to $100,000, and then to tax 98 per cent of all over $100,000—make them give up all, because they take the position that during this war, when the life and honor of the Republic are at stake, no man ought to have an income of more than $100,000 a year." [Applause.] Well, I looked at KEATING, looked him right in the eye. I always knew that he had his own ideas about things [laughter] and I said to myself, "What's the matter with him?" Of course I could not believe it, and just to show you how a man's imagination will work I looked at him a second time and I imagined that I observed a very peculiar look in his eye. [Laughter.] But he assured me that they were all right and that he was all right. [Laughter.] He brought those gentlemen to the subcommittee and I looked at them. I had enough faith in what KEATING said to believe that possibly they might be sincere. They came before our committee, and KEATING rose and told what they were there for, what they were going to advocate. I was not satisfied even then. I said, "Gentlemen, I never saw you before, but I would like to know whether you have been examined by an alienist before you came in here." [Laughter.] I did not think that such men existed in this world.

Mr. Scripps, the great magazine and newspaper man, sent his son here to represent him, and I understand that his yearly income is something like $300,000 or more. He advocated a graduated tax up to $100,000 and the taking of all over $100,000. Several more with incomes of $100,000 and upward favored the same policy. I have received over 250 telegrams and letters from all portions of the United States advocating that proposition. I do not say that all of the 250 people who sent the telegrams and letters are people whose incomes are in excess of $100,000, but I have letters from many men whose incomes are largely in excess of $100,000 advocating that very proposition. I was and am convinced that they were absolutely sincere and in earnest. When they finished I could not help from saying, "Gentlemen, I am not going to let anybody be more patriotic and more self-sacrificing than I am, and I am going to be more self-sacrificing and more patriotic than you are, for I am going to make the proposition to give all of my income over $100,000 to the Government without a law to force me to do it." [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, the income-tax rates in this bill seem mighty high, mighty hard, but if every man who pays the income tax, every man who pays the excess-profits tax, every man who pays a dollar of tax under this bill feels that it is a hardship he ought also to understand that the boys and the mothers and fathers of the boys who are going to fight for their country are going to endure a thousand times more hardships. [Applause.] Everyone in this country will have to bear the severe burdens of war. Every patriot, rich and poor, should realize that he must make sacrifices. The high cost of food and fuel will bring distress and suffering to millions of our people. There are many long nights and days of sobs and sorrows ahead for the parents in this country. The men who must sustain the Government by taxes must understand that they must endure these hardships in dollars and cents while the others are enduring hardships in tears and stress and blood. [Applause.]

We will collect from the additional income tax proposed in this bill about $641,000,000. Included in this amount is what is called by some a retroactive income tax, which will yield about $108,000,000. But this is not a retroactive tax. Here is the only thing we do. The Government needs the money. We knew that 1916 was the most prosperous year in the history of the Government. The Government needed the money by September 15, and so we simply levied an additional tax equivalent to 33⅓ per cent of the tax due June 15, 1917, from the incomes received or accruing during the calendar year 1916, that extra tax to be paid on or before September 15, 1917. That is no more retroactive than the present law. The tax on incomes for the year 1916 was not due until June 15, 1917. We levy on the same income of individuals and corporations received in 1916 an amount equal to one-third of that tax in addition and have it paid by September 15, 1917, instead of by June 15, 1917. Let me illustrate: Suppose one's tax on his income received in the calendar year 1916, which is due June 15, 1917, is $75. All that we ask him to do in this so-called retroactive tax is to pay just one-third of that amount—that is, $25—in addition, and to pay it by September 15. If his income tax is $600, payable June 15, 1917, he would have to pay one-third of that amount additional—that is, $200—and pay it by September 15. That is not retroactive. The present law collects in each current year the tax on incomes received the preceding calendar year. That tax is paid out of incomes or money received during the current year and charged up to the current year's expense. When the income-tax law was passed, in October, 1913, it levied on the whole income of the year 1913, beginning March 1, 1913, when the income-tax amendment to the Constitution became effective. The present income-tax law was approved September 8, 1916. It increased the then existing rate of the normal tax from 1 to 2 per cent. It imposed this additional tax on the income for the whole year of 1916. It related back to January 1, 1916, though not passed until September 8, 1916.

So instead of increasing the normal tax 1 per cent over what is now proposed and let it remain and pay it next year and each year thereafter we assess an additional tax on incomes of 1916, payable September 15, 1917, of $108,000,000. That is not a hardship.

Gentlemen, do not get it into your heads that it is wrong or an injustice to add this one-third to the income tax due in June. It is easy to pay. It is easier to pay now than it will be in the future.

I will give you an illustration of the small fellow. Take a small fellow like me. I will pay nearly five times more income tax under this provision we report—and I favor it—than I will this year. I will pay more income tax under this bill we report than I pay in State taxes, county taxes, city taxes, school taxes, and road taxes combined, and I am willing to bear that burden. I am willing to pay still five times more than that without a kick or a protest whenever the Government needs it.

I think Great Britain started out with 3 per cent. Great Britain's normal income tax is 25 per cent. If we levied 25 per cent on our incomes on the exemption basis of this bill, we would raise $3,000,000,000 on incomes alone—nearly twice as much as we raise by the entire bill.

The present law imposes the following additional tax rates upon net incomes of individuals, and these are untouched by the bill now presented and remain as they now are:

One per cent additional on incomes over $20,000 and not exceeding $40,000.
Two per cent additional on incomes over $40,000 and not exceeding $60,000.
Three per cent addditional on incomes over $60,000 and not exceeding $80,000.
Four per cent additional on incomes over $80,000 and not exceeding $100,000.
Five per cent additional on incomes over $100,000 and not exceeding $150,000.
Six per cent additional on incomes over $150,000 and not exceeding $200,000.
Seven per cent additional on incomes over $200,000 and not exceeding $250,000.
Eight per cent additional on incomes over $250,000 and not exceeding $300,000.
Nine per cent additional on incomes over $300,000 and not exceeding $500,000.
Ten per cent additional on incomes over $500,000 and not exceeding $1,000,000.
Eleven per cent additional on incomes over $1,000,000 and not exceeding $1,500,000.
Twelve per cent additional on incomes over $1,500,000 and not exceeding $2,000,000.
Thirteen per cent additional on incomes over $2,000,000.

The proposed bill imposes the following additional tax rates—in addition to those now imposed by law just recited—upon net incomes of individuals:

One per cent additional on incomes over $5,000 and not exceeding $7,500.
Two per cent additional on incomes over $7,500 and not exceeding $10,000.
Three per cent additional on incomes over $10,000 and not exceeding $12,500.
Four per cent additional on incomes over $12,500 and not exceeding $15,000.
Five per cent additional on incomes over $15,000 and not exceeding $20,000.
Six per cent additional on incomes over $20,000 and not exceeding $40,000.
Eight per cent additional on incomes over $40,000 and not exceeding $60,000.
Eleven per cent additional on incomes over $60,000 and not exceeding $80,000.
Fourteen per cent additional on incomes over $80,000 and not exceeding $100,000.
Seventeen per cent additional on incomes over $100,000 and not exceeding $150,000.
Twenty per cent additional on incomes over $150,000 and not exceeding $200,000.
Twenty-four per cent additional on incomes over $200,000 and not exceeding $250,000.
Twenty-seven per cent additional on incomes over $250,000 and not exceeding $300,000.
Thirty per cent additional on incomes over $300,000 and not exceeding $500,000.
Thirty-three per cent additional on incomes over $500,000.

The following table shows the income tax that is now levied upon specified incomes and the income tax proposed in the pending revenue bill, together with the total tax that will be levied should the income-tax provisions become law in the form proposed in the pending revenue bill:

TITLE II.

This title relates to the additional tax on excess profits, called by the bill the war excess-profits tax.

Under existing law the tax is 8 per cent. An additional tax of 8 per cent is levied by this bill, making a total of 16 per cent. The deductions and exemptions now provided by law remain the same. The manner of computation, levy, assessment, and collection remain the same.

Under the present law agricultural partnerships are exempted. We amend that by including them.

While in my judgment no material change is made, if the language and spirit of the present act are rightly construed, we amend it, making more clear and specific the meaning of invested capital, and for the same reason also add a good-will provision, so that the invested capital section will read as follows:

SEC. 202. That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of property paid in other than cash, for stock or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment, and (3) paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business: Provided, That the good will, including trade-marks and trade brands, or the franchise of a corporation or partnership, is not to be included in the actual capital invested, unless the corporation or partnership made payment therefor specifically as such in cash or tangible property, the value of such good will, trade-marks, trade brands, or franchise, not to exceed the actual cash or actual value of the tangible property paid therefor at the time of such payment.

The good-will section makes sure that the Government is authorized, in administering the law, to squeeze the water out of overstocked corporations.

If the excess-profits tax provisions become law, the United States will then have the largest exemption and the lowest rate of any country that has an excess-profits tax law. Practically every country now at war has such a law. Great Britain, Canada, Italy, France, and Germany each collects a large portion of war taxes from this source.

The tax rate on excess profits in Great Britain has been 60 per cent—just a few days ago increased to 80 per cent. In France it is 50 per cent, and I understand in Germany it is about 40 per cent. In Italy it is graduated from 10 to 30 per cent. In Russia graduated from 20 to 40 per cent. In Canada, up to a few days ago, the rate on all profits in excess of 7 per cent as to corporations and of 10 per cent as to individuals, was 25 per cent. Within the last few days she has increased the rate as follows:

On profits in excess of 7 per cent, but not exceeding 15 per cent, 25 per cent; on profits between 15 per cent and 20 per cent, 50 per cent; and on profits in excess of 20 per cent the rate is 75 per cent.

In comparison with that of other countries our excess-profits tax is very light. Were we to have the same rate as that of Great Britain, it alone would produce $2,500,000,000, or $700,000,000 more than our entire bill yields. Or, if our rate were as high as that of Canada, we would raise as much by the excess-profits tax alone as we will by our entire bill.

From the excess-profits tax in the bill we will collect, in addition to the tax of existing law, at least $200,000,000.

TITLE III.

This title levies a war tax on beverages. This includes an additional tax on whisky, beer, and wines, and a tax on soft drinks. We put a tax of $1.10 a gallon on distilled spirits, in addition to the tax now imposed by law, making the total tax on such spirits double what it now is, and in addition to that 15 cents per gallon on rectified spirits. We put an additional tax of $1.25 per barrel on beer, making the total tax, under existing law and this bill, $2.75 per barrel.

We also levy on all wines an additional tax equivalent to the tax now imposed on wines; that is, the tax is doubled, except upon wines containing not more than 14 per cent of alcohol, on which the additional tax is made 2 cents per gallon, or one-half of the present tax of 4 cents per gallon.

To adjust the tax on soft drinks we had much difficulty. How to catch them equitably was the trouble. If we put the tax only on the bottled drinks, which was easy to administer, the fountains selling by the glass in competition with them would escape. We learned that more than 90 per cent of all soft drinks are carbonated; that is, require in the making carbonic-acid gas. Therefore to catch the bottlers and the soda fountains we decided to place the tax on carbonic-acid gas. We wished to collect a tax equal to about 2 cents per gallon on such drinks. We placed, therefore, a tax of 8 cents per pound on carbonic-acid gas, which will amount to a tax, estimated by the experts, of 2 cents per gallon on the finished drink product. In this way we catch the fountains as well as the bottlers. Personally I doubt if it will amount to that. This seems to be a heavy tax on the carbonic-acid gas producer, but he will charge the tax up to the bottlers and soda fountain users.

On prepared sirups and extracts, such as Coca-Cola, Pepsi-Cola, Cherry-Cola, and so forth, sold exclusively by the manufacturers or producers, we place a tax of 10 per cent of the price for which so sold.

On soft drinks, such as unfermented grape juice, artificial mineral waters, not carbonated, sold by the manufacturers or producers in bottles or other closed containers, and on all carbonated soft drinks produced and sold by the manufacturers of carbonic-acid gas, the bill places a tax of 2 cents per gallon. It also levies a tax of 1 cent per gallon on all natural mineral or table waters sold by the producer or bottler at over 10 cents per gallon.

Instead of collecting such tax on soft drinks by stamps the manufacturer or producer is required to make monthly statements or returns under oath to the Collector of Internal Revenue for the assessment of the tax.

We will collect additional taxes under this title of at least—

From distilled spirits	$100,000,000
From rectified spirits	7,500,000
From beer	37,500,000
From wines	6,000,000
Our experts estimate that from soft drinks we will collect	20,000,000
Making a total under this title of	171,000,000

While I am sure that we will collect from distilled spirits, beer, and wines the amount estimated, and perhaps more, I exceedingly doubt if we collect more than $10,000,000, if that much, on soft drinks.

TITLE IV.

This title provides for a war tax on cigars, tobacco, and manufactures thereof. The bill levies on chewing, smoking tobacco, cigarettes, and snuff a tax equal to the tax now imposed by law; that is, with the present law and this bill, the tax on such articles is doubled. Under existing law the tax is 8 cents per pound on chewing and smoking tobacco and snuff and $1.25 per thousand on cigarettes, weighing not more than three pounds, and practically all come within this class. As said, we place by this bill an additional tax of 8 cents per pound on chewing and smoking tobacco and snuff and of $1.25 per thousand on cigarettes.

On cigars the tax under existing law is a flat rate of $3 per thousand, regardless of grade or value.

In order that the tax might be fair and equitable to all in the industry, we graduate it in this bill according to the value of the cigar. The additional tax provided is as follows:

On cigars weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand, an additional tax of 25 cents per thousand.

On cigars weighing more than 3 pounds per thousand, if manufactured or imported to retail at not more than 4 cents each, 50 cents per thousand.

If manufactured or imported to retail at more than 4 cents and not more than 6 cents each, $1 per thousand.

If manufactured or imported to retail at more than 6 cents and not more than 10 cents each, $2 per thousand.

If manufactured or imported to retail at more than 10 cents and not more than 15 cents each, $4 per thousand.

If manufactured or imported to retail at more than 15 cents and not more than 20 cents each, $5 per thousand.

If manufactured or imported to retail at more than 20 cents and not more than 25 cents each, $7 per thousand.

If manufactured or imported to retail at more than 25 cents each, $10 per thousand.

We also place a tax on cigarette papers and tubes.

We will collect, according to the experts, from articles taxed under this title at least $68,200,000 additional, and, in my judgment, several millions more.

We will collect additional to collections under existing law—

From cigars	$11,000,000
From cigarettes	25,000,000
From chewing and smoking tobacco	30,000,000
From snuff	2,000,000
From cigarette papers and tubes	200,000
Total	68,200,000

Mr. HOWARD. Before you leave tobacco, may I ask you a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I have several inquiries from retailers in my district as to what the effect will be upon them.

Mr. KITCHIN. They will pay 50 per cent of this additional tax on all tobacco, cigars, cigarettes, chewing, and smoking tobacco on hand the day the act passes——

Mr. HOWARD. Pay one-half of this additional tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. One-half on all in excess of 1,000 pounds of manufactured tobacco and 20,000 cigars or 20,000 cigarettes.

Mr. HOWARD. The retailer?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

TITLE V.

This title levies a tax on transportation—freight, express, passenger—and pipe lines, seats and berths in sleeping and parlor cars and on vessels; also a tax on light, heat, and telephone service, telegraph and special telephone messages, advertising and insurance.

The committee had hoped that a reasonable tax on incomes, excess profits, inheritances, on luxuries, and semiluxuries would produce the needful revenue, but found that it would not. We regretted that the tax proposed in this title seemed necessary. But the amount of money required by the Government to be raised was so enormous we were compelled to resort to a tax on general consumption—on the necessities of the people in one form or another. We concluded that the levies provided in this title were wiser, more equitable, and less burdensome than any tax on the direct necessities of life, such as food, fuel, clothing, shoes, and so forth, or on household necessities.

These taxes are paid respectively by the passenger when he purchases his ticket, seat, or berth; by the person when he pays his freight, express, light, heat, and telephone bills; or when he sends the telegraph message or makes a long-distance call.

The tax is 10 per cent of the price of the passenger fare or ticket, 10 per cent on the price of a seat or berth in parlor and sleeping cars and on vessels, 10 per cent on express bills, 3 per cent on amount of freight bill, 5 per cent on amount of the bill for light, heat, or telephone service, 5 cents for each telegraph message and for each long-distance telephone message the charge for which is in excess of 15 cents, 5 per cent on amounts received for advertising other than in newspapers.

For instance, the price of a ticket from Washington to my home is $6.20. When I purchase it the railroad agent collects 10 per cent of that amount, or 62 cents, as a war tax for the Government. When I pay an express or freight bill or my bill for light or heat or telephone service the person collecting such bill collects this war tax on such bills for the Government. The insurance and advertising tax is paid, respectively, by the insurance company and the person or company making charges for advertising.

The person, corporation, partnership, or association receiving or collecting such tax is required to make monthly returns and settlements with the collector of internal revenue of the district in which is located the principal office or place of business.

It is estimated that the taxes proposed in this bill will yield during a 12-month period $222,250,000, distributed as follows:

Transportation:
Freight	$77,500,000
Express	15,000,000
Passenger	75,000,000
Pipe lines	4,500,000
Seats, berths, etc	750,000
Electric light, gas, domestic power, and telephone service	30,000,000
Telegraph and telephone messages	7,000,000
Advertising	7,500,000
Insurance	5,000,000

TITLE VI.

The tax prescribed under this title can, perhaps, properly be listed as a tax on luxuries and semiluxuries. The articles embraced are automobiles, motorcycles, tires for same; musical instruments, graphophones, phonographs, etc.; motion-picture films; jewelry; pleasure boats; athletic or sporting goods; perfumery and cosmetics; and chewing gum. While perhaps more of a necessity than a luxury, proprietary medicines are included. Though all interested in the manufacture or production of these articles protested that they were necessities of life, that a tax upon them would be disastrous to the industry, the committee was of the opinion that they were more or less luxuries, and that they should be taxed rather than the real necessities of life. We were of the opinion that the tax proposed would not cripple the business, that the manufacturer or producer, if he was unwilling to share any part of the tax, could easily charge it to or pass it on to the ultimate consumer or purchaser, and that the consumer or purchaser of such luxuries could pay and would be willing to pay it as a war tax to help out his country. The tax on moving-picture films which have not been exposed is one-half of 1 cent per linear foot and on positive films containing a picture ready for projection 1 cent per linear foot. On all the other articles in this title, the character of which I have mentioned, the bill levies a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which they are sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer.

Our experts estimate that the taxes prescribed in this title will yield for a 12-month period $118,750,000, distributed as follows:

Automobiles	$68,000,000
Automobile tires, etc	12,500,000
Musical instruments, etc	7,000,000
Motion-picture films	7,000,000
Jewelry	7,500,000
Pleasure boats	500,000
Athletic goods etc	2,000,000
Proprietary medicines	8,500,000
Perfumery and cosmetics	4,750,000
Chewing gum	1,000,000

I doubt if the automobile tax will yield as much as is estimated. My estimate would be between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000. We can not expect that the rapid yearly increase in the production and sale of automobiles which has marked the career of the industry for the last few years will continue during the war. There will be a spirit of economy among the people which, perhaps, will prevent such increase, as it will probably prevent the increase in the production and sale of articles of many other industries.

TITLE VII.

This title levies a tax equivalent to 1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof of the amount paid for admission to any place to which admission is charged, except that in the case of children under 12 years of age the tax imposed shall be 1 cent for each admission. It is provided, however, that this tax shall not be imposed in the case of a place the maximum charge for admission to which is 5 cents.

This tax is imposed upon all places to which admission is charged, such as motion-picture shows, theaters, circuses, entertainments, cabarets, ball games, athletic games, etc., but not upon admissions all the proceeds of which will go exclusively to the benefit of religious or charitable institutions or for agricultural purposes.

We also propose a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the dues paid to any social, athletic, or sporting club or organization be levied, to be paid by the person paying such dues.

It is estimated that the revenue during a 12-month period from admissions under this title will be $60,000,000 and from club dues $1,500,000.

TITLE VIII.

This title substantially reenacts the stamp taxes in Schedule A of the Spanish War act of 1898 and of the act of October 22, 1914. The principal subjects of taxation and the rates imposed upon the same by this title are as follows:

1. Bonds of indebtedness, 5 cents on each $100.
2. Bonds, indemnity and surety, 50 cents each, or 1 per cent of premium.
3. Capital stock, issued, 5 cents on each $100.
4. Capital stock, sales or transfers, 2 cents on each $100.
5. Produce, sales of, on exchange, 2 cents for each $100.
6. Promissory notes, including drafts or checks payable otherwise than at sight or on demand, 2 cents for each $100, or fraction thereof.
7. Conveyances, 50 cents for each $500, or fraction thereof.
8. Entry of goods at customhouse for consumption or warehousing, 25 cents to $1, according to value.
9. Entry for withdrawal of goods from customs bonded warehouse, 50 cents.
10. Passage ticket, $1 to $5, according to cost.
11. Proxies, 10 cents each.
12. Power of attorney, 25 cents each.
13. Playing cards, in addition to existing duty, 8 cents per pack.

It is estimated that the taxes provided in this title will yield during a 12-month period $33,000,000.

TITLE IX.

In this title we levy, in addition to the taxes now imposed upon the transfer of the net or taxable estate of every decedent, the following taxes:

One-half of 1 per cent of the amount of such net estate not in excess of $50,000.
One per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $150,000.
One and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $250,000.
Two per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $450,000.
Two and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $450,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000.
Three per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $1,000,000 and does not exceed $2,000,000.
Three and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $2,000,000 and does not exceed $3,000,000.
Four per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $3,000,000 and does not exceed $4,000,000.
Four and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $4,000,000 and does not exceed $5,000,000.
Five per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $5,000,000 and does not exceed $8,000,000.
Seven per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $8,000,000 and does not exceed $11,000,000.
Ten per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $11,000,000 and does not exceed $15,000,000.
Fifteen per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $15,000,000.

We propose that for the additional tax provided for in this title an exemption of $25,000 be allowed instead of $50,000, as under the present law, and that a tax of 1 per cent of the value of the net estate not in excess of $25,000 be imposed. This means that an additional tax of 1 per cent shall be levied upon the amount of the total estate in excess of $25,000 and not in excess of $50,000. Gentlemen must bear in mind that net estate means the gross estate after deducting all valid claims against the estate, including cost of administration and the exemptions allowed by the estate tax law.

It is estimated that during the first year this law is in operation these additional estate taxes will produce about $6,000,000. When the law is in full effect, it is estimated that the additional taxes imposed in this title will yield annually $38,500,000.

It is to be remembered that the proposed tax is in addition to the estate or inheritance tax under existing law, which is:

One and one-half per cent of the amount of such net estate not in excess of $50,000.
Three per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $150,000.
Four and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $250,000.
Six per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $450,000.
Seven and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $450,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000.
Nine per centum of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $1,000,000 and does not exceed $2,000,000.
Ten and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $2,000,000 and does not exceed $3,000,000.
Twelve per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $3,000,000 and does not exceed $4,000,000.
Thirteen and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $4,000,000 and does not exceed $5,000,000.
Fifteen per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $5,000,000.

TITLE X.

This title provides, from a good Democratic standpoint like mine, a tariff monstrosity. [Laughter.] I know my Republican friends are going to laugh, and my Democratic friends who have known me for 15 or 16 years are going to feel embarrassed and humiliated when I tell you, gentlemen, that in this bill that I am going to vote for, on which I put my name as the author, and on which we have prepared the report, we have what is in some few particulars the highest tariff ever written on the books. [Applause and laughter.] We have recommended the most unscientific and the most inequitable tariff provision in some particulars that was ever put on the books, and I am going to do like a lot of Republicans and like a lot of Democrats, I am going to shut my eyes and vote for it. [Laughter and applause.] The remainder of the bill as a war measure on the whole is so wise, so equitable, and so little burdensome I am willing to stand here or elsewhere and defend it in toto, in spite of this bad, repulsive, offensive tariff provision.

Everybody knows that I would prefer to raise the needed amount out of incomes and profits, but I can not always have my way, especially when 22 other members of a committee each has a way, too. I will tell you how it came about. There is no politics in it either, not a bit. We had worked on this bill for days and days and weeks, and it seemed that we could not get a bill, satisfactory to the committee, that would produce more than about a billion and five or six hundred million dollars. The committee had just raked the whole Republic everywhere with a fine-toothed comb to find something to tax, to raise $1,800,000,000 which the administration said they must have, and which I know they must have; and in my opinion we will have to have more before the next fiscal year expires. We could not get it. I had just about given up, and I said, "Boys, we have all resolved to report a bill that will raise the required amount—$1,800,000,000—but if you will not raise the additional amount by further increase of the income tax, I am willing to go back to the House with this billion and five or six hundred million dollars and say we could not do any better just now. That it will have to give us another trial." We thought about this thing and we thought about that. We thought about this tax and we thought about that, but we already had them all in the bill. It seemed that we had put a tax on everybody we could think of and had only squeezed out about $1,600,000,000. We just stalled there for two days, trying to think of some fellow whom we had not taxed in some way. [Laughter.] Finally it was suggested by some Republican or some Democrat, "Let's levy a flat tariff rate, and put about a 10 per cent horizontal raise on all articles, both free and dutiable. If we add 10 per cent on all articles, we can get at least $200,000,000 and make up the $1,800,000,000." He said, "We can defend it, not by any process of reasoning, not by any principles of scientific or equitable adjustment, but on the ground that we need $200,000,000 more, and we have to raise it, and this will get it." [Laughter.] And so it went in.

Now, I am going to tell you a secret. I know it is said to be bad ethics for one to tell anything that takes place in committee, but I am going to risk it. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], whom I have known well for 15 or 16 years as the rankest, the rarest, the most stand-pat, and the most bullheaded Republican protective-tariff advocate and devotee I have ever seen in my life [laughter], voted with me against it. [Applause.] What do you think of that? [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, in all seriousness, it seemed that we had gone our limit unless we should increase still further the income or profits tax, which some of us were willing to do, or unless we should put an excise tax on shoes, hats, meat, bread, and other such necessities of the people, which none of us were willing to do. So the committee said we will add that 10 per cent tariff tax. It will not crush anybody or any industry; it will not mean starving anybody; it will not mean freezing anybody. We will get the $200,000,000 needed for the boys who are going to the trenches to fight the battles of our country.

TITLE XII.

This title provides an increase in the postal rates of the first and second class mail matter. Let it at once be understood that the Ways and Means Committee did not assume or undertake to assume jurisdiction of the matter of postal rates until it conferred with the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and the committee, and also obtained their expressed consent to have the subject matter of this title considered in this bill.

As to the first-class mail matter, the bill provides:

That the rate of postage on all mail matter of the first class, except postal cards, shall hereafter be, in addition to the existing rate, 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof. Postal cards and private mailing or post cards, when complying with the requirements of existing law, shall be transmitted through the mails at 1 cent each, in addition to the existing rate.

In other words, letters now requiring 1 cent for mailing will under such provision require 2 cents, and letters now 2 cents will require 3 cents, and postal or post cards will require 2 cents instead of 1 cent.

The entire membership of the committee was most reluctant in making this increase of rates for the first-class mail. This class of mail already not only pays the cost of service but a large profit—over 200 per cent profit. Some of us felt that to supply the amount of revenue to be obtained from this source and from the proposed tax on transportation, light, heat, telegraph, and telephone service we ought, instead of such taxes and the increase in first-class postal rates, impose a larger tax on incomes and excess profits. Others of us were of the opinion that the rates in the income and excess-profits provisions of the bill were high enough for the first step in the war taxation. We knew that as the war continued, to secure the increasing amount of revenue required further increases in the income and excess-profits tax would, from time to time, have to be made.

This proposed increase, in the nature of a tax, will of itself be equitably distributed among all of the people and be equally borne by them. Every class and condition will thus make contribution to the war fund. It will be collected daily and without appreciable cost to the Government. It will yield $70,000,000 additional revenue.

As to the second-class mail, in lieu of the 1 cent per pound flat rate on this class, consisting of newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals, regardless of distance hauled or cost of the service, the bill by this title provides:

SEC. 1201. That on and after June 1, 1917, the zone system applicable to parcel post shall apply to mail matter of the second class, and the rates of postage shall be as follows: Two cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the first or second zone, 3 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the third zone, 4 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for the delivery within the fourth or fifth zone, 5 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the sixth or seventh zone, 6 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the eighth zone.

The existing law and rates as to daily newspapers when deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers and as to free circulation within the county of publication we leave unchanged.

With respect to newspapers and periodicals maintained by and in the interest of religious, educational, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations, not organized or run for profit, we provide for a flat rate of 1½ cents a pound or fraction thereof, instead of 1 cent as now, in language as follows:

That in the case of newspapers and periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class matter and maintained by and in the interests of religious, educational, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations, not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, the second-class postage rate shall be 1½ cents a pound or fraction thereof, irrespective of the zone in which delivered, except when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, in which case the rate shall be the same as now provided by law.

Before discussing this provision relating to second-class mail matter let me say that while, as I remarked a moment ago, the committee was reluctant and hesitated to increase the rate on the first-class mail matter, as it is already paying a considerable profit over its cost, there was no hesitancy, no reluctance, no doubt as to the propriety and the right to materially increase the rate on the second-class mail matter. Every member of the committee, without exception, was of the undoubting opinion that justice to the people and to the Government demanded a change in the law whereby the Government should be saved a part, at least, of the great loss the publishers of the country annually caused it to sustain in handling, hauling, and distributing their newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals, and that a decided step should be taken at this session toward a policy that will finally require the small class of our people who are publishers to pay, as every other class is now compelled to pay with respect to their products, at least the actual cost to the Government of handling, hauling, and delivering through the mails their product—their papers and magazines. [Applause.]

While the proposed increase in the rates on the first class is for the purpose of and in the nature of a tax, the provision increasing the rates on the second-class mail matter is proposed not in the nature of a tax, though the Government needs every dollar of the increase, but for the purpose of remedying an evil that is so palpable and has grown so great—and yearly increasing in magnitude—that the conscience, the sense of right, the manhood of Congress ought not to permit it to exist longer. [Applause.] We propose for this provision to continue after the war terminates.

This provision establishes for the second-class mail matter a zone system, the zones being the same as for the parcel post, and graduates the charges for handling and transporting according to the zones. In other words, the rates for the transportation and delivery of the finished product of the publishers are fixed according or in proportion to the distance carried, though the rates charged by such provisions still are considerably less than the cost to the Government for such service, less than one-third of the cost. I will say in passing that every member of the committee except one—and he was in favor of a flat rate of 2 cents a pound, doubling the present rate—after much investigation, favored the zone system as the wisest method of equitable adjustment of rates.

Every manufacturer, every producer or dealer or shipper, every class of people or industry, except the publishers of newspapers and other periodicals, are made to pay for the transportation of their products, whether through the mails or freight or express, according to the distance hauled and service rendered, the longer the haul, the greater the service, the more they are made to pay. The rates for telegraph and telephone messages are paid according to distance sent.

No class of people or industry except the publishers has a flat rate for their product, regardless of distance or cost. But the publishers, with power through their press to commend and flatter Members of Congress who vote as they will and dictate and to criticize and condemn those who do not, years ago forced Congress to grant them by law the special favor and right of having the Government transport, handle, and distribute their products—their papers and magazines—at a flat rate, regardless of distance, and scandalously below the cost to the Govern, and practically without cost to them. They by this shameless species of favoritism pay the Government no more to send a pound of their product 4,000 miles than 10 miles, though the Government is made to pay more than fifteen times as much for hauling that same pound. They pay to the Government no more to send a pound of their product—of their papers or magazines—from Washington to San Francisco, a distance of over 3,000 miles, than to Alexandria, a distance of 8 miles, though the Government is made to pay more than fifteen times as much. They pay the Government 1 cent per pound for carrying it from Washington to San Francisco, while the Government pays 15 cents to have it carried for them.

The railroads and other carriers make the Government pay—and properly so—for carrying newspapers and magazines according to the distance hauled, which averages more than 4 cents per pound, while the publishers make the Government not only transport but handle and distribute to their customers the same newspapers and magazines at a flat rate of 1 cent per pound, regardless of distance hauled or cost to the Government for the hauling and distribution. By such a law now on the statute books the publishers pay to the Government less than one-fourth of the actual cost to the Government of transportation, including handling in transit. Adding to this the further cost to the Government of handling and distributing, including the post-office expenses and overhead charges, the publishers pay to the Government less than one-eighth of the cost of such transportation and delivery, and the taxpayers are made to pay for the publishers and their patrons the balance of the cost, more than seven-eighths. Every other commodity sent through the mails, including letters, cards, schoolbooks, books of all kinds, Bibles, food, wearing apparel, and so forth—all equaly as essential to the people as papers and magazines—are made to pay the cost of transportation and delivery, including overhead charges. In fact, there is a profit in all the four classes of mail matter, except the second-class mail matter, and on that there is an enormous loss.

Mr. Chairman, I beg the close attention of every Member of this House to an astounding statement of facts which I shall now make. Last fiscal year the Government hauled, handled, and distributed 1,202,470,676 pounds of newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals. To do this it cost the Government, including their share of the general post-office expenses and overhead charges, in round numbers, $100,500,000. For this service rendered the publishers paid to the Government the pitiful sum of $11,383,000. The Government thereby incurred a loss in round numbers of $89,000,000.

Such a statement no doubt startles the minds and shocks the conscience of the House and the country, but, nevertheless, it is a statement of plain and proven facts. Every dollar of that $89,000,000 loss to the Government and to the taxpayers of the country is a clear subsidy to the publishers—a clear, legalized robbery by them of the people of $89,000,000. Any law that authorizes or sanctions this tremendous and yearly increasing loss to the Government and this enormous and yearly increasing subsidy to one class of our people at the expense of every other class can not be justified and ought not to be longer tolerated. [Applause.] Every day such a law remains it discredits the manhood of Congress, it impeaches the integrity of the Nation's statute books. [Applause.]

I wish now to reassure the House and country in the truth of the statement I made a moment ago as to the enormous loss the Government was yearly incurring in the transportation and distributing second-class mail matter.

Officials and experts of the Post Office Department who have had from 10 to 20 years' experience in postal matters and who for years have made special investigations and study of the cost of transporting, handling, and distributing second-class mail testified before our committee, producing documents and data to sustain their testimony:

First. That the last fiscal year, in round numbers, it cost the Government to transport, handle, and distribute newspapers, daily and weekly, magazines and other periodicals, $100,500,000. This includes its proportionate part of post-office expenses and overhead charges.

Second. That it received for such service only $11,383,530, incurring a net loss of $89,000,000.

Third. That it cost the Government for transportation alone of second-class mail matter, 1 cent per pound for each 200 miles.

Fourth. That the average cost of transportation, including handling during transportation, of newspapers, magazines, and periodicals was 5 cents per pound.

Fifth. That in addition to the cost of transporting and handling in transit, it cost the Government to handle and distribute newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals, 4 cents per pound, including their proportionate part of the post-office expenses common to other classes of mail and overhead charges.

Sixth. That last fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, the Government hauled and handled and distributed for the publishers of the country 1,202,470,676 pounds of second-class matter, 64,117,146 pounds of which was "free-in-the-country" newspapers and periodicals, at a cost of, in round numbers, $100,500,000, receiving therefor only $11,383,530, sustaining a clear loss of $89,000,000.

The Hughes Commission—appointed in 1911 by President Taft, under authority of a resolution of Congress, to investigate the cost of transporting and delivering second-class mail matter and the loss to the Government, and so forth, composed of Hon. Charles E. Hughes, then Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court; Dr. A. Lawrence Lowell, president of Harvard College; and Mr. Harry A. White, then president of the Association of Commerce, of Chicago, Ill.—after a most exhaustive investigation and hearings, at which on the one side testimony and argument of the publishers and their attorneys, and on the other testimony of the officials and experts of the Post Office Department were submitted, found, and reported:

First. That—exclusive of the post-office expenses and overhead charges in handling and distributing—it cost the Government to transport and handle during transportation "the paid-at-the-pound-rate mail approximately 6 cents per pound."

Second. That "when the method recently introduced" of hauling certain periodicals by freight is fully effected, the cost will probably be reduced so that it "will be slightly in excess of 5 cents a pound."

The commission further reported that to obtain the total cost of transporting and handling the second-class mail matter "it would be necessary to add to the ascertained cost for the services above mentioned the shares of such class in the general post-office expenses and miscellaneous outlays not directly assignable," but that it was without adequate data to ascertain this, so did not undertake it.

I am now going to give to the House some astounding instances of this system of subsidy to and favoritism of one class of our people at the expense of every other class.

I shall take Collier's Weekly, the Saturday Evening Post, the Ladies' Home Journal, and the Country Gentleman as illustrative of their respective class of periodicals, and the New York Times as illustrative of the big city daily newspapers.

Last fiscal year the Government carried and distributed through the mails 18,954,840 pounds of Collier's Weekly at a cost for transportation alone of $947,742, and for handling and distributing of $758,194. The total cost to the Government, to the taxpayers, was $1,705,936. Under the present iniquitous law the publishers of Collier's Weekly were required to pay the Government for this service only $189,548, leaving the Government a clear loss of $1,516,388 and the publishers of Collier's Weekly a clear subsidy out of the pockets of the people of $1,516,388.

The Saturday Evening Post, the Ladies' Home Journal, and the Country Gentleman, a farm journal, are owned and published by the Curtis Publishing Co., of Philadelphia. The favoritism and subsidy granted under existing law to this millionaired publishing company are so startlingly enormous as to be almost impossible of belief.

Last fiscal year the Government carried and distributed for this company through the mails 38,355,670 pounds of the Saturday Evening Post at a cost for transportation alone of $1,916,783, and for handling and distributing of $1,533,427. The total cost to the Government, to the taxpayers, was $3,450,210. Under the present law the Government received for this great service rendered this company the sum of only $383,356, the Government sustaining a clear loss of $3,066,854 and the Curtis Publishing Co. receiving from the taxpayers a clear subsidy of $3,066,854.

The Government paid out for transportation service alone $1,533,427 more than it received from the company for the entire service of hauling, handling, and distributing the Saturday Evening Post.

Last fiscal year the Government carried and distributed through the mails for the same company 15,944,895 pounds of the Ladies' Home Journal at a cost for transportation of $797,244 and for handling and distributing of $637,795. The total cost to the Government was $1,435,039, and the company was required to pay back to the Government for this service only $159,448, leaving the Government a clear loss of $1,275,591, and again a clear subsidy to the Curtis Publishing Co. of $1,275,591.

The Government paid out for transportation service alone $637,795 more than it received from the company for the entire service of carrying, handling, and distributing this periodical.

Last fiscal year the Government carried and distributed through the mails for this same company 5,009,500 pounds of the Country Gentleman at a total cost of $450,855, for which it received from the company only $50,095. The Government sustained a clear loss of $400,760 and the Curtis Publishing Co. again received a clear subsidy of $400,760.

The total cost to the Government of hauling, handling, and distributing for the Curtis Publishing Co. through the mails these three periodicals last fiscal year was $5,336,104. Under the present law this company was required to pay for this large service only $592,899, leaving the Government a loss of $4,743,205 and giving the Curtis Publishing Co. from the pockets of the taxpayers a subsidy of $4,743,205. The amount the Government paid for transportation alone was five times the amount it received for the entire service of hauling, handling, and distributing.

For these three journals and Collier's Weekly, to be absolutely safe within the proper figures, calculations were made on an average haul of 1,000 miles at 5 cents per pound. The fact, however, is that the average haul of Collier's Weekly, the Saturday Evening Post, and the Ladies' Home Journal is about 1,200 miles at a cost of 6 cents per pound.

Now, take the case of a big city daily like the New York Times. Last fiscal year the Government carried and distributed through the mails 10,023,200 pounds of this daily at a cost for transportation (average haul 300 miles) of $150,348 and for handling and distributing of $400,928.

The total cost to the Government for the service rendered was $551,276, for which it received only $100,232, making a clear loss to the Government of $451,044 and giving a clear subsidy to the publishers of the Times of $451,044.

Under the present law of 1 cent a pound flat rate, regardless of distance or service rendered, the Government pays for the publishers the total cost of transportation service, which averages at least 4½ cents a pound, and three-fourths of the additional cost of handling and distributing, and the 1 cent a pound the publishers pay to the Government pays only the other one-fourth.

Gentlemen, it is up to Congress, up to us in the House—Shall this injustice to the Government, shall this iniquity and outrage upon the people be continued longer on the statute books by their Representatives in Congress? [Applause.]

Let me again advert to the question of establishment of the zone system for second-class mail matter. Mr. Hitchcock, Postmaster General under Mr. Taft, in his report December 1, 1909, gave the results of the investigation of his department as to the length of hauls of second-class mail matter as follows:

> Magazines and other periodicals, exclusive of daily newspapers, comprise about 60 per cent of the second-class mail. The magazines alone form about 20 per cent, while the average haul of magazines proper is over 1,000 miles, and that of the other classes of mail, not including daily newspapers, ranges from 550 to over 1,100 miles. The haul of daily newspapers, which comprise about 40 per cent of the second-class mail, averages less than 300 miles.

He further declared:

> The cost of transportation by rail and other means forms slightly more than a third of the total expense of handling second-class mail.
> Magazines proper, because of the average long haul, show a cost of more than 5 cents a pound for transportation, while in the case of daily newspapers, for which the average haul is much less, the transportation cost is less than 2 cents per pound.

It must be understood that Mr. Hitchcock did not include in this statement the cost of handling and distributing, but only the cost of transportation.

The department now estimates, after a most critical investigation—

1. That the average length of haul of all second-class mail is 650 miles.

2. That the average haul of daily newspapers is 255 miles; of big dailies of wide circulation, like the New York Tribune, New York Times, Chicago Tribune, the average haul would be 300 miles or more; of trade journals, 707 miles; of magazines proper, 920 miles; and of such widely distributed periodicals like the Saturday Evening Post, Ladies' Home Journal, and Collier's Weekly, the average haul is about 1,200 miles.

It cost the Government for the transportation alone of Collier's Weekly or Saturday Evening Post for its average haul of 1,200 miles of its total mailed edition 6 cents per pound, and for the transportation of the New York World or the New York Tribune, for its average haul of 300 miles of its total mailed edition, 1½ cents. Yet under the present flat-rate law each pays the Government only 1 cent per pound for transportation and all other cost. It must not be forgotten that in addition to the transportation cost, of which I am now speaking, it cost the Government 4 cents per pound for handling and distributing these newspapers, magazines, or periodicals.

Why should the Government by any law or system be made to lose with respect to transportation on Saturday Evening Post or Collier's Weekly four times more per pound than on the World or Tribune? Or why should the World or Tribune, in proportion to distance hauled and loss to the Government, be made to pay for the same service four times as much as Collier's Weekly or the Saturday Evening Post?

What justice, what fairness is there in permitting the publisher of Collier's Weekly to pay the same rate as the publishers of the New York World, or in compelling the publishers of the World to pay the same rate as the publishers of Collier's Weekly, when Collier's receives four times more of transportation service and costs the Government four times more than does the World?

If 1 cent per pound is a proper rate to charge the World for its average haul of 300 miles, then 1 cent is four times too little to charge Collier's for its average haul of 1,200 miles. If 1 cent is a proper rate for Collier's for the haul of 1,200 miles, then 1 cent for the World for its haul of 300 miles is four times too much.

The flat-rate system makes the little State or local papers, daily or weekly, pay exactly the same to send a pound through the mail to a subscriber 50 or 25 miles distant, at a transportation cost to the Government of one-fourth of a cent or less, as the Saturday Evening Post to send a pound to the subscriber in San Francisco, 3,000 miles distant, though at a cost to the Government of 15 cents, and a loss under existing law of 14 cents.

The only fair and right thing to do is, if they pay at all, to require all newspapers, magazines, and periodicals alike to pay in proportion to the distance carried and the cost to the Government of the service rendered.

The zone system is the best remedy to right this injustice and inequity.

The committee was convinced that this law operated as an injustice and an outrage upon the Government and the people and ought to be repealed at the first possible moment. [Applause.]

It was further convinced that the only right postal policy for the Government to adopt is to require every piece or class of mail handled to pay its own cost and prevent any loss to the Government. [Applause.]

We propose by this bill to take the first step toward such a policy. It may seem only a short step. By the increase of rates provided in the bill the Government will receive from the publishers about $20,000,000 annually, in addition to the amount now being paid; that is, the publishers will pay, on the basis of the same service, annually about $31,000,000 instead of the $11,383,000 they paid last year. This still leaves the Government an annual loss of about $70,000,000 and the publishers an annual subsidy of $70,000,000. Many insisted that the rates at once be made high enough to cover the entire annual cost and prevent any loss to the Government and any subsidy to the publishers. This is exactly what should finally be done, and this bill is the first decided step toward the consummation of that desired and just end. But a majority of the committee believe that, since many papers and magazines had been in good faith built up under the existing law, to suddenly increase the rate sufficient to cover the entire cost or loss to the Government would seriously cripple, if not destroy, many of them, and deemed it only just that we should go to the policy of "payment of cost for service rendered and no loss to the Government" gradually. And, another reason: We felt that this was as high an increase as the nerve of Members of the House and the Senate could be screwed up to stand for, in face of the assaults of the press upon those who should vote to make the publishers release to the Government at least a part of their annual subsidy.

I remind gentlemen that the committee does not bring this matter before the House and the country as a new question or proposition. For more than a quarter of a century officials of the Post Office Department have called the attention of Congress to the loss which the Government is yearly sustaining on account of the second-class mail matter under the existing law.

Postmasters General in every administration since 1892—Mr. Wilson and Mr. Bissell under Mr. Cleveland, Mr. Smith and Mr. Gary under Mr. McKinley, Mr. Payne and Mr. Meyer under Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Hitchcock under Mr. Taft, and now Mr. Burleson under Mr. Wilson—have directed attention in their annual reports to this yearly increasing loss. Reports of committees of this House, reports of commissions authorized by Congress, have time and time again done the same and urged the repeal or change of the postal laws.

Mr. Payne, Postmaster General under Mr. Roosevelt, urged an increase in the rate on magazines to 4 cents a pound; Mr. Hitchcock, Postmaster General under Mr. Taft, and Mr. Taft year after year urged Congress to increase the rate on newspapers and magazines, so that the ever-increasing loss to the Government might be reduced. Both President Taft and Mr. Hitchcock urged as a "step toward the proper adjustment of postal charges" an increase of the rates on newspapers and magazines and other periodicals from 1 cent, the present rate, to 2 cents a pound.

Mr. Taft, in his special message of February 22, 1912, urging an increase to 2 cents a pound, said:

> The findings of the commission confirmed the view that the cost of handling and transporting second-class mail matter is greatly in excess of the postage paid, and that an increase in the rate is not only justified by the facts but is desirable.
>
> * * * * * * *
> There is no warrant for the great disparity between existing postage rates on periodicals and the cost of the service the Government performs for them.

And further:

> It is not just that some classes of mail should be exorbitantly taxed to meet a deficiency caused by other classes, the revenue from which is much below their cost of handling and carriage. * * * While the second-class mail matter embraces over 65 per cent of the entire weight of all the mail carried, it nevertheless yields little more than 5 per cent of the postal revenues.

The Hughes Commission, to which I have before referred, after most careful investigations and hearings, in 1911 recommended, as a step in the right direction, doubling the rate on the second-class mail matter, an increase of from 1 to 2 cents per pound. In its report it said:

> The question of raising the rate on second-class mail matter mailed by the publishers and news agents from 1 to 2 cents a pound is a more serious one. But we are of the opinion that the change is reasonable and should be made. To deny such a moderate increase is virtually to say that the present rate, despite the heavy loss it entails, must be deemed satisfactory or, if not that, it is wholly impracticable to attempt any change in it. We regard either conclusion as without foundation.
> Such an increase will not, in the opinion of the commission, bring distress upon the publishers of newspapers and periodicals or seriously interfere with the dissemination of useful news or information. A reasonable time should be allowed after the rate is fixed before it is put into effect. While the new rate will be very far from compensating the Government for the carriage and handling of second-class matter, it will to some extent relieve the existing burden and result in a more equitable adjustment of rates.

Since Mr. Taft's message, from which I quoted, and the report of the Hughes Commission the annual loss to the Government on handling and carrying newspapers and magazines through the mails has increased over $15,000,000 and is still increasing every year.

Away back in the Fifty-fourth Congress, 20 years ago, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in an elaborate report on the second-class mail matter and its rates, denounced the present law as a robbery of all the people for the benefit of the publishers—the special few. It declared:

> Your committee do not think they draw it too strongly when they say that the masses have been deliberately robbed to foster, protect, and encourage one limited business interest of the country at the expense of the many.

In speaking of the big profit the Government makes on the first-class mail matter and the burden it imposes for the benefit of giving cheap, below-cost rates to the newspapers and magazines it says:

> Sixty millions of people have long been taxed from thirty to forty million dollars a year more than it costs to transmit their mail matter in order that a very small privileged class, embracing but a few thousand, might be indulged in the luxury of pursuing a legitimate and in most cases a very profitable business.

At that time the Government was losing only $30,000,00 a year on second-class mail matter; now it is losing $89,000,000.

The present administration, through its Postmaster General, has each year directed the attention of Congress to the tremendous loss the Government is annually sustaining because of the present low rate on newspapers and magazines, and has persistently urged a material increase in the rate at once as a step toward the policy of making every class of mail pay the actual cost of the service rendered to it. The Postmaster General has also urged the adoption of the zone system as the best and wisest method of an equitable adjustment of rates.

Having explained the bill somewhat in detail and given the reasons for its provisions, I will be glad now to attempt to answer any questions gentlemen may wish to propound.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will yield I would like to ask a question as to the first-class mail. By increasing the postage on first-class mail is not there great danger of the number of letters being so reduced while the overhead charges of the Post Office Department remain the same that there is danger of our getting less revenue than the gentleman figures from that source?

Mr. KITCHIN. We figured that there would be between 10 and 12½ per cent reduction in first-class matter, but this $70,000,000 is net. I doubt very much if there will be a reduction.

I have a letter from Mr. Koons, the First Assistant Postmaster General, inclosing to me an excerpt from a letter which the Deputy Postmaster General of Canada wrote with respect to this very matter to which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] has reference. I will read you the excerpt:

> * * * In April, 1915, a war tax of 1 cent on each letter and post card mailed in Canada * * * was imposed by Parliament. The financial result of the tax, as nearly as can be ascertained, was to increase the revenue by about 40 per cent, which was the amount estimated when the tax was imposed. There has been no apparent increase or decrease in the volume of mail in consequence of this extra war tax.

I presume we will have about the same result here.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I wish to say to the gentleman that I have just been talking to the treasurer of the Outlook. He is in my district. I have been getting letters, and other Members have been getting them, from time to time complaining that this zone-tax system will put many valuable and important American periodicals out of business. The contention is that the Outlook will be put out of the way. It makes this contention, and I want to know what the chairman of the committee has to say about it. The increase in the case of the Outlook is 270 per cent.

I was assured a few minutes ago that the increase amounted to $50,000, which would be 10 per cent of the capital invested in the Outlook; that is, $500,000. That would put it practically out of business. Now, the question I wanted to ask was this—but I will ask, first, why it was that representatives of these periodicals were not permitted to be heard by the committee?

Mr. KITCHIN. We had no general public hearings, I will say to the gentleman, but we gave representatives of the Literary Digest, Curtis Publishing Co., and several others a hearing before three or four of the committee, and we saw their viewpoint. Their case was presented to the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I believe this statement is probably correct, that the Outlook could not stand this additional taxation.

Mr. KITCHIN. If we had had general public hearings we could not have finished them in six months, considering the amount of money we have to raise and the various interests touched by the bill, all of which would have required months to make their protests and arguments against paying any tax.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Does not the gentleman believe that a great many important and valuable magazines and periodicals will be put out of business by this item?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have looked into the matter, perhaps, much more than the Outlook man has. This increase in rates will not put his magazine or any other magazine out of business, and the publishers know it. The other newspapers and magazines and periodicals make exactly the same complaint and protests. It is that if the rates are raised at all they will be bankrupted and absolutely forced out of business. Every one of them makes the same complaint and prophecy, and everyone knows the complaint and prophecy are not true.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. There is a difference between a brand of automobiles going out of business and a brand of periodicals going out of business. The general proposition will be admitted that the circulation of good literature is absolutely essential to the life of a free people.

Mr. KITCHIN. Flour, meat, shoes, and so forth, are essential to the life of a free people, too. Why should not the Government carry these necessities to the people practically free, as it does the publishers' products?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Flour is not as essential as good literature. [Laughter.] Many of these publications will be driven out of business. Does not the gentleman admit that?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I do not admit that. Some of them say so. Let me have a copy of the Outlook, and I will give the gentleman some information about it. That is not a full copy. That is not the Outlook.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. That is submitted by one of the authorities of the Outlook.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have seen thousands of such "broadsides" as that contained in this circular. There is one thing we failed to put a tax on, and that was broadsides. [Laughter.] If we only had a tax on them we would get a lot of money. [Laughter.] If the gentleman has a copy of the Outlook, I would like to illustrate. How much does the Outlook pay the Government?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I think it is stated about midway down in that circular.

Mr. KITCHIN. In dollars and cents?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I think I can find it for you if you will let me look at it. That is a magazine that now pays one-twelfth of the cost of its postage transportation. Under the proposed law it would pay almost one-third.

Mr. KITCHIN. What is the total amount that it pays?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. It says one-third.

Mr. KITCHEN. The gentleman does not know much about the Outlook, but I do. Let me tell the gentleman some things about the Outlook that the gentleman perhaps does not know. For every dollar the publisher of the Outlook pays to the United States Government for transporting and handling and distributing it it costs the United States Government $8, and I do not believe it is right or fair or just or honest for all the people of the United States to be taxed, as they have been, to pay a subsidy of over $140,000 to a magazine like the Outlook. [Applause.] The facts are: Last fiscal year the Government hauled, handled, and distributed 1,898,812 pounds of the Outlook. It cost the Government $161,000. It received from the publishers of the Outlook only $19,000. The Government paid for transportation alone over $80,000. Ought not the publishers of the Outlook be made to pay more for this expensive service?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. There are many others besides the Outlook. The same contention is made by many of the magazines.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the Government is losing by the other magazines just as it does on the Outlook. I am sure the gentleman did not look into it carefully. I have had newspaper men and magazine men come here protesting who did not know the facts, and when the situation was explained to them and they ascertained the facts they said: "We can not criticize the committee for this. We did not know the facts."

Let me say that some of these magazine gentlemen who have talked with me have not been as candid as they ought to be, and I am sure that the Outlook might have been more candid in that circular there. It speaks of its subscription. It withholds information as to its big receipts from its advertisers. One of the highest-class publishing houses in this country sent one of its officials down here to talk with me. I did not have time just then to confer with him, but they wrote me a letter and I saw him a few minutes after I got the letter. They said in the letter that this increased postage would absolutely ruin them; that the receipts from subscriptions to this weekly were $1,660,000; and they said, "This rate in the seventh and eighth zones would be more than we would get for a single copy of it." They said the increase in postage would make them pay nearly a million dollars more than they now pay, and it would require nearly the receipts from subscriptions. They could not stand it. They would be ruined. This sounded bad—mighty hard on them. He told the truth when he said the subscriptions were about $1,660,000, and that this increase would be as much or more on some of the zones than he received from some of his subscribers, but he forgot to tell me and to write me that they received from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 a year from advertising which this Government was sending through the mails at a loss of $8 for every $1 received. [Applause.] That is the subsidy we are giving second-class mail matter. In fact, we are subsidizing that periodical and the other papers issued by that concern, to which I have before referred, to the amount of over four and a half million dollars a year—taking that much out of the people for its benefit. We get back from that concern less than $600,000, while it costs the Government over $5,000,000 to deliver its papers to its patrons. Yet at our proposed rate the Government is still going to lose four or five dollars in handling its products for it to every one that we get back from it.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. One of the publishers told me that there were about 25,000 periodicals and magazines published in the United States, and he made the astounding statement that that was approximately one-half of all the periodicals published on the earth. We are a reading people. If it is conceded that a great many of these magazines can pay this tax, let them do it. Perhaps a large majority of them can do it. But what are we to say if a respectable minority are to be put out of business by this tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, do not let them intimidate you in that way. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. They say they wished to present these facts to you, and you refused them the opportunity.

Mr. KITCHIN. They talked to me a dozen times and repeated every time the statements they made to the gentleman. They did not tell him or me all the facts—all the truth. Many of them were as badly informed as the gentleman is. I have talked with but one magazine or periodical publisher whose business I thought would be so handicapped that he would not make a reasonable profit, even at these rates, and he said that if we would make this increase gradual, putting on a quarter of it the first quarter, and half the next quarter, and so on, then he could so adjust his business that he could prepare his subscribers and advertisers to pay a little more, and he would lose a part, and in that way he and his customers together would absorb the tax.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Does not the gentleman know that each year very many valuable magazines and periodicals cease to circulate, because even under present rates they can not pay?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is not because of the small amount they pay for postage. It is because of bad management. Maybe the material in the paper does not appeal to the public, and the advertisers will not advertise with them. I know that some manufacturers and bankers, merchants and contractors, and farmers and lawyers fail every year, while others in the same business, profession, or occupation succeed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How much does it cost the Government per pound to handle second-class mail matter?

Mr. KITCHIN. Four cents a pound. This does not include transportation cost, which is between 5 and 6 cents alone, including handling in transit.

Mr. RAINEY. According to the Hughes report it costs 6 cents.

Mr. KITCHIN. Five and one-half cents and six cents.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That included railway charges as well as handling.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Hughes Commission did not report on the cost of handling and distributing other than the transportation cost and handling in transit. They found that the cost of transporting and handling in transit was between 5½ and 6 cents per pound. They have a more scientific way now of determining exactly what it does cost. Mr. Koons, the First Assistant Postmaster General, came before our subcommittee at our invitation, not his, and gave us information that would justify the subcommittee in reporting 2 cents a pound instead of 1 cent for the first zone, 3 cents for the second and third, 4 cents for the fourth and fifth zones, 5 cents for the sixth and seventh zones, and 6 cents for the eighth zone. When we got to the full committee several gentlemen thought that those rates ought to be changed.

Some thought they ought to be higher, and make the publishers pay more in proportion to the cost than that and to get more revenue from them. Some wanted, in the first and second zones, to have it 1½ cents, just increasing the amount 50 per cent for the two zones. Mr. Koons, as I have before shown, testified before us that the second-class mail matter costs the Government about $100,500,000, and that we get $11,383,000 out of it. When he was first before us, not having the detailed data with him, he estimated that the overhead charges, including post-office expenses on newspapers and magazines, would be about 2 cents per pound, and that transportation charges amounted to 1 cent for every 200 miles hauled; that is, for the first zone, a quarter of a cent; for the second zone, half a cent; and 200 miles, a cent. Some gentlemen on the committee questioned his estimate as to the overhead charges for newspapers and magazines, and thought those figures were rather low. Some of us thought the overhead charges were between 3 and 5 cents. Two days afterwards he wrote this letter:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, May 7, 1917.

Mr. JOHN E. WALKER,
Clerk Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. WALKER: Since appearing before your committee I have gone carefully over the statistics on the cost of handling second-class mail matter, and find that our estimate on Saturday of 2 cents per pound for all overhead charges was not sufficient. I am inclosing herewith a pamphlet giving statistics compiled in 1908 showing the costs of handling second-class matter, and your attention is directed to the table on page 65. It was estimated that the cost of handling all second-class matter at that time was 8.333 cents per pound. By deducting the cost of transportation this would be reduced to about 5 cents per pound. It is also estimated that because of the increased volume of mail and the more economical method of handling it that the overhead charges have been reduced 20 per cent since those statistics were compiled, which would reduce the overhead charges to 4 cents per pound. It will be noted from this table that at the time these statistics were compiled the second-class averaged 4.80 pieces per pound, but because of the increase in the size of papers since that date it is believed that now they will not average more than four to the pound, which would make the overhead charges 1 cent per copy or 4 cents per pound. This does not include the cost of transportation, which is 1 cent per pound for each 200 miles transported.

If there is any additional information which I can furnish you, I will be glad to do so.

Sincerely, yours,
J. C. KOONS,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

He and Mr. Stewart, former Second Assistant Postmaster General, who has been in the Postal Service for over 20 years, afterwards appeared before the committee and confirmed by detailed proof and data the estimates given in this letter.

Now, does the gentleman from New York or any fair-minded gentleman, after consideration, think we ought to permit the rate to remain at 1 cent, as it is under existing law, or make it any less than we have it in the bill, when at the proposed increased rate the Government will receive less than one-third of what it will cost? It costs 4¼ cents for every pound of newspapers and magazines carried and distributed through the mails in the first zone; 4½ cents for every pound of newspapers and magazines carried and handled in the second zone. Then the cost increases 1 cent for every 200 miles hauled. So that when it is carried and distributed in the seventh and eighth zones the cost runs up to from 12 cents to 18 cents per pound. This includes all cost for hauling, handling, and distributing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What does the Government receive?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Government receives 1 cent a pound for it.

Mr. REAVIS. These periodicals are not institutions of philanthropy, are they? They are organized for profit.

Mr. KITCHIN. No. They are organized and run for profit to the owners. All those not organized for profit pay one-half cent flat additional—that is 1½ cents per pound, flat.

Mr. REAVIS. And if they pay only one-tenth of the cost of transportation, it increases their profits?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Now, if some man who opposes this increase in postal rates on second-class matter will answer this question, I may change my mind: Why is it right or just or fair to carry and deliver these newspapers and magazines, organized for profit, for one-ninth or one-eighth of their cost—that is, why is it fair that the Government should bear eight-ninths of the cost of carrying and transporting and putting into the patrons' hands magazines and papers, one-half of which are advertisements and three-fourths of the income of which are from advertisements, and yet refuse to bear any part of the cost of transporting and delivering flour and meat and bread and clothes and shoes and other necessities to the people? Or schoolbooks to the children? Or Bibles to the people?

The publishers say that they are spreading civilization and Christianity: that they are educating the people, disseminating intelligence and information, and that the Government ought to carry and distribute their publications below cost—at the flat rate of 1 cent; that any increase in the rates would be a tax on intelligence, on civilization, and Christianity.

Ah, they can not put it on any such hypocritical basis as that. If it is a tax on intelligence, why should the Government charge anything? Why not carry them free. If it is to educate the people, why is it that the Government charges from five to twelve times as much—and the publishers of newspapers and magazines favor it—to send through the mails a little Webster spelling book or a dictionary or a grammar or a geography to the little school children throughout the United States as it does to send a newspaper or magazine to a subscriber or advertiser [applause]; are not text books used for the spread of intelligence? [Applause.] Why charge publishers and the people from five to twelve times as much to send books of history, of philosophy, of the sciences, or of poetry as it does a Saturday Evening Post? Why does it cost from five to twelve times as much to send a Bible through the mails as it does Collier's Weekly or any other paper or periodical, both weighing the same? Will not the Bible spread Christianity as well as Collier's Weekly? Why not pay, for the publisher of the Bible, eight-ninths of its cost of delivery. Do not the people need the Bible as badly as they do Collier's Weekly?

For the spread of intelligence the people do not need magazines and newspapers half as badly as their children need text books. The people do not need magazines and newspapers half as badly as they need shoes and flour and meat. We do not pay eight-ninths of the cost of distributing through the mails school books for the children, books of history, and the sciences for the people. The Government makes every school book, every volume that goes through the mail, pay its own cost and sometimes a profit. The Government does not pay eight-ninths of the cost of transporting and delivering to the people flour, meat, shoes, and clothing. Why this discrimination in favor of the publishers? Why this persistent annual subsidy to them and annual loss to the Government? Why have we not increased the rates? I will tell you why—and every man here knows it; yes, absolutely knows it. We have not heretofore increased the rates not because it is not just to do it, not because it is not right to do it, not because it is not honest to do it, but because Congress has not had the nerve, in the face of opposition of the press, to do it. [Applause.] They have permitted the newspapers and the magazines to intimidate them. [Applause.] Shall we now be seduced by the hope of their commendation and flattery or intimidated by the fear of their criticism and condemnation? Manly, patriotic Members of this House know that they must go up against them, but I believe that the membership of the present House has the courage to do it. They say the Democrats got control of the House in the Sixty-second Congress because of the Cannon rule in the Sixty-first Congress. I used to repeat that but with the wink of an eye. They used to tell us how Taft split the party, how it was Taft's unpopularity that split the Republican Party. Ah, gentlemen, nothing did more to give the Democrats control of the House—and I did not like Mr. CANNON's rule—but nothing did more to give the Democrats the House and defeat Uncle JOE CANNON and the Republicans, and nothing did more to unpopularize Mr. Taft as President, who deserved popularity among the people, than the fact that Uncle JOE CANNON and Mr. Taft in his administration stood up for the right and honest thing of making the magazines and the newspapers pay their just proportion of the dues to the Government for the service it rendered. [Applause.]

Not a magazine in this country, not even Collier's Weekly, who fought UNCLE JOE and Mr. Taft as bitterly as any periodical in the country, not one raised their voice against Mr. Taft and UNCLE JOE and the rules, which had been in existence for 20 years, until Mr. Taft and his Postmaster General came out for an increase of postage on papers and magazines and UNCLE JOE declared against giving the publishers free wood pulp and free print paper, and took the stand with Mr. Taft for increased postage.

As I said in the committee I say to you now, Members of the House, that an increase in the second-class mail matter rates is not a question of whether it is right or whether it is just or whether it is fair, because every man here knows it is right and fair and just; it is simply a question of nerve and courage to do that which in your hearts and consciences you know you ought to do. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is there any one subject in the committee where there was more unanimity than there was upon this provision in the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is absolutely right. There was not a man in that committee that doubted the right or propriety of increasing the rates—not one thought they should be less than doubled; many, a large majority, thought it would be just to put higher rates than we did, but felt that the papers that had established themselves on the old rates ought to have the increased tax put on gradually and not all at one time. We thought that if there ever was a time when men in this House would have the nerve and the courage to do that which was right in order to recoup a part of our losses to the Government which the publishers cause it was when our country needed every dollar that we could justly get to maintain it in her tremendous struggle. [Applause.] We thought they would have the courage to do it, because when maligned and attacked by a sordid press they could go back and tell their people that they had taken only one-fourth of the annual subsidy—the annual tribute—Congress has been forcing the people to give to the publishers of newspapers and magazines and turned it over to our boys on the fighting lines to maintain themselves while keeping our flag in the heavens. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I do not think anybody will seriously question what the chairman has said about the justice of increasing this tax. But that is not what I wish to ask the gentleman about. What I want to ask is in view of the $70,000,000 to come from the increase on first-class postage, has the committee made any investigations to ascertain what proportion of that increase will go for the payment of salaries which, of course, depends on the amount of returns in the Post Office?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have a provision I am going to submit to the committee and to the House to prevent that very thing. Every dollar of that $70,000,000 which is coming from the increase on the first-class postage must go into the Treasury.

Take the Saturday Evening Post, again, that charges $5,000 a page for each issue for advertisements. I took up one the other day and there were 131 pages in it. Ninety pages were solid advertisements.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; not now. The magazine is getting a million and six hundred thousand dollars in subscriptions and in that one issue it received $400,000 for advertisements, amounting at that rate to fifteen or twenty million dollars a year for advertisements alone out of that "spread of intelligence," and the Government hauls that $15,000,000 worth of advertisements through the country at a loss of over $3,000,000 a year. Can any man square his conscience with his vote against increasing these rates on the ground that he is opposed to taxing the "spread of intelligence"?

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to say concerning the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] in relation to the unanimity of the members of the committee that the zone system was unanimously approved, but I also desire to say that with reference to the first and second zone compared with the third zone I thought that the third zone should be placed with the first and second. I reserved a right in the committee to offer an amendment and support it placing the third zone with the first and second.

Mr. GARNER. I said that no provision in the bill commanded a greater unanimity among the Committee on Ways and Means than did this provision.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the gentleman from Nebraska did not object to the increase or to the zone system, but he wanted a different zone arrangement. I will state to the House that the committee has now under consideration amendments modifying the proposed rates in the first, second, and third zones, by which the rate in the first zone will be 1½ cents per pound, and the rate in the second and third zones, 2 cents; in the fourth and fifth zones, 3 cents, and also putting the zone rates into effect gradually. Such modifications accord more with the views of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. POU. Did the committee take under consideration the proposition to use that part of the magazine or periodical that was devoted to advertisements as a basis for imposing this tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. We looked into that and found it was not practicable nor equitable. I am handed a copy of the Outlook, 19 pages of which appear to be advertising; over 30 per cent of its space is devoted to advertising—everything from a toothbrush to a Cadillac automobile—and the Government is losing more than $140,000 a year in carrying and handling the Outlook, giving its publishers and these advertisers a subsidy of that much.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. And the Government is paying every dollar of the cost of the transportation of these advertisements.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Is not an advertisement information concerning the thing advertised? [Laughter.] Oh, I ask that seriously.

Mr. KITCHIN. Ought not the gentleman to refer to it as misinformation generally as to the thing advertised?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. And a high-class journal like the Outlook never takes advertisements of anything except that which is of exceeding interest to the public.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, sure! [Laughter.] Like this Valspar which is advertised here. What is that, anyway?

Mr. GOODALL. It is a varnish.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; Valspar varnish. Oh, Brother CHANDLER! [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What does the gentleman say to a statement like this? I remember to have read this three or four years ago when this same subject was up for discussion. A man said, over his own signature in a letter published in the public papers, that he had paid about $400 for an advertisement in one of these periodicals, and that as the result of that advertisement, costing him $400, within the four years that succeeded the publication of it there had been sent to him, and he in reply had sent back, many thousands of letters, aggregating a postage, first and last, amounting to almost $2,000. In that case of the paper carrying the advertisement and the transportation being paid for by the Government, while in the first place it may not have been to the Government compensatory or anything like it, yet in the long run the business in first-class postage which it got more than compensated the Government for the transportation of the advertisement.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am surprised at the gentleman, if I get correctly his logic and reasoning; that is, if he comes to the conclusion that we ought not to increase this rate on account of what——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has no right to come to any conclusion in my mind. I stated some facts to him.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman did not seem to be able to come to any conclusion himself, so I thought I would come to one for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Oh, I have often seen men who thought that it answered a question to say something smart or funny. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. If I offended, I really apologize to the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman answer the statement of the man who wrote the letter?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me answer the gentleman from Wisconsin. Of course, I do not know the gentleman who wrote the letter, but I know the gentleman from Wisconsin would not have quoted from it unless he thought the man was telling the truth.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, just one moment. If the gentleman's question is a good one, it will keep. Let us concede that the man told the truth, though I doubt it. If an automobile should be advertised in the Saturday Evening Post or in the Outlook, many letters of inquiry will be sent through the mails concerning it, and that would make business for the post office, and the more the Saturday Evening Post is increased in circulation the more will be the letters sent regarding the advertised automobile, and the Government would make a greater profit on account of the greater number of letters. If you are going to consider it upon that basis, then it would pay the Government under that reasoning to carry and deliver all of the newspapers and magazines and periodicals absolutely free. More would be circulated. More circulation, more advertisements; more advertisements, more letters—more business for the post office in second-class mail. But Sears, Roebuck & Co., John Wanamaker, and the rest of these big catalogue houses can make a ten times better argument to have Uncle Sam send their catalogues free than these publishers, because where the publishers get a thousand letters Sears, Roebuck & Co., Wanamaker, and the other big catalogue houses get 10,000. If I were a betting man, I would bet that these big catalogue houses used that same argument to the Postmaster General, that Congress ought to let them send their catalogues for nothing, because it would make bigger business for the post office in first-class mail matter. [Laughter.] It is not the magazines that are making the business for the first-class mail, but it is the man or firm or company that is doing the advertising and the people who write to the parties advertising. Why should not the man who buys the advertised article insist—and could not he with as much reason and justice—that the Government bear eight-ninths of the cost of transportation and delivery to him of the article on the ground that he had made business for the post office in writing so many letters about it? The automobile fellow has argued, too, that we ought not to put a tax on automobiles because they have advertised in the Saturday Evening Post and other big magazines and thousands of people wrote to them about their cars, and in that way they are making more money for the Government; at least, they might make that argument. [Laughter.] Why give credit to the magazines? The credit belongs to the automobile manufacturer. He makes business for the Government in first-class mail matter. Why should not the Government bear eight-ninths of the cost of handling and transporting his automobile? You see where that kind of reasoning leads to, do you not? They never have been able to fool me with such arguments, and they really have not fooled the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Now, gentlemen, here is a magazine that I hold in my hand—the Engineering Magazine. It weighs at least a pound. It costs the Government to send it to Oklahoma about 12 cents and 15 cents to send it to California, transportation cost alone, and the publisher pays the Government 1 cent. It consists of 128 pages, 106 of which are taken up with advertisements. Just look at those advertisements; and yet my friend Mr. CHANDLER thinks that it is a really patriotic and proper thing, in these days, when we need every just dollar that we can get for the Government, for it to still lose so enormously on every one of the hundreds of thousands of copies which they send out. The Government, under an act of Congress, spends at least $10 on that magazine for the privilege of getting $1 back from it. Oh, you know it is not right! Let us stop such an iniquity.

Mr. HUSTED. I do not want to be considered as opposed; I am very strongly in favor of it——

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. HUSTED. I do want to say I believe the statement made by the treasurer of the Outlook Co. to be absolutely a fact.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. HUSTED. The Outlook Co. carries very little advertising, and they pay very high prices for their articles. The only trouble, in my opinion, is that they do not charge enough for their paper. Under present conditions they have either got to carry more advertising or increase the subscription price. The magazine is sold, I think, for 5 cents a copy.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now we are getting together. I would suggest to them an increase in their subscription price, and especially their advertising rates. I am willing to pay double the amount of its present subscription price if that will wipe out this scandalous subsidy. That is the way to do it. [Laughter.] If I advertise in it, do you not know, rather than see it go out of circulation I would, for an advertising medium, be willing to pay a little more to support it? Take the Saturday Evening Post, Collier's Weekly, the Metropolitan, the Engineering Magazine, with their great circulation, spreading abroad not "Chandler" intelligence but these advertisements. Do you not think the advertisers in these magazines would be willing to pay a little more for their advertising space rather than lose such splendid mediums?

Mr. CRAMTON. In the discussion of the Outlook is it not a fact that that paper for the past year or two has been very anxious to have us get into the very war we are now in?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it wanted and helped us to get in, and now will not help us fight or pay out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state whether advertising is taxed in this bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. None on advertising in the newspapers, magazines, or other periodicals. Advertisements or advertising space other than in newspapers and magazines is taxed 5 per cent on the gross receipts from such advertising, while newspaper advertisements are untaxed.

Mr. MADDEN. Why?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because the proposed increase in the rate of postage upon magazines and newspapers is materially increased, and by such increase we will get for the Government at least $19,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Because you did not have the courage to equalize the tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, I will say to the gentleman that I think it takes a man of supreme gall to talk about lack of courage in a matter of taxing newspapers and magazines when he has been on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads 10 or 12 years and has never dared come up here and advocate making them pay back to the Government one penny of the tremendous loss they cause it to incur each year, but continues to vote for millions of subsidy each year to them. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I desire to have the gentleman's opinion about magazines who use the fast freight to take them across the continent and which are mailed from that point. I want some information——

Mr. KITCHIN. They do not do that on long distances. They use the Government, through its mails, for the long hauls and only use the express or fast freight for short hauls when the express or freight rates are less than $1 per 100 pounds. The Government carries and distributes the papers at 1 cent per pound, or $1 per 100, regardless of the distance. From Philadelphia to New York, or even to Chicago, the Saturday Evening Post is carried by freight or express, because it gets a rate cheaper than the Government rate, but from Philadelphia to Denver, Dallas, San Francisco, Atlanta, and other distant cities it uses the Government, as the rates are from one-third to one-fifth cheaper than freight or express. The Government, however, loses from $3 to $10 on each 100 pounds carried, respectively, to such cities, since it costs the Government at the rate of 1 cent a pound for each 200 miles to transport the mails.

Mr. RANDALL. I understood the gentleman to say the Government would still lose money under these rates?

Mr. KITCHIN. Absolutely.

Mr. RANDALL. Then why does the gentleman put a provision that they can not ship magazines by some other means, say, to Los Angeles and then remail them in the local zone. Would not the Government make money by allowing that?

Why provide they shall not ship by some other means?

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not say they can not do that. They can ship by freight, express, or otherwise, and distribute by hand, as they do in many places, but when they distribute through the post office they will have to pay the same rate if put in the post office at Los Angeles as they would if mailed from place of publication. For instance, the Saturday Evening Post, if sent to Los Angeles by express, and put into the post office there for distribution, would have to pay the same rate as if mailed in Philadelphia to Los Angeles.

Let me read the proviso:

> That second-class mail matter mailed to subscribers from an office other than that of publication shall pay the same rate as if mailed from the office at the place of publication.

Under this provision if they should try to beat the Government by shipping by freight or express and mailing at San Francisco the charge would be at the same rate as if they mailed from Philadelphia.

Mr. RANDALL. My point is they would not be helping the Government. They would be beating the Government.

Mr. KITCHIN. They can and do beat the Government on the present rate now.

Mr. RANDALL. No; they could not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Can we not send a pound of Saturday Evening Posts from here to San Francisco through the mails for 1 cent?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. They pay 1 cent for it?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. This bill, if you vote for it, will make them pay 6 cents. You are in favor of that?

Mr. RANDALL. I am talking about your provision to prevent them from shipping by other means.

Mr. KITCHIN. We can not prevent them from doing that, but can prevent them from using the post office to deliver it unless they pay the rate fixed by that proviso.

Mr. RANDALL. You can do that.

Mr. KITCHIN. They would have to pay 6 cents. Under the present law they would pay 1 cent.

However, I will say to the gentleman that there is some force in his suggestion. Even under the proposed bill a pound of newspaper or magazine, say the Evening Post, sent from Philadelphia to Los Angeles would cost the Government for carriage about 15 cents per pound, while we only provide for a payment by the Post or other papers of 6 cents per pound. We would still be losing heavily. As I understand the gentleman's point is, permit the periodical to ship by freight or express at a cheaper rate than 6 cents, which it can do, and distribute through the post office, say, at Los Angeles. The Government would be saving the difference between 12 or 15 cents per pound, the cost to it, and the 6 cents it would receive from the periodical or paper. This should be considered by the committee and it will do so before we conclude the debate.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You say it costs the Government $100,000,000 on second-class matter?

Mr. KITCHIN. I said that Mr. Koons, the First Assistant Postmaster General, testified that it cost the Government $100,000,000 for transportation and handling and distributing second-class mail matter. Mr. Stewart so testified, and other officials and experts of the Post Office Department have time and again made similar estimates.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will you explain to whom they pay this, that they would not have to pay if there was not any second-class matter going? I mean what employee in the post office gets this money?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is paid to railroads and other carriers, to rural carriers, to railway mail clerks, to postmasters and their clerks, to the thousands of other postal employees, and hundreds of items of other general and overhead expenses.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, well, but you have got an expense account there. What item in the last year's auditor's report shows $100,000,000 paid out, or any proportion of it?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have not seen the auditor's report, nor has the gentleman. The Hughes Commission said it cost 5½ to 6 cents a pound for transportation service alone. Postmaster General Hitchcock said it cost that, and Postmaster General Burleson and Mr. Koons, the First Assistant Postmaster General, and the experts of the department, say that it costs in addition to that 4 cents a pound for handling and distributing the second-class mail matter.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman that I expect to oppose this proposition——

Mr. KITCHIN. I am mighty sorry. [Laughter.] You ought to vote for it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If you are right in what you say it costs the Government, they should pay it, but I have had some experience in the Post Office Department——

Mr. KITCHIN. Have you ever had any experience in the newspaper business? Are you an editor?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No. In the post office. I want to challenge the statement of the gentleman and I want to challenge the statement of all these experts who say that it costs the Post Office Department $100,000,000 or $50,000,000. I doubt whether for the next fiscal year you could eliminate from the Post Office Department all second-class matter and show as much profit as you do to-day.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course that is a difference of opinion.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is the proposition. The trouble is, the overhead expense is there, and this matter is handled by the employees when the peak load is not on.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me ask you some questions, now.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. We have, in addition to the second class, three other classes of mail matter—the first class, third class, and fourth class matter. They all go along on the same train, with the same clerks, and are handled by the same postmasters, and directed and supervised by the same officials here in the Post Office Department. Now, if you are not going to charge up anything for the handling of this 1,200,000,000 pounds of second-class matter, of newspapers and magazines, why should you charge any overhead and general expense to any of the other classes of mail matter? Why are you willing to charge up the general and overhead expenses to the other three classes of mail matter, on all of which we are making some profit, and be unwilling to make any overhead or general expense charge against the second class? You want to make all the overhead charges for the first, the third, and the fourth class matter, and leave out the second class. Each one must bear their proportionate part of the overhead charges, of course. [Applause.] We pay over $40,000,000 for transporting the second-class matter alone, and we get back for the entire service of transporting and handling and distributing only $11,383,000.

Mr. CALDWELL. I would just like to ask you one question. Have you any figures of the cost per pound for carrying this matter from New York to San Francisco?

Mr. KITCHIN. The department says it costs 1 cent a pound for second-class matter for each 200 miles hauled. It costs the Government for carrying a pound of it from New York to San Francisco—3,000 miles—15 cents. It gets back from the publisher 1 cent for this and all other service in handling and distributing.

Mr. RAINEY. Will my colleague permit me to read from the report of the Third Assistant Postmaster General for 1911?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is Mr. Hitchcock's?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Go ahead.

Mr. RAINEY. Commenting on the rate on second-class matter, I read from his report:

> Compared with the cost of the service, the rate on first-class mail is excessive. It is not equitable to require to mailers of first-class matter to bear the heavy burden which the carrying of second-class matter for publishers at nominal postage rates entails. It amounts to a tax upon more than 94,000,000 people for the direct benefit of about 30,000 of their number who are publishers. In other words, for each publisher directly benefited about 3,100 individuals are unjustly taxed.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I want to ask the gentleman another question, because I am going to vote for all of this bill.

If, according to the gentleman's figures, it costs 6 cents to take one of these pound magazines from New York to San Francisco by mail——

Mr. KITCHIN. It costs 1 cent for every 200 miles; that is, about 15 cents instead of 6 cents, and, in addition to that, 4 cents for handling and distributing, including the part of the general post-office expense.

Mr. CALDWELL. It figures out somewhere over 10 cents in all.

Mr. KITCHIN. Or more than that—15 cents.

Mr. CALDWELL. Now, then, we are only going to get 6 cents?

Mr. KITCHIN. Six cents.

Mr. CALDWELL. Here is the point in my mind: If by any kind of a system we can compel those people who are making the difference between 6 cents and what it actually costs to send it by some other method, why not make them take it?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is what I said to the publishers. They said, "Your rates are so high that we will have to use some other method," and I said, "Do it, and we will make or save money by it."

Mr. CALDWELL. Under your provision you make them pay 6 cents instead of 1, and if he is now paying 6 cents by slow freight, he will send by fast freight through the United States post office and we lose thus $40,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not understand the gentleman's calculation and how he reaches such a conclusion. If magazines and papers should all go by freight or express and not through the mails at all, on the long hauls the Government would save in transportation alone 1 cent for each 200 miles hauled.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. How does the committee take care of the borrowed capital under excess profits?

Mr. KITCHIN. We discussed that question for two or three days last session. The borrowed capital——

Mr. CARLIN. Let me give you an illustration.

Mr. KITCHIN. I know your illustration.

Mr. CARLIN. Suppose a firm had $300,000 of actual capital and $300,000 of borrowed capital. On which is the tax paid?

Mr. KITCHIN. On the actual capital paid in, not on borrowed money; but they have a deduction on the borrowed money of interest paid on it before the tax is computed.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. I am looking for information, having in mind the same line of thought that the gentleman has followed. Can the gentleman tell me what proportion of the expense in parcels post and the rural free delivery is borne by the charges that the Government makes for that service?

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not at this time give him definite information as to that. From the parcels post the Government makes a little profit.

Mr. SANFORD. How about the rural free delivery?

Mr. KITCHIN. The rural free delivery causes the Government to incur a loss, but we would incur no such loss if these newspapers and magazines which are carried through the country would pay what it actually costs. But suppose we lose on that. That is a loss not on account of or for the special benefit of any individual or company or corporation, but on the whole service for the benefit of all alike, and if there is any loss there it is shifted over for the whole service, not by or for any particular class, as the magazines and newspapers.

Mr. SANFORD. If it were at a loss that was being borne by the people in the cities, would we still have the courage to do it?

Mr. KITCHIN. The people in the cities do not bear any losses. [Laughter.]

Mr. SANFORD. I thought if we were going to be courageous in one place, we might as well be in another.

Mr. KITCHIN. The city carrier carries for all, and all kinds of mail of the four classes. If any loss, it is for the whole service and for all.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Diverting the gentleman's mind from the phase of the bill he is discussing to the excess-profits tax, my question may be in the line of questions heretofore asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I understood the chairman to say that in estimating the excess-profits tax you went first to the returns of the income of that corporation. Now, I have this concrete example in mind that I would like to glean information about from the chairman. I know one corporation, two corporations, one in business years ago, which started at $14,500 capital and has not increased that capital stock at all. The other, in the same business, has increased its capital stock to $2,000,000. Now, I would like to know whether there will be any inequity shown between the stockholders of the $14,500 corporation and the $2,000,000 corporation when it comes to levying this excessive-profits tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. None whatever. If the stockholders of the $2,000,000 corporation paid in actual cash or turned over property for stock worth in actual cash $2,000,000 or the actual cash paid in or property turned over and the paid in or earned surplus amount to $2,000,000, the corporation is entitled to the deduction of 8 per cent on that amount. If they have watered stock and it did not come from these three sources, the water will be squeezed out and no deduction allowed on the watered capital. It will be the same thing with the $14,500 corporation. It will have the same 8 per cent deduction on the actual cash and property paid in and paid in or earned surplus, including undivided profits. There will be no inequity.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I see.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. This increase in first-class mail applies to what is called "drop letters," does it not?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it applies to drop letters.

Mr. EMERSON. Do you not think some exception should be made of it?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. We increased it exactly as we did on other first-class mail—just 1 cent additional. We thought we had better make it cover the whole letter system—in villages, towns, cities, and in the country alike. Where under present law one pays 2 cents he will pay 3 cents, and where one pays now 1 cent he will pay 2 cents under existing law on first-class matter.

Mr. EMERSON. Even with the 2 cents it would be cheaper?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say this, that after the war is over, whenever that time shall be, and when we can get publishers of magazines and newspapers to pay somewhat of the proportionate cost of transportation and handling them, then there can be and ought to be a 1-cent letter postage throughout this country. We could have had it long ago if the publishers of newspapers and magazines had been required to pay the cost of their transportation and handling, as every other class of people and of industry is required to pay on the transportation and handling of their products.

Mr. KINCHELOE. In connection with the income tax, I understand the gentleman to say that all the personal income tax that would be retroactive would be one-third of the amount?

Mr. KITCHIN. One-third.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will this exemption be retroactive, too?

Mr. KITCHIN. To your income tax, which is payable in June this year, you just add one-third. You can wait until September 15 to pay it. Corporations and individuals will not have to pay their tax until September 15, 1917.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The excess-profit tax is one-third of that only?

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no retroactive excess-profits tax The so-called retroactive feature applies only to the income tax.

Mr. AUSTIN. I would like to ask the gentleman if the President of the United States and the members of the Supreme Court are exempt from paying income tax under this bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. The President is not.

Mr. AUSTIN. How about the members of the Supreme Court?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have forgotten what the Constitution says as to the question of decreasing their salaries, but think it prevents any decrease of their salaries during their term.

Mr. MASON. You can not decrease their salaries during their term of office.

Mr. AUSTIN. Payment of taxes would not be a reduction of salary.

Mr. KITCHIN. The courts have so held. Under the act of September 8, 1916, we excepted the President's salary during his then term for the reason that the Constitution said it should not be reduced during his term. But he will pay under this.

Mr. DENISON. Is there any tax on candy?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. DENISON. What does the gentleman think about that being a luxury?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is a good subject for taxation, and we could raise, by putting 10 per cent on all candies, about twelve or fifteen million dollars.

Mr. COX. As to the 5 per cent taxes on automobiles—that is 5 per cent on the factory cost?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is 5 per cent of the manufacturers' selling price.

Mr. COX. I am thoroughly in accord with the gentleman and his committee upon that, but let me ask him this question: Did the committee consider, or was there any way by which the committee could have imposed a tax on automobiles already in the hands of users?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, we did not think we ought to put the tax on the automobile in the owner's or consumer's hands. On automobiles and jewelry and musical instruments, and the like, we propose a tax of 5 per cent on the manufacturer's selling price. If it is right and wise to put a tax on automobiles in the hands of everyone who now has one, why should we not levy a similar tax on the watches, jewelry, and pianos in the same way, or on any other musical instrument that is now in the homes of the people? And, another thing, we did not think that that would be an equal tax, for the reason that anyone with a two or three hundred dollar second-hand automobile would pay as much on that as the more wealthy man on his $5,000 automobile.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is there not a potent reason for not levying a general tax of that kind, that it would be very costly of administration, and would require an army of officials for its collection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. And, too, if you levied that kind of a tax some people would pay too much and others not enough. We levy a tax of 5 per cent on the manufacturing price of tires and tubes, and the manufacturers will charge that up to the purchaser. That will run ten to twenty dollars a year to every man in the United States who has an automobile.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Then the tires are taxed separately from the automobiles?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and we are allowing the automobile manufacturer to have a reduction of the tire tax on the four tires already on the automobile.

Mr. COX. The automobile owner pays the tax, then, when he gets the tires?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir. The manufacturer of the tire will, of course, make him pay it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has answered the suggestion I was going to make, and that was that we have already taxed automobiles by putting a tax of 5 per cent on the manufacture of tires and inner tubes. This will be added to the cost of the tire.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Take my friend from New York [Mr. SNYDER]. He will pay more tax on tires than if we were to put a tax on automobiles. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I was not here when the gentleman discussed section 504. I was absent from the Chamber.

Mr. KITCHIN. What does the gentleman wish to inquire about?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I wanted to inquire whether or not this section 504, relating to advertising, includes materials entering into the making of signs and calendars, novelties, and articles of this class.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I think not.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Then I understand that calendars and things like that are not included in section 504?

Mr. KITCHIN. What kind of calendars does the gentleman mean?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I want to understand the gentleman and I want the gentleman to understand me. I have in my district one of the largest advertising novelty concerns in the world, and they manufacture calendars and various kinds of advertising novelties which are sold to merchants and distributed gratuitously to their customers. I wanted to know whether this 5 per cent applies on articles of that kind?

Mr. KITCHIN. I hardly think it would.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If he sells these calendars and puts on them the words "Compliments of the First National Bank of Coshocton, Ohio," he would be caught?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would not be certain about that, but I do not think he would be if the bank distributed them. The bill excepts newspapers and periodicals. But go down here to Keith's Theater and you will notice the program contains different advertisements. It would catch that. These billboards along the railroad tracks will be caught—advertising Bull Durham Tobacco, for example—a North Carolina product, by the way. The fellow or syndicate that puts up the sign must pay 5 per cent of what the tobacco people pay them for putting that advertisement up, and the same thing will apply to street car advertisements.

Mr. ASHBROOK. And fans and calendars and pocketbooks and memorandum books having advertisements on them would be subject to this tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. I doubt it, if such are sold to a customer and he distributes them.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Getting back to the automobile tax, is it the purpose of the framers of this bill to tax the sale of a car from a dealer—a car that he has taken in exchange for a new one?

Mr. KITCHIN. Ah, I am mighty glad the gentleman asked that question. I thought we had caught everybody in the United States, but I see we have not. [Laughter.] That is the way we get a lot of fellows—from their questions. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNYDER. I wanted to clear that up.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; our bill would not catch that, but perhaps we ought to consider an amendment that will. [Laughter.] However, I do not think it would be wise to do that.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman will understand that I am not offering any suggestions. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. It is all made on the basis of the sales value, is it not?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the manufacturers' sales value.

Mr. MADDEN. If a man bought a new machine and turned in an old machine as part payment, the total cost of the machine, including the amount that was allowed on the old machine turned in would be taxed, and when the dealer sold the second-hand machine again he would be taxed on that?

Mr. KITCHIN. The dealers are taxed to the extent of the amount of tax that would be passed on to them by the manufacturer who sells them a second-hand automobile. He would not be taxed directly on the old machine.

Mr. SNYDER. For instance, a man takes in trade a second-hand car, of which the original price was $5,000. It is a second-hand car and has a second-hand value of only $1,000. This bill calls for the sale price, adding 5 per cent to the sale price of the car when it leaves the manufacturer.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the manufacturer sells a new car, say, for $2,000, and a part of the purchase price he allows the purchaser $1,000 on a second-hand car, the tax would be 5 per cent of the $2,000, or $50. No tax under the bill would be levied on the second-hand car when sold again.

Mr. MEEKER. Going back to the advertising proposition about which the gentleman was talking a moment ago in regard to calendars, if what the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN] has stated is true, that merchants and others could buy these calendars and stamp them themselves, that would mean the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars in revenue. Would it not be more equitable to tax the calendar itself as an advertising medium if you sell the calendar as an advertising medium, rather than to tax the advertisement? Under the bill as drawn that would be the easiest thing in the world to get around. All that a man would have to do would be to buy his calendar and then hand it back to the same man who had sold it to him to have the printing done upon it which would turn it into an advertisement.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think the bill would catch that proposition. We will try to catch him in another way. [Laughter.] But really I do not think it ought to catch that man.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If that is done, I am very sorry that I called the gentleman's attention to that fact, because I have just received a telegram from the American Art Works, of Coshocton, Ohio, in which they state that a chartered accountant has gone over the earnings of their company for the past five years, and that the proposed tax will absorb all the profits on that line of business.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me tell you, I have not counted the number of telegrams I have received from different people, but I have a stack that will fill my office, and I have got to get more office room to store the telegrams from different parties saying just the same thing—that the various persons have gone over their books, and that this tax will absorb all the net profits, and they will be in the hands of a receiver and be bankrupt in a few days after the passage of this bill. Do not let them scare you on that.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I am not scared. I am simply stating what they say.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am pretty certain that that section will not cover the case of those calendars, and I do not think it ought to. That is not the advertising that we undertake to tax. That is similar to a case of a little newspaper which has a little job office. A merchant goes to him and says, "Strike off a thousand circulars for me." He does it. The merchant distributes them. This bill will not tax that.

Mr. MADDEN. The question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] has raised a question of doubt in my mind, on account of the answer made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and I would like to have it cleared up. Do I understand the gentleman from North Caroline to say that the 5 per cent tax on automobiles will be levied against the manufacturer? The manufacturer sells his automobile to the dealer for about 20 per cent off.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is the manufacturer's price that we intend to tax. Let me give you an illustration.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no tax against the retail selling house?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; except on the stock that he has on hand when the bill goes into effect, and he can get it out of his purchaser when he sells.

Mr. MADDEN. Would there not be some inequality in the imposition of the tax? A great many manufacturers have their own selling agencies. A great many other manufacturers employ selling agents and they give them 20 or 25 per cent off the manufacturer's price. Out of that 25 per cent they have to pay their own expenses—rent, taxes, and everything—and whatever is left is the selling agent's profit. The man who acts as the selling agent for the manufacturer is one thing, and the manufacturer who acts as his own selling agent is another thing. The question is, where the manufacturer is his own selling agent you impose the tax at the source of the sale; in the other case you tax them at the source of manufacture. You tax one man on the basis of 25 per cent less than you do the other man.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say this would be the way: The manufacturer who is his own selling agent—that is, who sells direct—pays the 5 per cent on his selling price. If he sells direct to the consumer at the same price other manufacturers sell to their agents or dealers, he pays no more tax than the other. If he adds on for himself the commission allowed by others to their agents or dealers, he makes more profits on his manufacturing price and should pay the tax on his selling price.

Mr. DILL. As I understand it, this bill exempts advertising in newspapers.

Mr. KITCHIN. And periodicals.

Mr. DILL. Why?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is because we increase the postage rate on papers and periodicals immensely—two, three, and four times. For instance, newspapers and periodicals now, second-class matter, pay only 1 cent a pound. We have applied the zone system to second-class mail matter, and we make them pay 2 cents a pound for zones 1 or 2, 3 cents a pound for the third zone, 4 cents a pound for the fourth or fifth zones, 5 cents for the sixth or seventh zones, and 6 cents a pound for the eighth zone; and they will pay on an average about two and one-half times more than now. We did not think it right to charge them a tax also on the advertisements.

Mr. DILL. Will not the tendency of the tax be to drive advertising into the newspapers, to compel men who want to advertise to use the newspapers? Will it not tend to do that?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think so, because the magazines and newspapers will most probably increase their advertising rates. Under this bill they will have to pay more than double their present rate of postage.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. On page 26, line 12, you place a tax on talking machines.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and I will say to the gentleman that he reminds me to put in another subject of taxation, and that is talking machines inside the Capitol. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. But to be serious, talking machines "sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer." I have a letter from a constituent asking whether the middleman or retail dealer would be caught by any of these terms. The corporation makes the talking machine, sells it to the wholesale dealer, and he sells it to the retail dealer. To whom does the tax apply?

Mr. KITCHIN. The manufacturer or producer pays the tax on the machine hereafter produced or sold by him. The dealer pays only the tax on machines he has on hand at the time the act passes.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. With reference to the increase of postage on second-class matter, is it estimated that the zone system will bring a revenue, or will it be prohibitive?

Mr. KITCHIN. It will bring additional revenue to the extent of $19,000,000.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. I want to say to the gentleman that one of the largest advertising concerns in the world uses calendars as a medium.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Novelties?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes; novelties.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman has on his lapel a flag in the shape of an advertisement showing that he is a patriot. The fellow that makes that flag would not be taxed under this provision. Here, for instance, is a button saying that I am for Meeker, who is running for Congress. You furnish the novelty, and the fellow that made it would not be taxed on what you paid him for that advertising button.

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman does not get my point. The man goes out and takes orders for calendars, the same as they sell advertisements in street cars and on billboards. It is their system for promoting the industry. Now, if there is a loophole for these men to get out, that should be provided for by amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that they ought not to be taxed any more than a newspaper job office where a merchant comes in and has it to print 25,000 circulars when the merchant distributes them. I doubt whether that ought to be taxed. I will tell the gentleman that if he will give me the power to do it I will appoint the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Ohio to work that out and report to me, and I will have the committee to consider it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHBROOK. With the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that his constituents would be more affected by section 504 by the taxation of these novelties than the constituents of my district, because among the largest customers are the brewing industries of St. Louis.

Mr. MEEKER. And I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that the brewing industries are not ducking any taxes in this war.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I do not believe they will have a chance to duck if they are disposed to.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Section 506 imposes a tax on policies of insurance, and I suppose the intention is to tax the fire and life insurance companies themselves.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the company pays it.

Mr. JAMES. The language is:

SEC. 506. That every person, corporation, partnership, or association receiving any payment for advertising or advertising space upon which a tax is imposed by section 504, or issuing policies of insurance upon the issuance of which a tax is imposed by section 505, shall, within the first 15 days of each month—

Now, the policies are not issued by the company; they are issued by their agents. The way this reads it looks to me as if it would be paid by the agents.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it further provides that the insurance company shall make the returns on them and account for what they receive.

Mr. JAMES. But the section reads "every person" issuing policies of insurance.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the company and not the agent. The company must make the return to the collector of internal revenue in the district in which the principal office is located.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. ELSTON. In connection with the provision for taxing transportation of freight and persons by rail or water, did the committee consider in that connection taxing the same kind of transportation by motor and stage line? Now, in California we have motor lines engaged in large competition with the railways, and I have had inquiries about it. What I want to know is whether the committee considered that question that the stage and motor lines should be subjected to this tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. Perhaps we ought to tax regular established lines, if you can distinguish them from little bus and taxicab lines, but I do not think they would be caught under this bill. The committee's attention was not directed to that method of transportation and failed to consider it.

Mr. ELSTON. I understand that the gross receipts of these motor and stage lines in California reach four or five million dollars for the transportation of passengers, freight, and baggage. I do not know whether they have decreased the receipts of the established railroad lines, but I know there has been a disposition to bring them under the State railroad commission and treat them like railway and water lines.

Mr. KITCHIN. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion and wish to assure him that the committee will consider this matter before concluding the general debate.

Mr. NOLAN. Let me say to the gentleman and my colleague that we have had letters from the public utilities of California calling attention to this tax. The fact is that they have cut into the revenues of these big corporations to some extent, and the corporations can not get back at them through the State, and so they want Congress to get back at them through the revenue bill.

Mr. ELSTON. I was not making any argument; I simply asked whether the committee had considered that matter in committee?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to both gentlemen from California that these lines would not pay a cent of that tax. They would collect it from the passenger. The passenger will pay it, just as he does to the railroad company. The railroad companies do not pay a cent of this tax. I go down and I get a passenger ticket to my home and pay for it $6.20. I pay the railroad company the $6.20 and then the ticket agent calculates 10 per cent of that and says to me, "Now, you owe 62 cents as a war tax for the Government." The company would not pay it. The passenger would have to pay it. That would not be a question of competition. Big and little lines pay the same percentage tax. It strikes me at first blush that where there is an established line, motor car or any other, for the hauling of passengers the passenger ought to pay just as he does upon the railroad.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will not destroy our one means of establishing justice and equality on the railroads of California. The jitney bus helps to regulate the railroads, and now the railroads are wiring us to help you put the jitney bus out of business so that the railroads will have it all to themselves. Let our jitney busses alone.

Mr. KITCHIN. The jitney bus will not pay any tax at all, but where a company has a regular, established line, why should not the passenger pay the tax?

Mr. FESS. Does this include taxing vehicles operating in Yellowstone Park?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it does not.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. Referring to this increase in the postal rates on the second-class matter, news matter, the gentleman said that the increase is fixed by zones. How are those zones to be fixed?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just as the parcel-post zones are—that is, the parcel-post zones are made applicable to the second-class postage.

Mr. SNOOK. As they are now?

Mr. KITCHIN. Fifty miles, first zone; 150, second zone; 300 miles, third zone, and so forth—just as they are now arranged.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, under section 701 a tax is placed on membership to clubs, except initiation fees.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, we did not omit the gentleman. He gets in there.

Mr. VARE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not he provides for a life membership? I come in here, but I do not want to escape with my life membership.

Mr. KITCHIN. Has the gentleman already paid his life membership?

Mr. VARE. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then he will not have to pay any more.

Mr. VARE. Then the life memberships that have already paid are exempt?

Mr. KITCHIN. We may amend that so as to catch the gentleman [laughter], but I do not think we will.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to have the gentleman to explain why it was that the committee stopped the graduated increase on incomes at $500,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. We did not. It is over that. You add the old law to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. REAVIS. I understand that, but after you get above one million, a man whose income is $20,000,000 pays no greater percentage than the man whose income is $1,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh yes; he does.

Mr. REAVIS. I am trying to find out.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; he does.

Mr. REAVIS. What is the difference?

Mr. KITCHIN. Under the present law from a million to a million and a half dollars the supertax is 11 per cent. We add to that 33 per cent. From a million and a half to two million dollars the present law provides a supertax of 12 per cent, and we add to that 33 per cent. Under the present law on incomes over $2,000,000 the supertax is 13 per cent, and we add to that 33 per cent. A majority of the committee, some thinking one way and some another, thought that when we take from a man's income over $2,000,000, about 50 per cent, we are taking a pretty large slice of it.

Mr. REAVIS. You are taking a great deal so far as the actual dollars and cents are concerned, but in the proportionate sacrifice that the men who pay it will make you are taking a great deal more from the married man with $2,000 who has a family to support than you are from the $10,000,000 man.

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe I can make that pretty clear to the gentleman, that we are taking a good deal more from him. That man from whom we take the 50 per cent over $2,000,000 has already paid every single one of these other gradations of taxes from $2,000 up. He has paid the same tax as I have paid upon mine, the same as you have paid upon yours, and the same tax as the fellow who has $50,000, and the one who has $100,000, and the one who has $150,000, and so on, and in addition to that pays this further tax, so that we catch him going and coming.

Mr. REAVIS. That is undoubtedly true, but the man whom you tax with an income of $2,000, with a family to support, has to pay his tax from the very necessities of life, while the man with an income of $10,000,000 is paying that income out of funds that he can use only in the way of investment, and the relative sacrifice is not to be compared.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think you are right about the sacrifice, for it hurts a little $1,000 man more to pay $10 than it hurts the $10,000,000 man to pay 50 per cent of what he has in excess of $2,000,000.

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman mind telling what actuated the committee in fixing commutation trips at less than 30 miles? You do not tax the amount paid for commutation and season tickets for trips of less than 30 miles.

Mr. KITCHIN. We had to fix some figure, and while I never have lived in a city that had any commuters, there were men upon the committee who had knowledge of this practice, and from their experience and observation they thought the 30-mile limit was sufficient. They said that 30 miles was sufficient to exempt the greater portion of the people who work in the city and have to travel day after day back and forth to and from their home outside the city limits.

Mr. COPLEY. I hope that the gentleman will not consider that I am violating his exhortation to not bring in our own districts.

I want to say that in my district I have a belt just around the city of Chicago, and all of the railroads go through it, and they all sell commutation tickets up as far as 40 miles. I do not think it is quite fair to remove from taxation the man who travels under 30 miles and add it to the man who travels over 30 miles. I would much rather it be collected upon all of them.

Mr. KITCHIN. We did that for the benefit of the laboring people.

Mr. COPLEY. These are laboring people that I have in mind.

Mr. KITCHIN. We were informed that practically all of the people who are what we call laboring people who buy these commutation tickets live within the 30-mile limit; that if they had to travel more than 30 miles it would take two or three hours, and they would lose two or three hours a day from their work, and they could not afford to do it, and therefore live within the limit.

Mr. COPLEY. Does not the gentleman know, for instance, in Chicago that the wealthy suburban residents live within the 30-mile district and that a number of clerks live out beyond?

Mr. KITCHIN. They do not do much work in the daytime if they have to go 40 or 50 miles to the city and then have to return the same day.

Mr. COPLEY. On the contrary, in the city in which I live more than 500 tickets are sold every month for men who leave as early as 6.30 in the morning to go to the city.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman think it ought to be 40 or 50 miles?

Mr. COPLEY. I think it ought to be nothing or to cover all.

Mr. KITCHIN. We would lose more taxes if we put it at 40 or 50——

Mr. COPLEY. Take all in.

Mr. KITCHIN. We did not think it would be right to place this tax upon thousands of men who made three or four dollars a day and had to make a trip to and from a city every day, even if a few rich men, as the gentleman claims, slip in under the 30-mile limit.

Mr. COPLEY. I do not think the gentleman's committee is properly informed on the subject, and that is the reason I was trying to bring it out.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My State is issuing bonds for $5,000,000, war-emergency bonds, issued on account of the war. Now, the people in my State buy these bonds, and I would like to inquire whether or not their incomes from these same war bonds will be taxed?

Mr. KITCHIN. They are exempt.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Suppose a person had a fortune of $25,000 annually derived from the interest on these Government bonds, or suppose he had $50,000 derived from the interest on these bonds, would he pay a cent of taxes?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; that is, not to the Federal Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Suppose a person had put a fortune of $100,000 in Government bonds. He goes tax free and does not pay any war-revenue taxes?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is right.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why did not the gentleman's committee put on 1 per cent or some amount?

Mr. KITCHIN. No Government taxes its own securities. That brings up another reason, I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], why we did not go over 50 per cent on incomes, a proposition which appealed to me somewhat, too, although I doubt if at this time we should go any higher. If we tax the big income receivers so much that it will reduce their total net income down to 3½ or 4 or 5 per cent, they will go out of business, and we would get no income taxes from them because they would take their money and put it in Government or State bonds, that are subject to no tax.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A person could put money into the rural credit bonds and get 4 per cent and not pay the Government any war tax, too?

Mr. KITCHIN. If we tax these men of wealth so exorbitantly on their incomes that they would realize less than 3½ or 4 or 5 per cent on the investment, it is feared they would no doubt do that or buy, as I said before, Government or State bonds.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. Has it been the experience of the other countries at war, whose income tax is much higher than ours, that men with large incomes have gone out of business and put their capital in Government bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; Great Britain does not tax any 50 per cent——

Mr. REAVIS. I understand that some of the income taxes are larger than ours.

Mr. KITCHIN. Great Britain's normal tax is much larger; it is 25 per cent. I said in the beginning that if we were to levy the same amount of normal income tax as Great Britain—she has some surtaxes, but not as high on the large incomes as this bill provides—that we would raise $3,000,000,000 by that tax alone, to say nothing of the surtax. I would not be much surprised if we will have to come to that during this war.

Mr. REAVIS. I would not either. The committee thinks, in reference to this income tax, it has put on about all the traffic will bear?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, taking everything into consideration, we think it is what the traffic will bear now; but we feel the traffic will have to bear some more in the future, and we have left room to put it on hereafter.

Mr. REAVIS. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. On page 20 reference is made to "commutation or season tickets for trips less than 30 miles." Those are exempt. I would like to ask how the committee arrived at that definite mileage? Fifty miles, I think, is considered the usual commutation distance.

Mr. LONGWORTH. A happy compromise.

Mr. KITCHIN. I just explained to the gentleman from Illinois that it was the opinion expressed by men on the committee who knew something about this matter that 30 miles was about the limit to which the laboring class go from their homes to places of business or work. If they lived farther, they would take too long going and coming.

Mr. HUSTED. That brings this tax over a large percentage of commuters.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman, as suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], 30 miles was also considered about equivalent to the 25-cent fare trip, also exempt under this bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. LEHLBACH. With reference to the amount of tax on soft drinks, page 15 of the bill. The tax on carbonic acid gas used in charging the water to make soft drinks is 8 cents per pound. I understand that that amounts to a tax of about 2 cents a gallon on the manufactured product.

Mr. KITCHIN. That was the original basis, but I really think it is about 1 cent a gallon. The theory was and the evidence of the experts whom we had was that 1 pound of acid gas made about 4 gallons. Frankly I have about come to the conclusion, after seeing some of the letters and documents sent to gentlemen by some of these companies, that 1 pound of gas is used to about 7 or 8 gallons. I hope, however, the tax upon the carbonic acid gas will be equivalent to a tax of 2 cents per gallon upon the carbonated beverage.

Mr. LEHLBACH. As the bill is drawn, this 8 cents tax per pound is paid by the manufacturers in the first instance?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; he charges it on to the soda fountain, the bottle, and so forth.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Now, I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that I believe the total production of carbonic acid gas is about 16,000,000 pounds.

Mr. KITCHIN. The census of 1914 puts it at about 58,000,000. Since then it has trebled and some say quadrupled. I remember that Dr. Smith, a chemist in New York—I have forgotten the firm with which he is connected—says that the production is now about 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 pounds. That seems pretty reasonable. As prohibition has spread in several States they use more soft drinks, and in my own town my observation is that in the last few years the consumption of soft drinks has more than doubled.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I am informed that 80 per cent of the carbonic acid gas used in these drinks is sold under annual contract, and that possibly almost 50 per cent of the annual supply is contracted for at fixed prices, ranging from 4 to 5 cents per pound.

Mr. KITCHIN. Some 6 and some as low as 4.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Assuming that 30,000,000——

Mr. KITCHIN. I made some inquiries about that. I had heard that, but I did not have it corroborated at all. I spoke to some men who are large bottlers and had been in the business for 25 years. They said that they did not know of any annual contracts.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The bottlers will be tickled to death to have the tax on the supplies they have already contracted for paid by the manufacturers, although their tax is 200 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. What company is giving you that information?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The Natural Carbonic Gas Co., of my district. They do a business of from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 pounds per year.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to you, as I said to the House, that there is, and there must of necessity be, interference with contracts such as you speak of. To remedy that and stay within the Constitution prevents a very difficult problem. Here are automobiles, here is whisky, jewelry, pianos, everything that is taxed, and it is claimed that there are contracts on these articles for delivery in the future. Take tea and coffee, for instance, and there are contracts to deliver to the retailers next month and the following month, and so forth. How to take care of that thing and stay within the Constitution is a difficult problem. It would be unwise to provide that those who have contracts should not pay this tax. Then everybody who sold carbonic acid, or tea, coffee, beer, or whisky, or wine, or automobiles would say they had a contract. We are considering it, and before the bill is finally passed the committee will get together and see if we can draft a provision so that the purchaser under such a contract will pay this tax, because it would not be a hardship upon him, for the reason that being a dealer he is going to sell it to somebody and he can add the tax to the price.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I want to say that this is an aggravated case, because if a man gets $500,000 of this stuff and gets $500,000 from his customers he has to pay $1,000,000 in taxes, because the sale is 4 cents a pound and the tax is 8 cents a pound. It would be cheaper to give the stuff away than to pay the tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. The tax proposed upon carbonic-acid gas is 8 cents per pound. We put 200 per cent tax on it as compared with the value of the product. It sounds mighty large, but if the tax were based upon the relation of the value of whisky to the tax upon whisky I think it would be about 25 cents per pound. The whisky tax is over 500 per cent of the cost of the whisky. The distiller passes the tax on to the wholesaler, and the wholesaler on to the retailer, and the retailer on to the consumer, and that will be the case with reference to carbonic-acid gas. It is all used in the production of luxuries, and the consumer can easily pay the tax which will be charged to him by the seller.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. That amounts to only 2 cents a gallon?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think it will really amount to more than 1 cent a gallon—perhaps one and a half. He will pass it on to the fountain or bottler, and he in turn will pass it on to his customers.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I want to ask the gentleman one question about automobile trucks. The automobile-truck business is rather a new business, and a great many new truck companies are being started. I would like to ask the gentleman on what theory the committee has decided to levy a 5 per cent tax, in addition to all other tax, on automobile trucks? They are certainly not a luxury, are they?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not so much a luxury, but we levied this tax upon the manufacturer, who will sell to a fellow whose business is large enough and who is making profits large enough to warrant him in having a motor truck, and who is able, if the manufacturer and his agent put the whole tax on him, to pay it without an unreasonable burden. The gentleman does not seriously object to that, does he?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is the gentleman's answer to the proposition?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and it is about as good an answer as the gentleman deserves for asking me a laughing question like that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have received a number of letters complaining of the stamp-tax feature——

Mr. KITCHIN. Complaining; well, I have received 10,000 letters, complaining. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As applied to the tax on telegrams and the tax on insurance. They say that under former practices—and we all know that that is true—these taxes were shouldered on the general public by an increase of charges on the telegrams and also by an increase on the insurance. I want to ask the gentleman if his committee has considered the proposition of so imposing that tax as to permit the shouldering of this increased tax on the general public?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will tell you. In the stamp act of 1898 there was a cent on each telegram sent. That cent was paid by the sender, not by the telegraph company. I believe in that act they made the telephone company pay the tax on the telephone message. But in 1914, when we reenacted practically the stamp act of 1898, we made the sender pay the telephone tax of 1 cent on the message over 15 cents, the telephone company collecting it for the Government. We increased this tax over the stamp tax of 1898 and the stamp tax of 1914 by proposing a tax of 5 cents for each message costing more than 15 cents. The tax will yield $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. The 5-cent tax on telephone and telegraph messages is a big tax, but it will be easily borne. Every sender of a message now, instead of paying that 1 cent, as in 1914, will pay 5 cents as a war tax, not in the shape of a stamp, but the company will collect it and send it to the Government.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In short, the general public will pay the tax, and not the telegraph companies?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MASON. That is always the way.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know that is the way.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, as to the insurance tax; we propose to tax it—life and marine and fire insurance policies—at the same rate of the 1898 act, but instead of levying a stamp tax as in 1898, in this bill we propose that the company keep a record of every policy issued and delivered and send in returns to the Government each month. While we get the tax, we abolish the stamp requirement and make the company, not the insured or the agent of the company, pay it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield as to another feature of this bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The bill undertakes to increase the postage rates on second-class mail matter, and establishes what is known as the zone system on that class of mail matter?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is there anything in this bill that will exempt religious publications from that increase?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. All religious, educational, fraternal, labor, charitable, and agricultural organizations and societies publishing periodicals, where all of the net income goes to those organizations and societies and not to any individual—that is, not for individual profit—are exempted from these zone rates, and we put a flat rate of 1½ cents a pound upon such publications. We increase the rate upon these publications 50 per cent. They say they can stand it.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. We have heard much about the high price of food.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I have heard something about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman knows that Congress has appropriated a large sum of money to investigate this subject, and we are going to be called upon to make large appropriations. I would like to say to the gentleman that in the last few days, as I am informed, the Southeastern Traffic Association has been authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a raise of 10 or 15 per cent, and this will go into effect shortly. There is also now authorized, or will be authorized, I am informed, an additional 15 per cent or general increase and advance in freight rates. Your bill, if I understood you correctly, also assesses 3 per cent on all bills of lading?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; 3 per cent on the amount of the freight bill.

Mr. SEARS. This will make approximately 33 per cent increase. I am not complaining, if the House thinks it wise to do it, but I will say that in my State, except for nine weeks, because of our unequaled climate, we can not ship with a general advance of 15 per cent, much less the 33 per cent allowed in this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. This bill makes no advance of 33 per cent—only 3 per cent on freight bills. Have they allowed the 15 per cent advance?

Mr. SEARS. I understood the 15 per cent advance would be allowed. I have a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the effect that if it would go into effect—and they intimated it would—the shippers could come in and complain. The point I want to make is this: Thousands of cars of vegetables rot every year because we can not reach the market after States further north begin to gather their vegetables.

It strikes me that if it is necessary to appropriate these large sums, running into the millions, to investigate the high cost of living when we know that that high cost of living is caused largely by our inability to get the crops to market, it might be well to exempt foodstuffs from this increase. I was wondering if the Ways and Means Committee took into consideration this advance of practically 20 per cent in the freight rates when they were making up the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said, many items in this bill would not be tolerated in times of peace. I think that in time of war this is a very slight tax, that all can pay, and one which will be distributed equally—though I am not devoted to it—and will in some degree offset the big tax we are going to put on incomes and profits. I have never investigated the freight question before the commission, so I do not suppose my opinion is worth anything; but at this time, when railroads for the last two years have had as much to do as they have ever had in their existence in the way of traffic, both freight and passenger, and when from the reports which I have read they have made as much money as they have ever made, it strikes me as a great injustice to the American people for any commission to permit railroads to increase their rates 15 per cent. [Applause.] And I want to say further that we will have plenty of chances to get some of that for the American people in the way of taxes, and we will have other bills coming along; and if the Interstate Commerce Commission permits them to raise their freight rates 15 per cent on the basis of their gross receipts, I am willing to come in with a tax bill and tell them to pay some of that to help support the Government and its armies. [Applause.]

Mr. SEARS. I am in hearty accord with the gentleman on that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe cases could be made out where particular railroads require an increase and ought to have it; but just to give a general increase of 15 per cent for all the roads, or for several roads, it strikes me as an outrage on the public.

Mr. SEARS. I am informed that the railroads can not handle the vegetables now being offered to them, and yet they are asking this increase in rates.

Mr. KITCHIN. You do not blame them for asking it, do you?

Mr. SEARS. It looks as though they were going to get it, too.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope they will not.

Mr. SEARS. The point I make is this: That it does not get the vegetables to the people; it does not get the beans and peas to the people. As suggested by my friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], who is sitting by me, it spills the beans. If we are going to make appropriations to investigate the high price of beans and other vegetables, and if we who live in vegetable-producing regions can furnish them to the market at 50 per cent of what is now being paid for them, then it seems to me this tariff should not be placed on the bill of lading, and I think it might be exempted.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman spoke about the issuance of insurance policies, the tax to be collected at the place of issue. Will that be on policies that are actually issued and paid for, or will it cover the frequent cases where policies are sent out and not accepted?

Mr. KITCHIN. It would apply to a policy issued and delivered after the passage of the act, and the company would pay the tax.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I should like to inquire from the gentleman whether or not there is anything in the bill which puts any tax on the products of silk manufacturers?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Why are the silk manufacturers exempted from the taxes on luxuries?

Mr. KITCHIN. That cravat that you have on, do you think that is a luxury?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am willing to pay my share of the tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. Silk goes into the manufacture of all sorts of clothing—of many necessities.

Mr. LONGWORTH. We have raised the tariff duties on silk and all other imported goods 10 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. I was going to suggest that the bill increases the tariff duties 10 per cent.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. You do on everything; yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will not the gentleman from Michigan vote for that? What is the gentleman complaining about, if he is going to vote for it?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Misery loves company, and I want to see everybody in the luxury class taxed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Everybody who buys silk.

Mr. KITCHIN. When I voted against the war resolution a fellow from Atlanta wired me, "Why don't you resign?" I wired him back, "Because I don't want to," and I made him pay for the telegram. [Laughter.] And my answer to the gentleman could be, "Because we did not want to." [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I understand from the gentleman that these items were not really put in as a matter of principle, but as a matter of favor.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of favor to whom? I will give the gentleman from the automobile district all the time he wants in the five-minute debate to defend automobile manufacturers and to show how they are absolutely going into bankruptcy and going to wreck and ruin; but we are not going to tax silk now, or any other necessities such as clothing. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] is the only gentleman in the House who is trying to make us believe he would be willing to bear that tax. He is the only man in the House who wears silk socks and silk underwear and silk shirts. [Laughter.] He is wrapped up in silk. He has got a silk shirt on right now, and yet he is trying to make us believe he would be willing to pay his share of a tax on silk. [Laughter.] One reason we did not tax the gentleman's silk wear is that we have taxed his jewelry and did not want to put a double tax on him. [Laughter.] Look at the jewelry which he wears—a scarf pin, rings, a watch and fob, and a little flag up there. [Laughter.] We have got the gentleman taxed on all those things. We do not want to tax his wearing apparel. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am greatly surprised at the gentleman from North Carolina. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. We tax the automobiles in the gentleman's State.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Silk is one thing that the rich buy.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand the bill increases the tax on distilled spirits $1.10 a gallon.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. And that produces an additional revenue of $200,000,000, or something like that.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the net additional revenue is about $100,000,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Did the committee consider the proposition of following the example of the English Government, which taxes distilled liquors $5.40 a fluid gallon, and thus produce $540,000,000 of revenue?

Mr. KITCHIN. I expect, my friends, we will make it $5.40 before we get through; but really the English tax, according to our measurement, is about $2.73 a gallon and not $5.40.

Mr. RANDALL. The English tax is $5.40 a gallon.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; they have a different measurement—their gallon contains more cubic inches than ours, and according to their measurement it is not $5.40. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who is familiar with this matter, what the tax in Great Britain is on whisky?

Mr. RAINEY. Two dollars and seventy-three cents before the war, $3.16 a gallon now.

Mr. KITCHIN. It amounts to about $2.73 when you measure it according to our gallon.

Mr. RAINEY. Two dollars and seventy-three cents in our money according to our gallons, and $3.15 on old whisky.

Mr. RANDALL. Why did not you take it all?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because we would not get any revenue from it.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. You tax marine, inland, and fire insurance policies on the premium paid, whereas you tax life insurance policies only once. What is the reason for that distinction?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to give the gentleman two reasons, and the first is not a good one, and the second is a good one. The first is that we followed the Republican act of 1898 and proposed the same rate. But the real reason is this: Life insurance policies do not have to be renewed.

Mr. HUSTED. But they pay a premium every year.

Mr. KITCHIN. The rate proposed is several times higher than fire insurance and marine insurance. It is 8 cents on every $100. If you put that tax on the premium where the policy was renewed like fire insurance policies it would be out of all proportion—too high. If they renew the policy seven or eight times it will be the equivalent of an 8-cent tax on the $100. Take a $5,000 life insurance policy and the tax would be $4. On a $5,000 fire insurance policy the tax would be 50 cents, so if you renewed it eight times you would pay the same amount of tax, and this is about the usual number of renewals.

Mr. HUSTED. It seems to me that if the act continues in force for any length of time the holder of a life insurance policy, who paid on the annual premium, would pay more than the man who only pays once on a life policy.

Mr. KITCHIN. The policy holder or the insured pays none of these taxes at all. Those are paid by the company. If the gentleman will figure it out he will find that the two are equalized.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. HICKS. In regard to boats and vessels, page 27, it says that the manufacturer shall pay the tax. That means on the original sale of the boat, I imagine. Because the gentleman knows that manufacturers resell boats sometimes for an account of their customers. There would be no tax if a man brought his boat back and had it resold for his account?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the manufacturer of a boat sold it to me and I afterwards took it back to sell on my account the second time, I do not think it would. I think that is covered in section 602. It is the same proposition suggested by the gentleman from Illinois with reference to automobiles.

Mr. HICKS. Otherwise it would be a double tax.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. In reference to life insurance, the poor man will take out a policy that costs him about $20 on a thousand, while the man with a good deal of money will take out an endowment policy which costs him $8, so that the man that buys the ordinary policy will pay two and a half times as much as the man who gets the endowment for an investment.

Mr. KITCHIN. We followed the act of 1898. It worked well. The insured, the policyholder or purchaser, pays not a cent of this tax. It is not charged to him by the company. The people and the companies understand it; it has been administered satisfactorily before.

Mr. JAMES. Life policies are issued by the companies themselves, while the fire and marine insurance are issued by the local agents.

Mr. KITCHIN. I know the agent writes the policies, but they are issued by the company. I do not think there is any doubt about it, but if there is any doubt about it we will insert a provision that the company issuing the insurance policy or in whose behalf the policy is issued must pay it.

Mr. JAMES. Where do you cover accident and life insurance policies issued by stock companies?

Mr. KITCHIN. That was left out by some mistake of the printer or by the clerk of the committee.

Mr. JAMES. You also left out tornado insurance and employers' liability.

Mr. KITCHIN. That would go in as did the Spanish-American war tax. We had it in there, but was by mistake omitted in printing or transcribing the original draft.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. What provision is there in regard to the tax on lyceum bureaus and Chautauqua circuits?

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not tax them anything; we tax the fellow that attends them, just like the fellow who attends the circus and the moving-picture shows, or the theater or banquets where there is admission, except in the case of religious and charitable organizations. The tax is 1 cent for every 10 cents or fractional part of the admission fee collected.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. In regard to this provision for the marine insurance. As the gentleman knows, the Government has an insurance board that takes a large amount of insurance for the Government. Does he think that the Government will pay the tax on that?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; while the Government will neither make nor lose, still it is a business concern, it is not a governmental function and is like any business enterprise, and the Government should pay this tax and keep account of all expenses in conducting the business; then it will know exactly what the overhead and other charges will be. We put it on the same basis as the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which is a separate, independent bureau, but under our laws it pays a tariff on some articles that it has to import.

Mr. SNOOK. The Government is not seeking to make any profit out of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; but that enables them to keep an account of their business, an account of all the charges and expenses and see what it really does cost.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to put the question if some other member of the committee is going to take it up and explain it in detail. That is, the change in phraseology as to what is capital for the basis of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman mean the good will provision?

Mr. STAFFORD. I mean as to what shall constitute capital as the basis for the excess-profits tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that in my construction of the law as it stands, and I believe the construction that most lawyers would give to it, this makes absolutely no change; but the present law reads the "actual cash value at the time of payment of assets other than cash paid in," and some business men have construed the expression "time of payment" as the time that the tax was paid and some the time that the actual cash was paid. We have changed the language somewhat to make absolutely clear the meaning, and it will read thus:

The actual cash value of property paid in other than cash, for stocks or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the very point. Many corporations, and maybe all corporations, use excess profits in the purchase of equipment, machinery, stock, and the like, for which no certificates of stock are issued, and yet that equipment, that additional stock, is virtually capital. Under the phraseology of the changed amendment, that which is really capital and used in the carrying on of the business would not be exempt as capital, because no certificates of stock had been issued for that excess equipment.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman entirely misconstrues the meaning and intent of the language which I quoted. I did not refer to such cases as he puts. In regard to the case he puts, I will make it clear. Suppose we have a company of $100,000 capital, a cotton mill, say, and we have a surplus of $50,000 and undivided profits of $50,000. We want to expand our plant by putting in new machinery and enlarging our buildings. We could either do it out of the surplus or from the undivided profits, or we could enlarge our capital and issue and sell stock and with the money make the enlargement. If we did the latter, then it is clear it would be counted as capital invested.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Instead of issuing and selling stock, suppose we take $50,000 of that surplus or undivided profits and with it expand the plant. We would still have that deduction and it would still be surplus and carried as such, to be included in the basis of deduction of 8 per cent, for the act and the bill provide that surplus and undivided profits should be included in capital invested.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, no.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes. Suppose the surplus was in money and we had it in bank and our balance sheet showed $50,000 surplus. We would take that $50,000 out of the bank, and instead of having it in money in the bank we would put it into the extension of the building, and our assets would still show the $50,000. In one case it is surplus in the shape of money on deposit in the bank and in the other it is surplus in the shape of enhanced value of the buildings, because you have extended them. You would have the same deduction as to the $50,000 in each case.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman believes that under the third division, on page 8, the invested profits in the way of the purchase of equipment, stock and the like, used in connection with the business of the corporation, which is the real capital, would be considered as paid in or undivided surplus used or employed in the business?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would not be listed on the books of the company any longer as surplus. There is nothing to show on the books of the company that it is surplus, because it shows on the books of the company that it is capital in the way of equipment or construction.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it would in the balance sheet be carried as surplus, and that surplus would exist in the shape of enhanced value of the plant by reason of its enlargement. But that is distinct, I will say to the gentleman, from the ordinary wear and tear expense, which is deducted in the income tax. Suppose a machine breaks down. You repair it or order another in its place. You have to keep it in repair, as you do your building. You have that deduction in the ordinary wear and tear as part of the running expenses. Now, when you take money from surplus or profits and actually expand your plant, then it goes in as capital invested, and it will still be counted the same as surplus.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say to the gentleman that the accounting methods of the best accountants when the money has been transferred and used in the way of equipment and stock no longer classifies it as surplus. It is classified under the head of capital.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me repeat the example I gave to the gentleman a moment ago. If you had a $100,000 plant, and you were going to expand it to a $200,000 plant, with larger buildings and more machinery, you would not charge that as operating expenses, current expenses, I do not care where you got the money, whether from sale of new stock or from your surplus or profits. Your plant would be increased in value to the extent of $100,000, whether you call it capital, surplus, or profit. That would be $200,000 that you would have invested there. Suppose, instead of going out and issuing stock for that $100,000 to expand the plant, which you concede would be counted as capital, you had a surplus in the bank or in products of the company which you could convert into money, of $100,000, which you carried as surplus, and you take this surplus and with it enlarge your plant, your books would show still $100,000 surplus, but the surplus would be in the form of enhanced value of your plant instead of deposit in bank or value of products on hand, and you would be entitled to an 8 per cent deduction on that amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am only questioning whether the phraseology as carried in the bill provides for that character of transfer of surplus into real capital?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that would still remain the same as surplus and be deducted.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was questioning whether your phraseology would include it. I recognize that it is the same financial operation, whether you vote the money as stock dividends or as a money dividend and then have stock issued in turn. I wanted to make certain that that was covered in this third subdivision.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is absolutely no doubt about that.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. With reference to section 1201, Title XII, page 51, the zone system——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to defer asking his question just for the moment, until I finish with this, and then I will come to that and conclude.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question on the matter that the gentleman from Wisconsin was talking about?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I will ask the gentleman from New York to defer his question until a little later.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I was wondering whether the committee had given consideration to this question which I have in my mind, and which I propose to propound to the gentleman in connection with the excess-profits tax. Let us assume that two men start in business with $100,000 capital each. They remain in business for 25 years, say. One man keeps his books systematically and charges off all depreciation from the very beginning until the end of the 25-year period, so that at the end of the 25 years his capital shows what it was originally when he went into business, as it ought. The other man instead of charging off depreciation allows the depreciation to accumulate as part of his assets and carries it along as part of his surplus. The surplus in the course of 25 years amounts to $900,000, so at the end of the 25 years one man would have $1,000,000 capital against which he would be allowed to charge 8 per cent profit, and the other man only a hundred thousand dollars capital. In one case the man who kept his books systematically and was on the square in the conduct of his business would be allowed under this law to collect $8,000 as 8 per cent profit and the other man would be allowed to collect $80,000 as his 8 per cent profit, and after the collection of $80,000 in the one case and the $8,000 in the other case the excess profits would begin to lie. Did the gentleman or the committee take into consideration in the excess-profits tax a condition such as I have described?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, yes; we have, but, of course, if the Government will permit one to do that and can not find out the facts and if it can be covered up in the books, the result would be as you stated. The Treasury Department will have to find out whether that million dollars was a real bona fide surplus or not. I imagine the department will not take the books and accounts of a partnership or corporation without examining them to see what the real facts are. I can see how one could keep books so as to have his books show that there is a million dollars of working capital when there would not be but $100,000.

Mr. MADDEN. He would not be paying the same amount of taxes in the one case as in the other. One man would be paying nine times more taxes in excess profits than the other.

Mr. KITCHIN. If they took it on what the books showed and not what the facts really were. I could take my books and fool my creditors if they would simply take the books showing what my balance was.

Mr. MADDEN. He would have the property in one case and charge it off in the other case and——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will tell you how that can not be done. If the partnership or corporation actually did not charge it off, which ought to be done and which always will be done because of the income tax it has to pay—I have never known anyone to pay an income tax without getting all the deductions which the law permits him to have. He deducts everything to which he can be possibly entitled so as to make his income tax less.

Mr. MADDEN. No; the income tax would be more in a case like that. Nine times as much in one case as in the other case.

Mr. KITCHIN. If there is wear and tear in the business, you would eliminate the wear and tear before——

Mr. MADDEN. Usually about 4 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. It makes your income less, of course.

Mr. MADDEN. The income tax; but this is the excess-profits tax, quite a different proposition.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman must remember that he can not consider the excess-profits tax at all until you consider the income, because the excess profits is based upon the income tax returns.

The first thing you do in reference to the excess-profits tax is to get the income tax return and see what is the income. That is the first thing you find. Suppose the income is a hundred thousand dollars, you see what per cent that is upon the capital. That may be 8 per cent, it may be 2 per cent, it may be 15 per cent, or it may be 50 per cent. Now, when you get the income tax returns you will find each year this fellow has charged off, like you do, deduct as part of his deductions operating expenses, wear and tear, and so forth.

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentleman does not get the point I am after.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. The point I am making is the man has carried as a surplus a large amount of buildings that cost a certain amount of money against which no charge for depreciation has ever been made, and a large amount of machinery at original cost against which no depreciation has been made.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; if the Treasury Department, that is going to enforce the act, is going to permit that to be done, but it will not do that; it will investigate the matter and find out whether there is a surplus or undivided profits.

Mr. MADDEN. That has been going on for 25 years, long before the gentleman thought about this.

Mr. KITCHIN. But they can go back and find out the facts.

Mr. MADDEN. Instead of an excess-profits tax there ought to be a net-earnings tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. But you would have to increase the amount of the normal tax, and instead of 4 you would have, perhaps, say, 8 per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. If you made a net-profits tax in addition to the income tax, every man would pay exactly on the amount of the earnings that he had, instead of having one man pay on the amount of his earnings and the other man pay on something that he does not own and carries as a surplus.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will repeat what I said this morning, that our excess-profits tax is smaller as a tax than any other country of the many countries levying that tax now. The exemption is larger. You deduct more from it than is allowed by any other country.

Mr. MADDEN. I want the gentleman to understand that I am not complaining about it.

Mr. KITCHIN. You have put the objections that are raised to it exactly. It is hard to administer. If you could go to a corporation or partnership and ascertain the exact amount of capital put into it, and squeeze out the water, it would be all right. It is hard to administer. There is no doubt about that—a great deal harder than the income tax.

Mr. MADDEN. The net-earnings tax, in my judgment, would be a good deal easier to administer than excess-profits tax. It would be scientific, and it would be more satisfactory to every business man of the United States than the way it is levied now, and would raise twice as much money.

Mr. TILSON. How about the stamps on checks?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is one of the improvements we made over the 1898 law. We eliminated the stamp on checks. It ought not to be in here, and if I have my way in the future there will never be a stamp tax on checks.

Mr. TILSON. It would be an easy way to collect it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; but hard and unjust to pay.

Mr. REED. As to the old druggist's retail tax, how do you collect that?

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no stamp on proprietary medicines. We have proposed a 5 per cent ad valorem at the source on the producer or manufacturer. The retail man will have to pay a like tax on the articles he has purchased since May 1 and has on hand at the time this law goes into effect. He will not put a stamp on such articles, but will send his return to the Government, upon which the tax will be assessed. This provision is to prevent the retailer from stocking up in anticipation of this bill.

Mr. REED. After that it is paid at the source of manufacture?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. REED. I think the druggist will appreciate that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Gentlemen, in conclusion let me say that we expect this bill to be opposed and attacked by the big interests whose incomes and profits it taxes; by the special interests upon whose products it makes levy; by the publishers of newspapers and magazines, whose enormous and outrageous subsidy they annually exact from the Government and the people it reduces.

We shall expect the representatives of the interests inside and outside of this Capitol to make every possible effort to defeat it. We shall expect the corridors of this Capitol to be filled with a swarm of protesting lobbyists from every quarter of the country.

We shall expect the big newspapers and magazines to attempt to discredit the bill and its authors in every conceivable way. We shall expect from them nothing but denunciation, defamation, and misrepresentation. We shall expect them to resort to every species of deception of the people and of intimidation and coercion of the people's representatives.

But in spite of such protests and assaults, in spite of such defamation and misrepresentation, we should perform our duty as members of the committee and the House.

The Government is in a life-and-death struggle with the strongest military power on earth. It is in urgent need of $1,800,000,000. The responsibility to provide that immense amount by a revenue measure is with us—with the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

The Ways and Means Committee appreciate that responsibility. No war-tax measure presented to this or any other legislative body ever had given to it more investigation, more study, more thought than the bill which we propose to-day. In our preparation of this bill, in our study and investigations, we considered the war-tax measures of our Civil War, of the Spanish-American War; the tax measures, so far as they could be obtained, of belligerents of the present war.

We challenge your comparison of this bill with any of them.

As I said in the beginning, this measure is the result of the best thought and the best wisdom of the committee after weeks of united labor and effort, and we stand prepared to defend it here or elsewhere.

Gentlemen, I thank you for having kept me on my feet for five hours. [Prolonged applause.]

Exercises upon the Unveiling of the Statue of Sequoyah.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DICK T. MORGAN,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, July 14, 1917.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am herewith inserting the proceedings and addresses upon the unveiling of the statue of Sequoyah in Statuary Hall in the Capitol on June 6, 1917. They were as follows:

PROCEEDINGS AND ADDRESSES UPON THE UNVEILING OF THE STATUE OF SEQUOYAH IN STATUARY HALL IN THE CAPITOL, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 6, 1917.

Hon. C. D. CARTER, Member of Congress from the third district, Oklahoma, chairman, called the meeting to order, and the following invocation was offered by Rev. Henry N. Couden, Chaplain of the House of Representatives:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee that Thou didst create man in Thine own image to think, to will, to love, to act, and to achieve. We thank Thee for all the progress he has made in the development of the Godlike in his being, especially for his work in the development of mankind to a higher civilization. We thank Thee for the life, character, and work of the man whose statue we are here to unveil in this hall among the great men of our Nation; that it may stand as a memorial to his wonderful achievements and an inspiration to those who shall look upon it to copy his virtues and sacrifices for mankind. Bless the services of the hour and make them memorable to the people, not only of Oklahoma, but to all true lovers of the men who follow the paths of the nobler life. And Thine be the praise now and evermore. Amen.

ADDRESS BY HON. C. D. CARTER.

Chairman CARTER. In the frontier log cabin in which my early youth was spent, a corner over my father's writing table was set aside for the pictures of notables. Among those I recall now the faces of Washington, Napoleon, Lee, and others. These, I was told, were among the greatest statesmen and warriors the world had produced. The faces of Shakespeare, Hugo, Cooper, and others were pointed out to me as some of the greatest writers, but the picture that engaged my youthful attention most was that of a long-haired, angular-faced frontiersman, clad in hunting shirt and buckskin leggings, bedecked with long bow-stemmed pipe, and a sort of turban on his head. I was given to understand that this was a picture of Sequoyah—George Guess—the only American who had ever invented an alphabet, and it seemed to me in my childhood fancies that he was the greatest of them all.
